Bajazet glad to see his Enemy so forward, speedily assembled his Army, and without delay offered him battle; which the Caramanian King refused not. So betwixt them was begun a fierce and terrible fight; which by the skillful Conduct of the Leaders, and exceeding Courage of the Soldiers, was maintained the whole day with doubtful Victory and great Slaughter on both sides, new Supplies still coming on in stead of them which were slain. The day declining, the Caramanian King (whose fatal destiny had now appointed him unto his last work) seeing his wearied Soldiers rather overlaid with multitude, than vanquished by force, so begin to give ground unto their Enemies; courageously thrust forward with his Guard and other valiant Soldiers about him, with such fury, that he brake into the midst of his Enemies' battail; where being known, he was forthwith environed by the Turks, and so hardly charged on every side, that having his Horse slain under him, he was enforced to fight on foot; where after he had with his own hand slain divers of his Enemies, he fell down dead in the midst of them. His Soldiers discouraged with his death, turned their backs and fled, and in flying were for the most part either slain or taken Prisoners. After this Victory, Bajazet speedily overran all that large Country, and without resistance in short time brought under his Obedience all the Country of Cilicia.

There was at that time in that part Cilicia which is called Trachea, and lieth toward the Sea side, an ancient Mahometan Prince, who had under his Command most part of that Country, with the famous and populous City of Scanderoon, the chief place of his Residence. This Prince had of long time lived betwixt the Christian Kings and the Kings of Caramania, as neutral, still fearing the greater, but indeed loving neither; and had until then chiefly maintained his state by the Alliance he and his Ancestors continually held with the Kings of Cyprus and the grand Masters of the Rhodes. Against this Prince, the only one now left in Asia the left, not subject unto the Turkish Kings, began Bajazet now to turn his Forces; purposing before he proceeded any further, to make a full Conquest of the lesser Asia, and to make all sure behind him. Of which his purpose the Prince having knowledge, and wisely weighing his own small Power to withstand a puissant Enemy, offered by his Embassadors to deliver unto Bajazet his chief City of Scanderoon, with all the rest of his Territory in Cilicia, upon condition, that Bajazet should give unto him other Possessions for it, in some other part of Asia the left, to the like value. Which his Offer Bajazet accepted, and so became Lord of all the Sea coast, from the Straits of Bosphorus, unto the Confines of Syria.

After he had thus conquered Cilicia, with a great part of the Mountain Taurus, he defended into Armenia the left, and in short time brought under his Subjection so much of that Country, as also of Cappadocia, as was sometime belonging to the Caramanian Kings. When Bajazet had thus slain the Caramanian King, and subdued that most ancient Kingdom of the Turks, which had long and many times mightily contended with the Glory and Power of the Ottoman Kings, he left Musapha, one of his great Baffes, at Iscion, with his Asian Army, to keep in Obedience those new won Countries; and as a Triumphant Conqueror returned himself to Constantinople, where he was of his Subjects joyfully received.

After that Bajazet had thus enlarged his Empire with the Kingdom of Caramania, and was now become an unwelcome Neighbour unto the great Sultan of Egyre and Syria, he began to dwell in disdain against that mighty Prince, for that he had given Aid against him, first unto his Brother Zemes, and after that to the Caramanian King in these late Wars; of which wrong purposing to be revenged, he shortly after appointed one Caragofa Baffa his Lieutenant in Asia, with Ishender another of his great Captains, with a strong Army to invade Syria, then part of the great Sultan's Kingdom. These two great Commanders well appointed for the purpose, when they were come to the uttermost parts of Cilicia, the new bounds of Bajazet's Empire, were then to pass by the Confines of Aladuleis his Kingdom, before they could pass the great Mountain Taurus to come into Syria. This Aladuleis commanded as King over the rude and fierce people which dwell along that great and rough Mountain, and was then in League with the Sultan. He hearing of the approach of the Turks Army, with a great number of his Mountain-people, as in Arabia, in the Straits whereby the Turks must needs pass, of purpose to intercept them. Ishender marching in the Vanguard with a great number of the voluntary Soldiers called Arantzij, as the manner of the Turks is, and fearing nothing less, than to be set upon by the Mountain King, before he was aware was come into the midst of his Enemies, and was by them so fiercely charged on every side for their places of advantage, that he there fled for their places of safety, and forsaking of the rest, which fought by flight to save themselves; Michael-Beg the eldest of the two being first bound, was slain by one of Aladuleis his Followers, whose Brother he had slain in that skirmish his Head being cut off, was by the commandment of Aladuleis carried to his Father Ishender, the more to grieve him; who disdainfully willed the Messenger not to show unto him, but to bid his Master eat it if he would. With which answer Aladuleis was exceedingly moved, nevertheless pitying the old mans misery, he shortly after let Yasir-Beg the younger Brother at liberty; but Ishender himself he sent Prisoner unto Caititus the great Sultan at Cairo, where he remained in prison five years after. Caragofa the Baffa discouraged with the loss of so great a man, retired with his Army back again into Cilicia, and from thence advertised Bajazet what had happened, by whom he was commanded to return to Constantinople, as a man unfit for so great an enterprise.

1489. Bajazet with this overthrow rather incensed than discouraged, made great preparation the next year against the Sultan both by Sea and Land, such as he had not before at any time made. And when all things were now in readiness, sent Alis-Baffa (of some called Calibus) and Cherlogofa his Son in Law, two notable Captains, with a great and puissant Army by Land, against the Egyptian Sultan; at which time he requested of the Venetians, with whom he was then in league, That he might by their good leave, as occasion required, refresh his Fleet (then ready to put to Sea for the invasion of Syria, as he said) in their Island of Cyprum. Which his request was as the general consent of the Senate denied, as a thing tending to the great danger of their State; yet with doubting lest Bajazet taking that denial in evil part, should feel provoked to by force, which he could not obtain by request, they presently sent Franisco Priolo their Admiral, to Sea with thirty Gallies for the defence of that Island. He hearing that one Fleet of the Turks Gallies, lately come out of Hellepontus, lay hovering at the Island of Scirus, expecting a far greater from the Coast of Ionia; and carefully considering how secret and sudden the Turkish designments were, although it was given out, that all this great preparation was made against the Sultan; yet to provide that they should not suddenly surpris the Isle, he speedily sent sundry Companies of Soldiers, especially Archers, out of Crete into Cyprum, for the better defence thereof; but staid himself with his Fleet at the Island of Naxos, that so at hand he might be the readier to withstand whatsoever the Turks intended. But when he saw forward, that all their Fleet was met, and now drew forward, he hoisted sail, and held his course directly for Cyprum. In the mean time the Turkish Fleet sailing along the Coast of Lycia, Pamphilia, and Cilicia, kept on their course until they came upon the Coast of Syria; by which time Calibus and Cherlogofa were come with a mighty Army into Cilicia, near unto the Mountain Taurus. Caititus the Egyptian Sultan having before had certain intelligence of the great preparation that Bajazet had made against him, had before sent Ugha a most valiant and politique Captain, with a strong Army of his Manalukes and other his most expert Soldiers into Syria, to be ready at all times to withstand the Turks. This worthy Chieftain understanding of the coming of the Turks Army, thought it greater policy, to carry the calamities which always wait upon great Armies, into the Enemies Country, than to retreat it into his own Bofom. And therefore although he knew himself to be for number far inferior unto his Enemies, yet supplying that confidence he had repoled in the approved and invincible force of his Manalukes, he expected not the coming of the Enemy into Syria, but passing over the Mountain Amanus, and so descending into Cilicia, met him not far from Tarsus, in the same place (as it was thought) where Alexander the Great had long before in a great Battel vanquished Darius.

These two puissant Armies come from far out of divers parts of the World, the one to find the other, were no sooner come together, but that with like cheerfulness they joynted Battel; and that with such violence and fury, that the Earth seemed to tremble under their Feet, and the Earth seemed destruction threatened unto them all; which terrible and cruel Fight was maintained all that day with doubtful Victory, and exceeding Slaughter on both sides, the politique Generals relieving the most distressed parts of their Battels; and they likewise as men prodigal of their lives, resolutely offering themselves to all dangers. When this most dreadful Fight had in this fore endured the whole day, and many thousands of valiant men of late alive, lay now dead upon the ground, the approaching night brake off the Battel, and both the Armies fore wearied and weakened (but especially the Turks) retired to their Camps, where they rested that night.

But the Egyptian coming to their Camp, found all their Carriages with their provision of Victuals and other necessities quite taken away and gone. Which thing (as some write) the bordering People of that Country (for most part living upon robbery) had done in time of the Battel, to please the Turks; or as some others report, they which had the charge thereof, terrified with the greatness of the Turks Army, and doubting of the Battel, fled away; and taking their way along the Sea side, fell into the hands of the Turks which were put on shore out of the Gallies, and so were of them spoiled. However it was, (for in so great uncertainty I dare not affirm) certain it is, that the Egyptians were fore troubled with the loss of their provision, fearing that if they should now stay longer in the Country, they should forthwith be driven to great extremities for want of necessities. Wherefore when they had evilly rested that night, the next day early in the morning they presented themselves in order of battel before their Enemies, braving them into the Field, and daring them to Battel. The Turks disdainful to see any prouder in field than themselves, after they had in goodly order ranged their Battels, set forward with Ensigns displayed against their proud Enemies. There began a most terrible and bloody Battel, fought with such desperate resolution, as

A long and terrible battle between the Turks and the Egyptians.

If they had solemnly vowed, either to overcome or die in the place where they stood. A man would have said, that the former days fury had been but a play in comparison of this; many valiant Souldiers covered with their dead bodies the same ground whereon they living stood, when they received the first encounter of their Enemies. Of both those great Armies none was seen to give ground, or once look back; as the Turks Jemiscaris, and the Egyptians Mamelukes (the undoubted strength of the greatest Mahometan Monarchs, Souldiers for their Valour much feared, and through the World renowned) there buckled together, and standing foot to foot spent the uttermost of their Forces one upon another; as if they would in that battle have made it known unto the World, which of them were known unto the better Souldiers. Whilst Victory stood thus doubtful, and the day was now far spent, Ulug the Egyptian General, with fifteen thousand valiant Horsemen (whom he had received for that purpose) gave a fresh Assault upon the Turks Squadrons, with fire force that they had much ado to keep their order, and began now to give ground; which was by and made good again by other fresh men speedily brought on by the Baffies. Then became the Battle more fierce than before, every man striving to the uttermost of his power, to tell his life unto his Enemies as dear as he could. In which manner of Fight all the rest of the day was spent, until that after the going down of the Sun, the darkness of the night coming fast on, they were glad for lack of light to break off the Battle, and to retire themselves into their Camps, not knowing as yet who had got the better.

The Turks
by night.

The Turks Baffies taking view of the Army, and finding that of an hundred thousand fighting men which they brought into the Field, there was scarce a third part left, and most of them also maimed or hurt; and doubting to be set upon again the next morning by their resolute Enemies, fled away secretly the same night, leaving behind them for half their Tents well stored with Victuals and all other things needful. The Egyptians also having lost one half of their Army (which was at the first seventy thousand) and wanting their necessary provision, were retired also the same night into the Mountain Taurus, not knowing any thing of the Flight of the Turks. And some of the Souldiers passing quite over the Mountain without stay, into Asia, raised a report all over the Country as they went, that the Sultans Army was overthrowen, and that the Turks had got the Victory; so uncertain was the true knowledge of the event of that Battle, even unto them that were present therein. The Egyptians lying that night upon the side of the Mountain, had speedy intelligence from Aladules, of the flight of the Turks; which being also confirmed by his Espials to be true, he presently came down from the Mountain, and entered into the Turks Camp, where he found plenty of Victuals and of all other things needful for the refreshing of his Army.

Aladules the Mountain King, with the People called Vasfaides, by whose confines the Turks must needs in their return pass, robbed and flew many of them in their disordered Flight; and had so stopped the passages, that they were in flying overtake by the Mamelukes, and slain with so great a slaughter, that of all that great Army of the Turks few remained alive to carry news home. Calibius and Cherfogles the Baffies, were in that flight both taken Prisoners, and afterwards presented to Cayteibus the Sultan, at Caire, with eighteen Ensigns of the Turks Sanzachs, which are great men amongst them; having every one of them the regiment and command of some one Province or other, and are in degree next unto the Baffies.

Neither was the fortune of Bajazet his Navy at Sea, better than that of his Army at Land; for as it lay at rode upon the Coast of Syria at the mouth of the River Orontes, which runneth by the famous City of Antioch, his Gallies were by tempest and rage of the Sea put from their Anchors, and in the fight of their Enemies, swallowed up of the Sea; or else driven upon the Main, and there with the Surges of the Sea beaten in pieces. Bajazet not a little troubled with these losses both by Sea and Land, at length with much ado, by his Embassadors concluded a Peace with the Sultan, unto whom he reformed all such places as he had before taken from him; for which the Sultan delivered unto him Calibius, Cherfogles, Alchmetis, and Ulug, with all the rest of the Turks Prisoners, which he had in great number in his keeping.

Shortly after this Peace was concluded betwixt these two great and mighty Princes, Cayteibus the Sultan died; who of a Circassian Slave, by many degrees of Honour, and by the favour of the Mamelukes his Fellows, obtained the rich Kingdom of Egypt, which he right worthily governed to his immortal praise by the space of two and twenty years; commanding at one time the great and rich Country of Egypt, with all Africa as far as Cyrene, Wellward; and Judea with the great part of Arabia, and all Syria, unto the great and famous River Euphrates, Eastward. In the later end of his Reign he (overcome with the importunity of his Wife Dulrike, an Arabian born, a Woman of an haughty Spirit) joyined his Son Mahometus, a young man of about four and twenty years old, with him in the Fellowship of his Kingdom; that so possessed of it his Father yet living, he might the better enjoy it after his death. Contrary to the custom of the Mamelukes, who of long time had not used to have their King by succession, but by their free election. Who grudging to be thus defrauded of their wonted choice, immediately after the death of Cayteibus flew Mahometus his Son; and in few months after, four more, who one after another without their good liking had aspired unto the Kingdom; neither could they be contented, until such time as that they had according to their wonted custom set up a Sultan of their own choice.

About the same time that the aforesaid Peace was concluded betwixt the two great Mahometan Princes Bajazet and Cayteibus, Charles the French King was making great preparation against Alphonfus King of Naples; giving it out, That after he had recovered that Kingdom, he would forth with thence invade the French Dominions in Grecia. Which great attempt the haughty King was endued to take in hand, by the persuasion of divers of his Nobility, but especially the solicitation of Lodovius Sforza Duke of Milaine; whereby the whole state of Italy was in short time after sore shaken, and Sforza himself, Author of those troubles, at last carried away by the French, miserably ended his days as a Prisoner in France. Alphonfus the Neapolitan King doubting the greatness of the French King his Enemy, entered into a confederation with certain of the States of Italy, against the French, but especially with Alexander the Sixth then Bishop of Rome; for the better alliance whereof, he gave his bafe Daughter in Marriage to Godfrey Burgie, the Bishop's Son, and made him Prince of Carmela; his

his other Son Francis he entertained also in great pay to serve him in his Wars. And by his Embassador Pandionius Camillus, lately returned out of France, gave Bajazet to understand, what the French King had purposed against them both, requesting him to aid him with six thousand Horsemen and as many Foot, against their common Enemy, promising to give them honourable entertainment during those Wars. And to further the matter, Alexander the great Bishop sent George Buciard, a Ligurian, skilful in the Turkish Language, Embassador to Bajazet, to declare unto him with what great preparation, both by Sea and Land, the young French King (desirous of honour and enlargement of his Kingdom) was about to invade Naples; and then, with what great power (after he had dispatched his Wars in Italy) he purposed to pass over into Grecia; and that he had to that end earnestly travelled with him to have Zemes his Brother delivered into his hands, whom he desired to use as a most fit instrument for the troubling of his State and Empire, by reason of his many Friends; yet that his Holiness (having the French in distrust as a proud and ambitious People, as also of the State of Italy in general) had entered into a confederation with Alphonfus King of Naples, with their united Forces to withstand that proud Nation, both by Sea and Land; wanting nothing more for the accomplishment thereof, than Money; by which means only, Bajazet might (as he said) provide for the safety of his Kingdom in Grecia, if he would put to his helping hand, to furnish them with Money for the entertainment of Souldiers; forasmuch as the City of Rome and the Kingdom of Naples, were the surest Walls of that side of the Osman Empire; if he not altogether refusing the charge, would not spare for a little cost to maintain the War rather in that foreign Country, than to receive it brought home to his doors, concluding, That it were much more commodious and safe with his Treasures to repress his Enemies in a strange Country afar off, than by dint of sword and plain battle in his own. A thing by experience well known, That they which have neglected and set at nought remote dangers, for sparing of charge, have afterwards been enforced with greater danger to receive the same into their own bosoms, when as they were become desperate and past remedy. Bajazet, who he had by his Espials and often Letters and Embassadors from Alphonfus, knew all this to be true, gave great thanks to the Bishop by his Embassador, for that he sitting in so high place, did so friendly and in so good time admonish him, both a Stranger and of a contrary Religion, of things of so great consequence; yet for answer, he willed him to return again unto his Master with one Dautius his Embassador, who should carry with him both Money and others his secret resolutions concerning those matters. Among other things given him in charge, was an Epistle written in Greek, wherein the barbarous King with great cunning perwaded the Bishop to poison Zemes his Brother; for indeed of a Religion altogether contrary Verus Bajazet stood in fear and doubt, lest he should by some chance escape out of the prison the troubling of his State. For the performance of this his request, he promised faithfully to pay unto the Bishop, two hundred thousand Ducats, and never after so long as he lived, to take up Arms against the Christians. Otherwise than had his Father Mahomet, and his Grandfather Amurath done, who both as deadly Enemies unto the name of Christians never ceased by continual Wars to work their woe.

But George the Bishops Embassador, and Dautius, Jo. Rovere travelling towards Italy, and having about to have landed at Ancona, were boarded by Jo. Rovere Brother to Julianus the Cardinal (a man of great Treasure in those quarters) and clean cut of their Roveres and whatsoever else they had aboard. That the Bishop did owe him a great sum of money, due unto him for his good service done in the time of Innocentius his Predecessor, for which he now paid himself. Neither could the Bishop, much troubled with that injury, ever after recover one part thereof, although he threatened revengeance with Fire and Sword, and also sought for recompence of the Venitians, whom it concerned to have the Turks harmless in those Seas; for why, Roveres bearing himself upon the French, which were now upon coming, whose faction he Bishops thundering Curles and vain Threats, Dautius himself Bajazet Embassador being let on shore, was glad to go on foot to Ancona; and so thence passing up the River Padus, came to Franciscus Gonzaga, Duke of Mantua, of whom for (the ancient Friendship betwixt him and Bajazet) he was courteously entertained and furnished both with Money and Apparel, and so spoiled returned into Grecia, to carry news unto his Master how he had sped.

When Bajazet understood by Dautius, the evil success he had in his late journey, he forthwith sent Adolphus one of the Baffies of the Court, unto the great Bishop Alexander, with like instructions as he had before given to Dautius; who with better hap arrived in Italy, and came to Rome in safety; where he forgot no part of that was given him in charge by his great Master. But amongst many other things, the life of Zemes was that he most sought for at the Bishops hands.

At the same time, which was in the year 1495, the French King Charles the Eighth of that name, passing through the heart of Italy with a strong Army against Alphonfus King of Naples; and taking his way without leave through the City of Rome, so terrified Alexander the Bishop, who (as we have before said) altogether favoured, and as much as in him lay, furthered the cause of Alphonfus; that he was glad to yield to all such Articles and Conditions as it pleased him then to demand, not purposing in himself at all the performance of any of those things, which for fear he had with great solemnity promised, as the sequel of the matter afterwards declared. Amongst other things, he was enforced to give unto the King his graceless Son Cesar Burgie Palatinus (then one of the Cardinals) in hostage, for the performance of the other of his promises; Which disgrace the crafty old Bishop fought to cover, by giving his Son with the title of his Legate; and with him, he was also enforced to deliver Zemes the Turk, Bajazet Brother, his honourable Prisoner; who to the great profit of the Bishop and his Predecessor, had remained in safe custody at Rome about the space of seven years. But Zemes within three days after he was delivered to the French, died at Cajeta, being before his deliverance poisoned (as it was thought) with taste of powder of which he was not so much as but by little and little dispersing the force thereof, did in short time bring most assured death; which pleasant poyson, Alexander the Bishop, skilful in that practice (corrupted by Bajazet Gold, and envying to great a good unto the French) had caused to be cunningly mingled with the Sugar wherewith Zemes used to temper the Water which he commonly drank. His dead Body was not long after sent to Bajazet, by Mulapha his Embassador, who to the great contentment of his Master, had thus contrived his death with the Bishop. Not long after, this dead Body so far brought, was by the appointment of Bajazet, honourably interred among his Ancestors at Pusfa. Cesar Borgia also the Bishops Son, a little before given in hostage unto the French King, deceiving his Keepers at Velitras, returned again to Naples. This wicked, low cunning, and evil brain, not worth the remembrance but by way of detestation (the very monster of Nature, if a man should well consider the course of his whole life) shortly after his escape, envying at the honour of Camdianus his Brother, who then was General over the Bishop his Fathers Forces, which were at that time great; when he had one time merrily supped with his said Brother, with their Mother Vannotia, traitorously caused him to be unawares murdered in the Streets as he was going home, and his dead Body to be cast into the River of Ther. Then calling off his Priestly Habit with his Cardinals Robes, he took upon him the leading of his Fathers Army in his Brothers stead, and gave himself wholly to Martial Affairs; a vocation best fitting his fierce and bloody disposition; and with exceeding Prodigality, wherever he exhorted his Fathers Coasters and the Treasures of the Church, bound fast unto him desperate Ruffians and Souldiers (especially Spaniards, his Fathers Country men) such as he knew fit to serve for the execution of his most horrible devices. Which manner of his proceedings, although they were such as all good men detested, yet the old Hypocrite his Father winked thereat, fearing (as it was thought) to be murdered of the viper, himself, when it should serve for his himself, and that he was become a terror to all the Nobility of Rome and the Seigniories thereabout, he by the advice and help of his Father (who desired nothing more than to make him great) first drove the most honourable Family of the Colonnij out of the City, and afterwards out of Latium; and by most execrable Treachery, poisoned or killed the honourable Personages of the great Houses of the Ursini and Casani, taking to himself their Lands and Possessions. With like cruelty he strangled at one time four Noblemen of the Camertis; and drove Guido Feltrius out of Urbis. He took the City of Paviam from Yo. Sforza, who with much difficulty escaped his bloody hands; and drove the Malatestas out of Ariminum. The great Lady Katharine Sforza he thrust out of Forum Livij and Forum Cornelij, and shamefully led in triumph through Rome. And never satisfied with blood, which he without measure shed, he took the City of Ferentina from Affor Adamfredas, a young Gentleman of rare piety; whom after the heady Tyrant had most horribly abused against Nature, he caused to be cruelly strangled, and his dead body to be cast into Ther. Having thus filled the measure of his iniquity, and as a fretting Canker, having either devoured or driven into exile most part of the Roman Nobility, and purposing by the supplantation of his Father, to make himself Lord and Sovereign both of the City, and of all Latium, in the pride of his thoughts he was by the hand of the most High attached and cast down, and that by such means as he least feared; for being with his Father at a solemn Supper in the Pav-

cam, of purpose prepared for the destruction of certain rich Cardinals and some other honourable Citizens, they were both poisoned by the fatal error of one of the Waiters, who mistaking of a Flaggon, gave the poisoned Wine to the accused Bishop and his Son, which was prepared for the Guests; whereof the old Bishop in few days after died. But his Son who had drunk the same with Water, although he died not of an long time after, yet presently fell into such an extreme sickness, that he was not able to help himself, or to command his desperate Followers, whereof he had great store; but lying sick, he shut up himself of them forsoke, and two of his Enemies, Pius the Third, and Julius the Second, one after another sitting in his Fathers place. Of which two, Pius enjoyed that Pontifical Dignity but sixteen days; and Julius succeeding him, caused this Cesar Borgia (who of right had deserved a thousand deaths) to be shut up in the Castle called Mole Adriani, from whence he set him at liberty upon the delivery of certain strong Holds which were yet holden by his Garrison. After he had thus rid himself out of Julius the Bishops hands, he fled to Offia, and so by Sea to Naples; where he was by the commandment of Ferdinand King of Spain, apprehended by Gonsalvus the Great, and transported into Spain, for fear lest he, being of a most troublesome Nature, and much reformed unto by his old Favourites, should raise some new stir in Italy. He was no sooner arrived in Spain, but he was cast into Prison in the Castle of Medina, where after he had ten three years he deceived his Keeper and with a Rope which he had gotten, let himself down from an high Tower of the Castle; and so escaping, fled to the King of Navar, whom he afterwards served in his Wars, and was in an hoc skirmish against the Kings Enemies (wherein he had obtained the Victory) slain with a small shot. Unwounded after in many battles and victories, to have ended his days so honourably. His dead Body was found stript, and so brought unto the King upon a bad Beast, as if it had been a dead Calf all naked; which was by his commandment honourably buried at Pamphilona.

But to return again from whence we have something too long with this troublesome Body gone astray. The French King having thus lost both his great Hostages, Zemes the Turk by death, and the Cardinal Borgia by escape, held on his journey towards Naples; and with wonderful success prevailed as he went, all places yielding unto him without any great resistance. Alphonso seeing himself destitute of such aid as he had in vain required both of the Turkish Emperor and of the Venetians, and now almost beset with his mighty Enemy, to whom so many strong places had in shorter time been delivered than any man had before imagined; and withal considering with himself, how that he had lost the hearts of his Subjects (the strongest defence of Princes) for that most of the Nobility, and especially the Napoletons, hated him for his too much severity in punishing the Offenders in the late Rebellion, wherein the Princes of Sarno and Salerno were chief; and the common People were no less offended with the grievous and heavy exactions, required of them for the maintenance of these Wars, informing that their murmuring Speeches came oftentimes to his own hearing; as oftentimes it falleth out, That the hatred of the Subjects against their Princes, which hath for fear of long time been diffembled during their prosperity, more frankly and severely breaketh out in their declining estate; for these causes, Alphonso fearing to be forsaken of his People, as a man in despair, with with abundance of tears openly in the sight of all the Napoletons, reigned his Kingdom of Naples to his Son Ferdinand, when as he had as yet scarcely reigned one whole year after the death of Ferdinand his Father; and with four Gallies passed over to Macerus, a City of Cicilia. His Son Ferdinand a Prince of rare perfection and singularly graced with all the virtues of true Nobility, and thereto dearly beloved of all the People was to the wonderful contentment of the Napoletons with great joy and acclamations fluted Kings; and having performed all the Ceremonies owing to his Coronation, returned presently to his Army. By this time the French King with all his Forces was entered far into the Kingdom of Naples; and having taken by Assault certain Cities which trusted too much to their own strength, struck such a general terror into the minds of the Napoletons, that they thought no place now strong enough to abide his batteries, or power sufficient to abide his Forces. Ferdinand the young King with his Army had taken the Straits of the Forreist of S. Germane, thereby to impeach the further passage of the French King. But whilst he was there buied, he was suddenly advertised, that Fabrizius Colonna with a great power of Frenchmen, had by the Appennins broken into Campania, and so was marching towards him; wherefore doubting to be shut up betwixt two strong Armies of the Enemies, he retired speedily to Capua, a strong City situate upon the River Vulturnus; purposing thereby by means of that deep River, to stay passing from the French King. But whilst he lay there, news was brought unto him, That all the City of Naples was in an up-rore, and that the Citizens were all up in Arms, as men in doubt which way to turn themselves. Ferdinand not a little troubled with these bad news, commended the charge of his Army and the defence of the City of Capua to his eldest Son Alphonso, and rid himself in post back again to Naples.

Ferdinand
depart from Ca-puia to assist at Naples.

It is a strange thing to tell, what a sudden alteration ensued upon his arrival there; for suddenly all the tumult was appeased, every man laid down his Arms, and welcomed him with a general gratulation; for he was a man of a great and invincible Courage, and of so comely a Personage, as might easily win the hearts of his Subjects; inasmuch, that when he earnestly requested them, that they would not traitorously betray him to his barbarous and cruel Enemies, being their natural King, or rather their Brother born and brought up amongst them; they all with one consent answered, That they would spend their Lives and Goods in his quarrel, so long as he should keep his Army whole, and defend the City of Capua; but if it should so chance that the Aragonians should be overthrown, or else for fear abandon that City, and the French King, as Victor, to approach the City of Naples, he should do both against his Person and Kingdom, by exchanging Fidelity and Allegiance of his Subjects, apprehended with so just a fear, he should expose that noble City with the fruitful Country thereabout, to be spoiled and destroyed by a merciless and cruel Enemy. Whilst Ferdinand was thus busied in appealing and confirming his wavering Subjects to Naples, the French King had taken his way to Naples, where he was come before Capua. The Citizens of Capua although they were always well affected to the Aragonian Kings, yet seeing the French King as a most violent Tempest to bear down all before him, began now to consult amongst themselves of yielding up the City; whereunto they were the more ready to be forced by the sudden revolt of the great Captain Trivul-

sius with his Followers; as also by the departure of Virginus and Petilianus, two great and famous Commanders, who seeing themselves forsaken of Trivulsius, fled with their Companies unto the City of Nola. In this discomfiture of King Ferdinand's Army, the Frenchmen had entered into the Suburbs of the City; which thing Gothofredus and Gaspar (two valiant German Captains) beholding, sallied with their Companies out of the City, of purpose to abate the pride of the French, and to confirm the doubtful Citizens. These worthy Captains when they had with exceeding Valour repulsed the French, and thought to have again returned into the City, could not be suffered to enter, but were by the Citizens shut out of the Gate, in danger to have had their Throats cut by the Enemy. In which perplexity they were glad upon their knees to intreat the cowardly Citizens standing upon the Walls, not in such a traitorous manner to betray their Friends ready in their defence to bestow their lives; and with much intreating, at length obtained of those heartless men, that they might by ten and ten in a Company be received in at one Gate of the City, and so put out at another, fasting from the danger of the Enemy; in which fort when they had passed through the City, they took the way towards Naples; and upon the way met with the King at Aversa, unto whom they declared all that had happened in his absence at Capua; who although he saw his Army dispersed, and all things now desperate, yet went he on forward, and came to the very Gates of the City, where he called upon divers of the chief men of the City, requiring to be let in. But when he saw there was none to give him answer, and an Ensign of the French King displayed upon the Wall, in token that the City was become French, he returned to Naples; where he found the Gates now shut against him, and all the Citizens up in Arms, and not willing to receive any of the Souldiers which came from Capua, more than the King himself; for flying Fame preventing his return, had filled every corner of the City with report, That all the chief Captains of his Army were either gone over to the Enemy, or else for safeguard of their lives fled; That the whole Army was broken up, and Capua yielded to the French. Wherefore the Napoletons framing their fancies according to the condition of the time, began now also to lawn upon the good fortune of the French, and to have King Ferdinand in contempt; which he well perceiving, and feeling a compass farther off from the City, came unto the Castle, whereinto he was received with his Followers by his faithful Captains therein before left. But providently foreseeing that he could not there long stay, but that he should be besieged by his Enemies both by Sea and Land, he commended the keeping of that Place unto Alphonso D'avalos, a most valiant Captain, and departed himself with 20 Gallies well appointed unto Astunaria, an Island not far from Naples, having in it a commodious Harbour and a strong Castle; where Fortune, never firm but in misery, seemed again to deride the poor remainder of his Honour; for coming thither, the Captain of the Castle, unworthily named Taffus, forgetting his duty towards his Sovereign, of whom he had before received many extraordinary favours, most traitorously now in his so hard distress took the Gates of the Castle against him at his landing, and unkindly refused to receive him. With which unexpected ingratitude, the poor King was wonderfully perplexed and almost abused; yet with earnest intreaty and ample commemoration of the benefits and premisses which both his Father and himself had in times past bestowed upon him, he prevailed so much with this unthankful man, that he was content to receive him into the Castle, so that he would come but himself alone; of which his offer, when no more could be got, the King seemed to accept. So the Captain having opened the Gates, the States were in the very entrance thereof suddenly laid to the heart with a Dagger by King Ferdinand and slain in the middle of his armed Soldiers; which was done with such a Countenance and Majesty, that the Warders with their Weapons in their hands, dismayed with his look, forthwith at his commandment opened the Gates, and received him in with all his Followers. Whereby it appeareth, That in the Countenances of Princes rests a certain Divine Majesty, in all Fortunes above the common curse of Nature; which is of power to daunt the Hearts of most disloyal Traitors in the performance of their unnatural Treasons. The next day after the departure of King Ferdinand from the Castle of Naples, Charles the French King was received into the City, with much Pomp, Triumph and Acclamation of the Neapolitans, as if they had even then by the benefit of that foreign King, been restored to perfect Liberty, and delivered out of so long and hard Bondage. Shortly after, the Castle of Naples, with all the strong places thereabout were yielded unto the French, and Embassadors sent from all the Princes and People of that Kingdom, yielding themselves into the power of the French King. Then Ferdinand seeing all lost and gone, departed from Avanzo, where he lay expecting the event of his hard fortune, and failed into Cicilia. Thus the House of Aragon in less than five months, lost the Kingdom of Naples, about sixty three years after it was first taken from the French by Alphonfus the elder, this Ferdinand his great Grandfather.

The report of the great preparation made by the French for this War, had long before filled the Ears of them which dwelt in any part of the Turks Dominions in Europe; but when they saw the French Ensigns displayed upon the Walls of the Castles, and strong Towns along the coast of Calabria and Salerno, such a sudden fear fell upon the Turks Garrisons along the coast of Epirus and Macedonia on the other side of the Adriatic, over against that part of Italy, that many of them forsook their charge; the Christians in those places, as also in Grecia and Peloponnesus, beginning then to lift up their heads in hope of their deliverance, and to make the best preparation they could to joyn with the French against the Turks; but especially the rough and wild People inhabiting the high Mountains called Aerocbraunij in the borders of Epirus, who presently took up Arms, refusing to be any longer tributary unto the Turkish Empire.

This prosperous and speedy success of the French King in the conquest of Naples, filled the minds of most of the Christian Princes, as also of the Turkish Emperor, with a doubtful expectation, whether his greatness would grow; many being of an opinion, that he covertly affected the empire of Rome, and to make himself the sole Monarch of Italy. Which conceit no little troubled both the great Bishop Alexander, and Maximilian then Emperor. Bajazet also feared much lest he should upon the sudden turn his Forces into Epirus or Grecia, to his no small inquietude. And Ferdinand the second King of Spain, was no less careful for the safety of Spain; Lodovicus Sforzia also (shortly after created Duke of Milan, the chief occasion of the French Kings coming into Italy, and a great aider of him in those Wars) now to consider better of the matter, and to stand in doubt of the King, whom he well perceived to make small reckoning of his word or promise, so that he might thereby enlarge his Dominions. And the Venetians, who in all these Wars had stood looking on as neuterers (in hope that when the Aragonsians and French had with long Wars, which they vainly imagined, well weakened one another, that they might then at their pleasure share out something for themselves) were now in doubt with the rest of the States of Italy to lose some part of their own Territory; for now there was no Prince or State in Italy able to oppose them, whereas against the French, but stood all as it were at his devotion.

Wherefore the aforesaid Princes, namely Maximilian the Emperor, Ferdinand King of Spain, Alexander Bishop of Rome, the State of Venice, and Lodovicus Sforzia, Duke of Milan, for the more assurance of their Estates, by their Embassadors speedily sent from one to another, concluded a strong League among themselves; whereof the chief Capitulation was, That if any of these Confederates should upon their own accord make War upon any other Prince, they should do it upon their own charges; but if any of them should chance to be invaded by any other, that then every one of these Confederates should of their own charge send four thousand Horse and ten thousand Foot in aid of their Confederates so invaded, until the Wars were ended; which League was to endure for twenty years. The fame of this League was welcome to many other Princes, but especially to Ferdinand, who now feared nothing more, than the Forces of the French, and had therefore offered unto the Venetians, to aid them both by Sea and Land against the French, if their Affairs should so require. This League so much pleased not other Princes, but it troubled the French King more, as of purpose made against him; although it was by the Confederates pretended to be made only for their own safety. Wherefore he with all expedition placed his best Captains with strong Garrisons in all the Cities and strong Holds of the Kingdom of Naples, and left Mompaner his Viceroy in the City of Naples, and with the rest of his Army returned into France, purposing by the way as he went to terrify the dissembling Bishop, so if it were possible to draw him from the League; and afterwards to deal with Sforzia and the rest as he might. But when he was come near unto Rome, the Bishop for fear led out of the City to Perugia, intending from thence to have fled to France, if the French King should have further pursued him. The Bishop deceived of his purpose, in peaceable manner entered the City, and there staid three days, and so departed; using violence against none, but against such as were well known to be of the Aragonsian faction.

From Rome he marched to Pisa; and so with much pain passing the Apennines, was at the River of Tarnus, not far from Farma, sent upon by Franciscus Gonzaga Duke of Montua, General of a great Army which the Venetians and Sforzia had raised upon the sudden to have stopped his passage; in which Battle he was in great danger to have been taken or slain, and to make himself, with all the rich Spoil gotten in the rich Kingdom of Naples; yet having at length with great slaughter valiantly repulsed his Enemies, he afterwards returned in safety home.

About the same time that this Battle was fought at Tarnus, the young King Ferdinand had fled out of his Kingdom by the River Adria, and returned again out of Cicilia to Naples; where he was joyfully received of the Neapolitans, and by the help of his Friends (but especially of the great

Gonfalvus

Ferdinand recovered his Kingdom of Naples from the French, and died.

Gonfalvus, sent in his aid by Ferdinand King of Spain) in less than a years space recovered the Kingdom of Naples from the French, and then dying without issue left the same to his Uncle Federicus. Wherein the uncertainty of worldly Honor, the chief felicity of ambitious minds, is well to be noted; when as in that one Kingdom the chief Government was six times changed in less than the space of three years: for first Ferdinand the elder reigned, let that Kingdom and to his Son Alphonfus, at such time as the French King was making preparation for those Wars: Alphonfus despairing of his own Forces, resigned the Kingdom to his Son Ferdinand, when he had scarcely reigned fully a year: Ferdinand in less than three months was driven quite out of Italy by Charles the French King: Charles possessed of the Kingdom, in short time after was again dispossessed by the same Ferdinand: Ferdinand having with much trouble thrust out the French, died within less than a year: After whom succeeded Federicus his Uncle, no less unfortunate than the rest: and Charles the French King himself lived not long after, but died suddenly as he came from playing at Tennis, being then but seven and twenty years old, leaving the flourishing Kingdom of France; with the troublesome Title pretended to the Kingdom of Naples, unto Lewis his successor, who lived with great trouble to Conquer the same, and with greater grief to lose it again.

But to return again to the course of our History, from whence the great Occurrences of that time (not altogether impertinent to our purpose) have a little too far led us. Bajazet delivered of two great fears, first by the death of his Brother Zemas, and after by the calling out of the French out of Naples, began now to turn his Forces upon the Christians, and by his Lieutenant Bail-bey Santzack of Silivria, invaded the Countries of Podolia and Russia, being part of the Kingdom, where the Turks did great harm, and carried away many Prisoners. But coming again the second time, and making such like spoil as before, they stayed so long, that the cold of Winter (which in those Countries is very extreme) was now come on; and in their return as they were about to have passed through Madavia, they were by Stephanus Prince of that Country, denied both passage and victuals, and forced to take the way along the River toward the west, where many of them starved from their Army, by the way cut off and slain by the Moldavians; and the rest, what by the extremity of the cold, what for want of food, and foulness of the way, perished, so that of that great Army very few returned home. The Turks Historians report, that in this expedition were lost forty thousand Turks.

He sent also Cadumet one of his Baskies into Illyria, who spoiling that Country, with a part of Croatia, was encountered by nine thousand Croatians and Hungarians near unto the River Morava, under the leading of Count Bernard Francopans, where after a cruel and bloody Fight, the Christians were put to the sword, and above seven thousand of them slain; the rest saved themselves by flight through the Mountains and Woods. Of the Christians that were lost, many were drowned in Morava, chusing rather to end their days, than to fall into the hands of their cruel Enemies. This overthrow was imputed to the Croatians, who would needs give the Turks Battle in plain Field, although he was earnestly entreated by Count T. Torquatus to have kept the Straits of that Country, whereby he might have had great advantage of the Enemy. Torquatus himself had lost all his Horsemen in that Battle, and his Horse killed under him, fought valiantly on foot, until he was by the multitude of his Enemies oppressed and slain. The Baskia gave Bajazet a true testimony of the Victory, caused all the Notes of the slain Christians to be cut off and put upon strings, and so by Wagon sent them as a barbarous Present to Constantinople. After the death of Charles the French King, Lewis the Twelfth of that Kingdom having obtained that Kingdom, wrote himself also Duke of Milan, as descended of one of the Daughters of Jo. Galeasius first Duke of Milan; in which his supposed right he was fully resolved to make War upon Sforzia then Duke of Milan. And for his better success in those Wars, fought by all means he could, to draw some of the Princes and States of Italy into the Fellowship of that intended War; but above all others the Venetians, as most commodious for his purpose; with whom he made a firm League, and for the aid they were to give him, covenanted that they should have their share of the City of Cremona, with all the pleasant Country about Adria, then part of Sforzia his Dominion; which was afterwards accordingly performed.

Sforzia understanding of this compact made against him, and knowing himself far too weak of himself to stand against so puissant Enemies; attempted first to get Maximilian the Emperor, with the States of Germany, upon the French King. But that not forcing to his desire, he sought to agree with the King, by offering to hold his Dukedom of Milan, by paying him a yearly Tribute. After he had thus in vain proved all the means he could devise, to have appeased the French King, and provided for his own safety; he by his Embassadors sent of purpose, certified Bajazet of the confederation betwixt the French King and the Venetians, and that their purpose was after they had oppressed him, and some other of the States of Italy, then with their united Forces to invade his Dominions; and that therefore it were good for him in time to look unto it, and to give aid against those which would in short time become his most dangerous Enemies. By this means the Duke was in good hope, so to baffle the Venetians by bringing the Turk upon them, as that they should stand the French in small stead. At which time also the Embassadors of Florence did what they could to persuade the Turk to make Wars upon the Venetians; for the malice they bare against them for proceeding them of Pisa against the oppression of the Florentines.

Bajazet persuaded by the Embassadors, and calling to remembrance the injuries before done him by the Venetians; first by giving aid to John Capris the Son of Sunderghy, and John Chrenich another Prince of Epirus (whereby he lost a great part of that Country, and was also further enforced to yield to such conditions as altogether stood not with his honour) and again by denying to give his Fleet leave to put into their harbours of Cyprus, in the time of his Wars against the Sultan of Egypt, all which he was glad then to endure, for fear lest that his Brother Zemas (then living) should by their means be set up against him; promised now to do what the Embassadors had requested; glad in his mind that the discord of the Christian Princes had presented unto him to fit an opportunity of Revenge. Hereupon he made great preparation both by Sea and Land against the Venetians, and upon the sudden called Scander Basha his Lieutenant in Illyria, with twelve thousand Horse to break into the Country of Friuli, part of the Venetian Territory upon the frontiers of Italy. The Basha as he had had in charge, passing over divers great Rivers, at length entered the Country, burning and destroying all before him as far as Liquentia, carrying away with him all the poor Country People Prisoners. But when he was come to the Banks of Tilaventum, and understood that he came too late to please the Duke of Milan (for why, the French with the Venetians had before without resistance driven him quite out of Italy and Germany) he there, with more than barbarous cruelty put four thousand poor Prisoners to the Sword; and so having filled the Country with mourning and with blood, returned from whence he came, loaded with spoil of that rich Country.

Friuli part of the Venetian Territory bordering on the Turks

At the same time also, Bajazet put to Sea such a Fleet as none of his predecessors had before set forth; and with a great Army in person himself marched along the Sea Coast of Morea, in such fort, as that his Army by Land, and his Fleet at Sea, as near as they could, kept even pace the one with the flight of the other. Neither were the Venetians unmindful of themselves, but set forth a strong Fleet under the charge of Anthony Grimani their Admiral; in number far inferior to the Turks, but for Equipage, Strength, skillful Mariners, and all other manner of warlike provision, much superior. For which cause the Turks, although defeated and braved by the Venetians, yet durst not at the first join with them in battle, but still kept along the coast of Morea, not daring to put further off into the Sea. In this their course the Venetians troubled them exceedingly, sometimes making less as if they would have constrained them to fight, and otherwhiles giving them chase, never departing far from them, yet by accounting it in the good service, if they could but keep that huge Fleet from landing in Italy, or other place of the Venetian Territory. Most men were in good hope, that if those great Fleets should have joined in battle, the Venetians should have had a notable Victory; for that the Enemy as afraid kept so dangerous a course, and so near the main. The longer they thus failed, the more was the State of Venice offended with their Admiral, that he contrary to all expectation, delayed to fight, and still suffered the dangerous Enemy to approach nearer and nearer their Territories; and there were none which had not rather he should have set all upon the hazard of one battle, than to protract by delay a long and doubtful War. Whilst all mens minds were thus in expectation of some great exploit to be done upon the Enemy, news came to the City, that the Turks Fleet had put into the Haven Sapientia in the Island Sphragia, to water, and was there embayed by the Venetians. This news was of more than joy to the City, as if the Victory had been already assured; and so much the more, for that it was vainly supposed, that it would be gained without any great loss. But others which better knew the place, deemed of the matter far otherwhise, saying, That the place wherein the Enemy lay was deep, as that the Venetians attending at his pleasure depart thence. Yet forasmuch as the Turks Fleet was more subject unto danger in putting out of the Harbor, than in the wide Sea, there was no man but was of opinion, That the Venetian Admiral would set upon them as they should come forth again. Whilst men were thus dividing too and fro, and the Venetians attending at his pleasure forth of the Enemies Fleet, it returned that Andreas Laurdanus and Albanus Armerius (two valiant Gentlemen) but a little before come from Coccyra, of purpose to be present at the battle, were the first that began the fight; and with their two nimble Ships (after they had changed a few Bullets) boarded a tall Ship of the Turks, being of such beauty and burthen, that the seemed rather a Castle than a Ship, whereof one Baruch of Smyrna (a notable Pirate) was Captain; who after a long and cruel Fight, perceiving that he must either yield, or by force be taken, desperately set fire on his own Ship, by the rage whereof both he and the Venetian Ships felt grappled unto her, were all three together burnt down to the Water. Many of the Men (to shun the violence of the Fire) leapt over board into the Sea, where some of them were taken up by the other Ships, and some perished. Some few other of the Venetian Fleet courageously assailed the Turks, and the winning out, and doing great harm; put the Turks whole Fleet in no small fear. But the most part of the Venetian Gallies lay looking on a far off, unto whom the other before in fight with the Turks, after they had done what they could, retired aloft. But by that they had done, it appeared plainly, that the Venetian Admiral that day let slip out of his hands a most notable Victory, if he as a resolute Man had with his whole Fleet charged the Enemy.

After this Fight the Turks held on their course, still keeping Morea on the right hand, whom the Venetians still followed; at length the Turks Fleet was come to the entrance of the Gulf of Pateza, where the Venetians again faintly setting upon them, suffered them to recover the Gulf; with no less dishonour than they had before let them escape at the Port Sapientia: for the Venetians having the advantage of the place, and better opportunity of fight, might easily (as it was supposed) have gained the Victory, if the Commanders (but especially the Admiral) had been so forward in the service as became Men of their place. But many of them afraid to Fight lay aloft, so that Dauter the Turks Admiral (who perceiving himself too weak, had purposed to run his Gallies to shore, and so to have fled to the Army at Land, if he had felt himself overcharged by the Venetian Fleet) was now contrary to his expectation recovered the Gulf he desired, though not without loss of some of his Gallies. Within this Gulf lieth the ancient City of Naupactus (now called Lepanto); then subject to the Venetians, whether Bajazet was then come by Land with his Army; and now by the coming of his Fleet into the Gulf, laid hard Siege unto the City both by Sea and Land. They of the City seeing themselves on every side beset with their Enemies, without any great resistance left to composition with Bajazet, and so yielded up to him the City, which the Turks held at this day.

Grimani the Venetian Admiral returning to Venice, was for all his evil service (or rather for that he, according to his mild nature, had not used severity against such Captains as refused to Fight) cast into Prison; and forasmuch as there was a Man mightily befriended, yet was he by a publick Decree Banished into one of the Abissides, Islands upon the Coast of Liburnia. From the first foundation of the City of Venice was never Man impugned with more spite, or defended by greater friends; but common hatred prevailing, he was nevertheless exiled; Bajazet having made a Republick of the Venetian Territory by Scander Basha, and taken from them the City of Naupactus, with the Country thereabout, returned with Victory to Constantinople.

The next year following, which was the year 1500, Bajazet put to Sea a greater and stronger Fleet

Lepanto yielded to the Turks.

Methone besieged both by Sea and Land by Bajazet.

Methone taken by the Turks.

Corone, Pilos, and Critium yielded to the Turks.

Fleet than he had the year before; and himself in person with a puissant Army of an hundred and fifty thousand men entered by the Strait of Corinth into Peloponnesus, and marching through the Country, came and incamped before the strong City of Methone (now called Modon) then under the Government of the Venetians; at which time his great Fleet met him there aloft by Sea, as he had before appointed. When he thus had beset the City both by Sea and Land, and with long and continual battery made three great and fair breaches in the Walls, he gave unto the same two terrible Assaults, and that with such desperate fury, that many of them which were first unto the breach, overthrowen by the press of them which followed, were trodden to death. Yet nevertheless the City was both times valiantly defended by the Citizens and Garriſon Soldiers; so that when he had done what he could, he was glad to retire from the Walls, having filled the Town-Ditches with the Bodies of his slain Turks. The Venetian Admiral Trivisanus lying at the Isle of Zacynthus (but far too weak to fight with the Enemy) in the beginning of the Siege sent Valerius Marcellus and Baptista Polanus, with two Gallies full of Men and Munition in relief of the besieged; and now doubting their further wants, sent Jo. Marquis, Alex. Catius of Coccyra, and Casius of Hydruntum, with three other great Gallies, with Men, Munition, and such other things as he thought needful for the defence of the City. These three resolute Captains coming with a full wind, and packing close to the Walls, broke through the Turks Fleet lying in their way, and then themselves aground under the Walls of the Town; for they of the Town had so barred the Haven for fear of the Enemy, that they could not at that way possibly get in. The Citizens and Soldiers joyful of the coming of this fresh Supply feared without delay that the Gallies should be set off again from them by the Enemy, came running by heaps from all parts of the City towards the Sea, to receive this new come Aid; which was done with such confused disorder, that divers places of the City towards the Land were left without Defendants, as if there had been no Enemy near. Which the Janizaries quickly perceiving, presently entered by those forsaken places with little or no resistance. Then the Citizens all too late began to make head; for the Janizaries already entered made way for the rest of the Army; which swarming into the City, slew without pity all that came in the way, as well Greeks as Venetians, with all the Soldiers, but even then newly landed out of the three Gallies. In this slaughter, Antonius Fabius and Bardella (Governors of the Town) with Andreas Falco Bishop of Methone, in his Pontificalibus and his Myre on his head, were slain; none escaped their fury, but such as were for their strength reared up on the Walls, and shot down by the Victors lust; and of these a thousand bodies fast together in long Ropes, were brought to Bajazet's Pavilion, and there in his sight by his commandment cruelly murdered. The Cities of Corone and Pilos (now called Navarrinum) sometime the dwelling place of old Nestor, terrified with the taking of Amyclae, yielded themselves by composition to Bajazet. This City of Critium, now known by the name of Capri S. Galli, was taken also by Chegeles, Bajazet's Son in law. All these were Cities belonging to the Venetians. Naupactus was also besieged by Haly Basha, but yet still defended by the Venetians. Bajazet having now fortified the City of Methone, and stored it with new Inhabitants, left in it a strong Gar-riſon, and so with Victory returned to Constantinople. At this time Trivisanus the Venetian Admiral died of grief of mind, as some supposed; in whose place the Senate sent Benedictus Pifaurius, a noble and valiant Gentleman, who with the Venetian Fleet followed the Enemy, then departing from the Siege of Naupactus, pursuing them even unto the Straits of Helleſpontus, till cutting off such as straggled or tarried behind the rest of the Fleet; by which means he took above twenty of their Gallies, and in his return took from the Turks the Island of Aegina, and landing in divers places of the Turks Dominions, left unto them the awful remembrance of his being there. Afterwards meeting with Gonſalvus, firamed the Great (sent by Ferdinand King of Spain, to aid him against the Turks) at Zacynthus, he invaded Cephalonia (which Trivisanus his Predecessor had in vain attempted the year before) and laid hard Siege to the City; which was at length bravely defended by the Turks, yet at length by the good conduct of Gonſalvus it was by force taken, when as Giflare the Governor thereof, with his Garriſon of Turks had before fought it out even to the last man. The City being taken, all the whole Island yielded forthwith to the Venetians. Pifaurius having taken Cephalonia, repaired the City, and leaving a strong Garriſon for defence of the Isle, departed to Coccyra; where he was advertised, that the Turks were rigging forth a great Fleet against the next Spring, whereof the first part lay in the Bay of Ambraſia, not far from Coccyra; some of the rest within the Straits of Helleſpontus. Wherefore purposing to do some exploit upon those Gallies which lay in the Bay of Ambraſia, to avert the mind of the Enemy from perceiving of that he had secretly with himself intended, he sent the greatest part of his Fleet unto the Island of Nerius, who suddenly landing thence, put the Inhabitants in fear. The Captains first about the business, cheerfully put in execution what the Admiral had commanded, and by their sudden landing raised such a tumult, that all the Countries thereabout were filled with the expectation of that which should ensue thereof. The Bay of Ambraſia is so fringed on either side with the Mountains of Epirus, that the entrance thereof is but half a mile over; but by and by opening it fell into a great wideſs, and running up into the Land, maketh a most pleasant and safe Harbour for Ships and Gallies to ride in. Pifaurius with a fair Wind coming thither with eight Gallies well appointed, when the Turks thought him to have been at Nerius, and entering the Strait, rowing farther into the Bay, burnt one of the Turks great Gallies, to the terror of all them that dwell round about the Bay, and carried with him eleven more, laden with Munition and Victual, through the Strait; the Turks in vain fearing thereof, and doing what they could with their great Ordnance from Shore to have sunk him going out of the Bay. But having done what he came for, he returned with his Prey again to Coccyra. Not long after he also recovered the Castle of Pilos in Morea; which, as it was suddenly gotten, so it was as suddenly lost; for Jo. Cambray, a notable Pirate of the Turks, who had been abroad seeking after purchase, putting into that Harbor by chance, took three Gallies thence, left by the Admiral for defence of the place, and so terrified the faint-hearted Captain, that he fell to composition with the Pirate, to yield him the Castle, so that he and his Soldiers might in safety depart; which the Pirate granting, had the Cattle delivered unto him, which he could not wish far greater strength have possibly won. So was Pylos for fear twice in one year yielded up unto the Turks; and was both times the death of the cowardly Captains which gave it up, being both beheaded by the commandment of the Admiral. About the same time, Pifaurius attempted to have burnt the other of the Turkish Gallies lying in the River Euxine, upon the coast of Macedonia; but not with good success as before; for the Turks, made more careful by the loss they had but a little before received at Ambracia, did now more vigilantly look unto their Gallies; so that when Pifaurius had in certain small Vessels, made of purpose for that service, embarked two hundred resolute Soldiers to have gone up the River to have fired the Gallies, they were by the way after they had entered a good way into the River, encountered by the Turks, and enforced to return. But before they could get out of the River, the wind rose so contrary, with such a stiff gale fall in the mouth of the River, that the Mariners overmastered with the violence of the Weather, when they had done what they could, and spent all their strength, were driven ashore, some on one side of the River, and some on the other, and so fell into the hands of their Enemies, of whom it booted not to crave mercy.

About this time Bajazet took also the ancient and famous City of Dyrachium, now called Durazzo, from the Venetians; before ruinous, and almost quite abandoned by the Inhabitants, as a place of danger, and not to be kept now that the Turk had got the Country round about it. The Venetians fore professed with these Wars so long maintained against the Turk, had many times prayed Aid of other Christian Princes, and were well helped by the Spaniards in the taking of Cephalonia; and now Lewis the French King, upon a good devotion to that War, sent the Lord Roxefin with seven tall Ships and fifteen Gallies well appointed out of Provence and Genoa, to aid the Venetians his Friends. This Fleet departing from Naples, where they had by the way put in, and passing about Italy, and so through the Ionian Sea, came to Melos one of the Cyclades; at which Island Pifaurius with his Fleet in short time arrived also; from whence they by mutual consent departed together to invade the Island of Leibos; and being there safely arrived, landed their Forces, and laid siege to the strong City of Mytilene, where by the fury of their Artillery they in short time had made a fair breach in the Wall. In the time of this battery, whilst the breach was in making, Pifaurius with part of his Fleet failed to Tenedos; for it was reported, that certain of the Turks Gallies were then coming for that place out of Hellepontus. Which report, as some write, was of purpose given out by the French, thereby to draw the Venetian Admiral from the Siege, that so in the mean time they being in good hope to take the Town in his absence, might themselves carry away the honour thereof, together with the rich spoil. Others favouring the French, blame the Venetian Admiral, as if he had of purpose departed, envying at the honour of the French. Which is hardly to be believed in so honourable a Personage, and in an action so much concerning the good of his Common-Weal. Howsoever it was, the breach being made, in his absence was by the French presently assaulted; although that Valentius the Venetian Vice-Admiral, earnestly requested the French Admiral to defer the Assault for a while; and to expect the return of Pifaurius. Which his Counsel the French Admiral gave him the hearing of, but yet went forward with the Assault. The Frenchmen after their manner furiously assailing the breach, were valiantly repulsed by the Turks; so that in the breach was made a deadly and most terrible Fight, many falling on both sides. Yet for all that, the City was manfully defended by the Turks, and the French men were enforced to retire. The French Admiral having taken this repulse, commanded all things to be carried aboard, purposing to have forsaken the Siege, and so to have departed; when in the mean time the Venetian Admiral returned, and with much ado persuaded the French to stay. Whereupon the battery was begun with much greater fury than before, and now the Leaders were confounding of a fresh Assault to be given, when suddenly news was brought, That the Turks Fleet was coming to relieve the City; and thereupon the Assault was for a time deferred and the battery continued. But those Turks which came, being in number but few, were for the most part by them in the Gallies taken and cast over board; some few that got to Land, saved themselves in the Woods and desert places of the Isle. By this time the City was again made assailable, and the Venetians with great Courage assailed the breach, and had twice gained the top of the Rampiers, from whence they were again both times beaten down by the Turks, the French all the while looking on. Many valiant men were there slain and hurt, and in the end the Venetians were glad with loss to retire, as had the French done before. Whilst this was in doing, a Pinace came to the Fleet with news, That the Great Master of the Rhodes was coming with his Gallies, to the Siege; whereupon the Admirals determined to maintain the Siege until his coming. But the next day after, the French Admiral changing his purpose, shipped his men, and hofing fail departed to Chios; and falling thence towards Italy, was overtaken with a most terrible Tempest, wherein the Admiral Gally with two others were lost, with eight hundred good Soldiers, the Admiral himself with above forty others were by chance contrary to all hope saved, and with much danger with his Weather-beaten Fleet recovered the Haven of Larentum. The Venetian Admiral thus forsaken of the French, and seeing the time past wherein he expected the coming of the Great Master of the Rhodes, brake up the Siege and departed from Leibos to Chios, and from thence to Paros, where he found the Master of the Rhodes with his Gallies; unto whom he complained greatly of the inconstancy of the French, imputing it unto them, that the City of Mytilene was not won. Neither were they behind with him, but in every place where they came, laid the fault as much or more upon him. From Paros the Venetian Admiral took his course to the Island of Melos, where he found one Richius an Arch Pyrat of the Turks, who by force of Tempelt was driven on Shore, and by the sudden coming down of the Island people, taken him (for that he had exercised exceeding Cruelty upon certain Christians that he had taken) Pifaurius caused to be fast bound to a Spit, and with a small fire to be roasted to death. From Melos he returned to Cyprus, and there wintered. The next Spring Pifaurius with certain Gallies which Alexander Bishop of Rome had sent unto him, under the command of Jacobus Pifaurius Bishop of Paphia, failed to Netis, now called S. Maura, which is an Island parted from the firm Land with a little fret of the Sea, long time before that way led in by the Corinthians. Here Pifaurius suddenly landing his men, surprised the Island, and with wonderful celerity and industry cast up two great Trenches, in such sort, and to so good purpose, that the three hundred of the Turks Horfemen coming at a low water over that narrow Strait which parteth the Island from the Main, were with loss repulsed and forced to retire. Whereupon S. Maura the chief City was forthwith delivered unto Pifaurius, with the rest of the Island.

The Venetians weary of this long and chargeable War against so mighty an Enemy, sent Lodovico Mantius their Embassador to Bajazet, to treat with him for Peace; but Bajazet stood upon such hard points, that nothing could at that time be concluded. Yet Mantius so discreetly used the matter, that Bajazet sent him at his return to Venice, his Embassador, to propound unto the Senate such Conditions as it pleased him to grant them Peace upon. This Embassador had audience in the Senate twice, where he in the name of his Master propounded such proud and unreasonable Conditions, that they were by the Senate rejected, and so he himself dismissed and sent back again.

The year following, the Venetians sent an Embassador to Bajazet, who moved with the pitiful complaints of his own Subjects, for the daily harms they received from the Venetians along the Sea Coast, as also for want of Trade; and fearing also some troubles like to arise in his Kingdom in Asia (as he had thereof heard) yielded himself more willingly to hear Peace, than before. This Embassador called Zacharias Pbricius, was well heard of Bajazet, and after long suit had brought the matter he came for unto some good terms: and being honourably rewarded by the Turkish Emperor, returned home, carrying with him unto the Senate far more reasonable Conditions of Peace than had at any former time before been by Bajazet propounded. Hereupon the Venetians shortly after sent Andreas Gritti (an honourable Senator) a man well known to Bajazet both for his famous traffique in former time at Constantinople, and also for that in these late Wars he was taken Prisoner at the winning of Methone, and his life spared at the intercession of Chefoglies (Bajazet his Son-in-Law) and afterward ransomed; he in the name of the State from whence he came, concluded a Peace with Bajazet. The Capitulations thereof were, first, That the Venetians should deliver up the Islands of Netis and Leucadia, referring unto themselves the Island of Cephalonia only. Then, That Bajazet should restore all such Goods as had been taken from the Venetian Merchants, in these late Wars; And that it should be lawful for them (as they were wont) freely to traffique into the Euxine Sea, and to Constantinople; and that they have their Consul or Governor as they had had in former time; And last of all, That the Venetian Territory should be certainly known, and separated from the Turks by certain Bounds and Limits. These Conditions were solemnly agreed upon, and confirmed both by Bajazet and the State of Venice; and so a firm Peace concluded in the year 1503, after the Wars had continued betwixt them about the space of five years.

The same year Bajazet assembled a great and puissant Army of his best and most approved Soldiers, as well in Asia as Europe, which met together at Constantinople, and there wintered, to have invaded Hungary; but worthily considering the success of that War against so warlike a Nation, he changed his purpose, and leaving Archmetes Bajla with his Asian Soldiers at Sophia, turned himself with the rest of his Army into Albania (to reduce thence the rebellious People again to his obedience) and had before sent his Fleet of Gallies to stop the passages of that Country

alongst the Sea Coast. But the Country People understanding of his coming, fled into the high and rough Rocks and Mountains, from whence they did the Turks great harm; who nevertheless with incredible labour and adventure, mounted those difficult places; and killing an exceeding number of those mountain and savage People, carried all the Women and Children they could light upon, away with them Prisoners; and with Fire and Sword made all the Country desolate. After which Spoil done, Bajazet returned with his Army to Manisium; and departing thence, upon the way met with a Dervish (which is a phantastical and beggarly kind of Turkish Monks, using no other Apparel but two Sheep-Skins, the one hanging before and the other behind) a lusty young fat Fellow, attired after the manner of his order, with a great Ring in each Ear; who drawing near unto Bajazet, as if he would of him have received an Alms, desperately assailed him with a short Scimitar which he had closely conveyed under his hypocritical habit. But Bajazet by the starting of the Horse whereon he rid (being afraid at the sudden approach of the Hobgoblin) partly avoided the deadly blow by the Traitor intended, yet not altogether un wounded; neither had he so escaped the danger, had not Isander Bajla (one of his Horfemen) come presently thence down the desperate Villain to hear what he was about to have doubled his stroke; but being thus struck down, he was forthwith rent in pieces by the soldiers. This treacherous and desperate fact so much moved Bajazet, that he prohibited all them of that superstitious Order, and banished them out of his Empire.

After so many troubles, Bajazet gave himself unto a quiet course of life, spending most part of his time in study of Philosophy, and conference with learned men; unto which peaceable kind of life, he was of his own natural disposition more inclined than to Wars; albeit that the regard of his State, and the earnest desire of his Men of War, drew him oftentimes even against his Will into the Field. As for the Civil Government of his Kingdom, he referred it wholly unto his three principal Bishops, Alia, Archmetes and Jachia, who at their pleasure disposed of all things. After he had in this quiet and pleasing kind of life to his great contentment passed over five years, of a little neglected Spark suddenly arose such a Fire in Asia, as was hardly after with much blood of his People and danger of that part of his Empire quenched; the reliques whereof yet trouble those superstitious People at this day. Which thing was brought to pass by the crafty device of Cadmus Chelife, and Schach Cali his Boy (whom some call Tekeli Sachak), and others Tekelins two Hypocritical Perfians; who flying into those Countries, and with the counterfeit shew of feigned Holiness having procured to themselves a great name amongst those rude People, with a number of windy headed Followers (filled with the novelty of their new Doctrine) raised first such a diversity of opinions about the true successors of their untrue Prophet, and afterwards such a Rebellion amongst the People, as that the one yet remained, and the other was not in a good while after without great bloodshed, appeared.

But for the better understanding of the ground of these troubles, which happened at this time in the Reign of Bajazet by occasion of these two fugitive Perfians; as also for the mortal Wars which afterwards ensued betwixt His Majesty (as he was called the Great Sophi of Persia) and Selim, Bajazet his Successor, it shall not be much from our purpose briefly to declare the great mutation which at this time happened to the Perfian Kingdom, as well in the State itself, as in Matters of their Superstition. At such time as A-symbius Ufun-Callanes reigned in Perfia, there was one Haider Erdebil (whom Jovius calleth by the name of Hardules) a man honourably descended amongst the Perfians, who concerning worldly Honour, Riches, Pleasure, and whatsoever else belonged unto delicacy of life (commonly accounted the greatest part of Human Felicity) as meer Vanities and Trifles, led such a straight and austere kind of life, with such continency and contempt of the World, as that the vulgar People, for most part which they could, wondering at that in him which they could not or would not imitate, began to have the man in singular admiration for the opinion they had conceived of his upright Life and Vertues. The fame of this new Prophet (for so he was accounted) was grown so great in the Perfian Kingdom, that People without number resorted out of all parts of Perfia and Armenia unto the great City of Tauris to see the man. And he the more to seduce the Multitude (delighted with Novelties) began to inveigh against the common received opinion of the Mahometans, concerning the true Successors of their great Prophet, and to revive the opinion of the famous Sopis, perwading the People (as if he had been inspired with some divine Inspiration) That none of the Professors of the Mahometan Religion should inherit the Kingdom of Heaven after they were dead, but such as were the Followers of Haider, the true Successor of the great Prophet Mahomet, and his Followers in living; whom he taught them only to honour as privy to the mind of the great Prophet, and to receive his Writings as of all others most authenticall; rejecting Eubekir, Omer, and Osman, with their Writings, as most wicked and accursed men; whom the Turks had ever, and yet do with the other Mahometans, honour and worship as the true successors of their great Prophet Mahomet, and his sincere Interpreters, together with the aforefaid Haider, whom the Perfians do only acknowledge, and therefore in their Prayers do commonly say, Cursed be Eubekir, Omer, and Osman, and God be favourable to Haider, and well pleased with him. Which their difference about the true Successor of their Prophet, in whom was no truth, hath been, and yet is, one of the greatest causes of the mortal Wars between the Turks and Perfians; and not the divers interpretation of their Law (as many have written) which amongst the Turks and Perfians is all one.

Bajazet in danger to have been slain by a Dervish or Turkish Monk.

Bajazet by nature peaceable.

Ufun-Callanes moved with the Fame and Vertues of this new Prophet, or rather (as some thought) desirous to win the Hearts of the Multitude of them that had received this new philosophy, gave him in marriage his Daughter Martha, begotten of the Christian Lady Defpina the Daughter of Calo Vassan, the Emperor of Armenia. With this marriage the Christian Emperor made with the Mahometan Prince, and he also accepted thereof, thereby to strengthen themselves against the Turkish Emperor Mahomet the Great; whose power was then become a terror unto all his neighbour Princes, but to how small purpose this policy proved both, is before declared. With this marriage the Christian Emperor made with the Mahometan Prince, and he also accepted thereof, thereby to strengthen themselves against the Turkish Emperor Mahomet the Great; whose power was then become a terror unto all his neighbour Princes, but to how small purpose this policy proved both, is before declared. At the conclusion of this marriage, the Emperor had especially covenanted with Ufun-Callanes, that his Daughter Defpina might have the free exercise of the Christian Religion. Whereby it came to pass, that this Martha her Daughter, instructed by her Mother, became a Christian also, and now married by her Father unto this precise Hy-poctite Haider Erdebil, in short time bare him a Son called Hyfmael, whom the so much as the could trained up in the Principles of the Christian Religion. Whereby it came to pass, that afterwards when he had by rare fortune obtained the Kingdom of Perfia, he always during his life had the Christians in good regard, and never found fault with their Religion.

Haider thus graced with the marriage of the great Kings Daughter Martha, only for his rare Vertues and Purity of Life, as was commonly supposed, grew now into far greater Credit and Estimation of the People than before. So that his doctrine and opinions began to be generally received, and the number of his Followers to greatly augmented, that Jacup succeeding his Father Ufun-Callanes but lately dead, began to have the Power and Credit of Haider his Brother in law in suspect; and to distrust left the Perfians (who fiercely favour the remainder of the Posterity of their ancient Kings) should assemble together under the colour of this new Superstition, and raise some dangerous Rebellion before he were well fed in his Seat. For he was not ignorant, that Alfembius (Ufun-Callanes his Father) had but by Force and Policy usurped the Kingdom, having killed Mahomet the lawful King; whereof there arose two Factions, some favouring the Usurper, and other some the poor remainder of the descent of their ancient Kings of the race of Tamerslan. For which causes Jacup (as he was of a suspicious and troublesome Nature, and above measure jealous of his State) nothing regarding the near Alliance or relationship (suspecting no such matter) to be fiercely murdered; and to having struck off his Head, with Haider Erdebil Fire and Sword persecuted all the Professors of that new Doctrine; so to deliver himself for ever of that his vain and needless Fear, called the Son of Haider (who was afterwards called the great Sopis of Perfia) being then but a Child, as it were by fatal Destiny elcaped the Fury of his cruel Uncle Jacup, and fled into Hyrcania, unto one Pyrcheles his Fathers Friend, who then ruled in a small Territory near unto the Caspian Sea.

Amongst many others of the Disciples and Followers of Haider (which in that cruel Persecution were glad to flee for safeguard of their lives) the two before named, Chafan Shelif, and Schach Cali, afterwards surnamed Cufilbas, in outward shew both of Vertue and Learning not inferior unto their Master, flying that dangerous Tempest, and passing over the River Euphrates, came into Armenia the lesser, and there took up their dwelling at the great Mountain Avitauran; at the foot whereof the broken Rocks have divers dark and obscure Caves; made partly by Art, and partly by Nature; which place is of the Inhabitants called Tekel-Is; whereof divers Historiographers, I know not how, have received by the name of the place, or else wittingly transferring the name of the place unto the man that lived therein, have called this Schach Cali (who of the two proved of greater fame) by the name of Tekellis, by which name we will also from henceforth call him. A thing therefore much used amongst the religious, and also some of the Children of great Princes, who oftentimes bare the names of the places where they were born, or where they most lived. This place is both wholesome and exceeding pleasant, for the variety of Fruits and lively Springs, wherewith the Plains adjoining are continually watered, and the Mountains at all times of the year gar-

having separated themselves far from the Company of men, and given themselves wholly to a contemplative life, for divers years lived most frugally and austere, converting themselves with such things as the Earth of it self afforded them, without seeking for better. These Hypocrites were first seen, and afterwards acquainted with the Shepherds and Herdsmen living upon the Mountains; and in process of time with the rude Husbandmen and Country People, who wondering at their frugal and devout kind of life, resorted them with all things necessary. Bajazet himself hearing of their austere and devout manner of living, then yearly six or seven thousand Alpers, as his Alms given them upon Charity and Devotion. But afterwards when they began to tell Fortunes, and as it were by the way of tradition to propitiate of things to come, the Rural People held them for more than men, and conceived of them a firm opinion, that they were some divine Prophets. And so were by the Country People first drawn into the Country Villages, and afterwards, as if it had been against their Wills, into the Cities; where they had in short time filled all the Country far and near, with the admiration of their fame; But after they began to publish their new plantated Doctrine concerning the true successor of their great Prophet Mahomet, they wanted not their new angled followers (as had Haider their Master before amongst the Perfians) who had them in singular Reverence, perwaded now by them, that they should be condemned for ever, if they did not (as they were by them taught) give the honour of the true succession of their great Prophet, only to Haider, and him only to reverence and call upon next unto the great Prophet himself.

When they had thus with their often Sermons and blinded Prophecies seduced the People, and in short time won great Credit amongst the vulgar sort, of themselves too much given to Novelty and Superstition; they commanded their Disciples and Followers to wear upon their Turkish Hats a red Band or Ribband, whereby to be known from others that were not of their profession. Of which red Bands or Ribbands, they which professed this new Superstition, were, and yet are over all the East part of the World called by the name of Cufelassers, which is to say, Red Heads.

Hyfmael also living in exile, most earnestly embraced that new Superstition, which Haider his Father had before taught in Perfia, but with a better Fortune and Success. For as soon as he was grown to mans Estate, he following his Fathers manner of life, and being by nature wonderful eloquent, comely of person, exceeding wife, and of an invincible Courage, was of the rude vulgar People accounted of more like a god than a man; so that he grew to be of greater esteem and power amongst those barbarous People with whom he lived. And not the base and vulgar sort only, but divers Noblemen also, and others of good reputation, once allured with the Novelty of his Doctrine, the more to manifest their good Will towards the Author of their sect; after they had forsaken their old Superstition, ceased not (as the manner of men is) to commend him in the highest degree of Vertue and Honour. And he himself as yet but a youth, altogether bending his Wit to the setting forth of himself, making semblance of more than was indeed in him, obtained, as if it had been against his Will, Riches, Honour, Fame, and Authority; of all which things, he as a notable dissembler seemed to make no account or reckoning; neither were there some wanting which would faine, that Haider his Father (as he was an excellent Astronomer) calculating his Nativity, should say, That he should prove a great Prophet, and the Author of the true Religion, who fubduing the greatest part of the East, should become as glorious both in matters of Religion and Martial Affairs, as was Mahomet the Great Prophet himself. Which report being bruited abroad amongst the vulgar People, greatly increased his Authority, and gave them occasion to talk of wonders. Not long after, Hyfmael was first by the admiration, or rather affection of his Friends and Followers, and afterwards as if it had been of a general consent, surnamed Sopis, which amongst the People signifieth a wife man, or the Interpreter of the gods. These prosperous beginnings, with the troubled State of the Perfian Kingdom, encouraged him to take in hand great matters; for his Uncle Jacup the Perfian King was long before dead, being together with his Son poisoned by his adulterous Wife; which thing he presently receiving, enforced her to drink of the lime Cup; and because he would be sure that she should not escape, with his own hand struck off her Head, and immediately after died, with his Son. After whose Death great Troubles arose about the Succession; and divers great men, one after another aspired to the Kingdom, which they enjoyed not long. And amongst the rest El-van-Beg (whom Jovius calleth Alvantes) at that time stood in no great possession of the Kingdom, being mightily impugned by his Brother Mahomet.

Hyfmael taking hold of this opportunity, armed divers of the most able men of his Followers, and receiving some small Aid from his poor old Friend Pyrcheles, entered into Armenia, and there partly by the Fame that ran of him, and partly by the good Will of the People, rather than by any force, recovered his Fathers Inheritance, whereunto the remembrance of his dead Father did not a little further him. He encouraged with this good beginning, daily grew stronger and stronger, by the continual repairing unto him of such as having once received the Doctrine of Haider, were glad of long (for fear of Persecution) to dissemble the same; but now having got an Head and Chieftain to cleave unto, began openly to shew themselves again, and in great number to resort unto him, in hope of the good success of their Religion, not so happily begun by his Father.

His power thus daily increasing beyond his expectation, he laid Siege unto Samachia, a City in the Confines of Media, which he took by force and sacked; and with the Spoil thereof both enriched and armed his Soldiers, which before were for most part naked men. The taking of this City wonderfully increased both his Fame and Courage, as oftentimes it falleth out, That haughty minds, conceivably attempting high exploits, by the good event of the first attempt, make way unto the full of their flatly desire. So after this, Hyfmael's thoughts were not so low, as to think of the taking of this or that little City; but how he might now compass the great City of Tauris, the very Seat of the Perfian Kings, and afterwards the Kingdom it self. Whereupon redoubling his confidence in his own good Fortune, than the Valour of his Soldiers, he marched with his Army directly to the City of Tauris, and that with such expedition, that he was come before it before any such thing was feared, much less provided for. Elvan the Perfian King was then at Tauris, and had but a little before fought a great Battel with his Brother Mahomet the

the Kingdom; and having vanquished him, drove him out of Armenia and Persia; and afterwards, as it commonly falleth out in the winding up of Civil Wars, had caused divers of the chief Citizens of Tauris, which had taken part with his Brother against him, to be severely executed, filling the Eyes of their Friends with the horrible spectacle of their dismembered Bodies, and the Hearts of most men with sorrow and heaviness; whereby he had so alienated the minds of the Citizens from him, that now upon the approach of Hyfmael, they were all ready to forsake him; of which disposition Hyfmael was before-hand, filling the Eyes of the good Men thereof had hastied his coming. Elvan the Persian King thus overtaken on the sudden, had not time to raise such Forces as might suffice either to encounter his Enemy, or defend the City; wherefore despairing of his own Strength, and justly fearing the revolt and fury of the discontented Citizens, as a man dismayed, suddenly fled out of the City. After whose departure the Gates were presently set open to Hyfmael. For the Citizens which in those troublesome times (wherein the two Brethren contended for the Kingdom) had suffered great calamity, chose rather in that present danger to receive a Conqueror of so great fame as was then Hyfmael, than to their utter destruction to oppose themselves against him in the quarrel of their cruel King; and the rather, for that they saw a general security and open way to Preferment, proposed unto all such as should receive the reformed Religion of this new Conqueror.

Hyfmael entering the City, flew certain of the Kings Guard which were not yet departed, and then utterly rased the stately Tomb wherein his Uncle Jacup was after the manner of the Persian Kings royally buried. And to mitigate the sorrow he had so long conceived of his Fathers death, and with revenge to appease his angry Ghost, he caused the Tyrants bones to be digged up and scattered abroad, and the memorial of his name to be quite rased out of all places of the City.

Although Hyfmael was thus possessed of the Royal City of Tauris, and had thereby made a way for the obtaining of the whole Kingdom, yet he knew that so long as Elvan lived, his Conquest was not unto him assured; and therefore to the uttermost of his power he augmented his Army with new supplies taken up in that populous City, whom he furnished with Armor and Weapons taken out of the Kings Army. In the mean time news was brought unto him, that the Persian King before fled into the farthest part of his Kingdom, was now coming from Seyras with a great Army against him; and that Morachamus his Brother, forgetting in this common danger all former quarrels, had raised a great Army about Babylon in Assyria, in short time to join with his Brother.

Hyfmael nevertheless nothing terrified with the report of the great preparation of the two Brethren against him, to the intent he might seem to undertake this War by the appointment of God, and upon a greater assurance than upon his own Strength, resolved to go against them. And so after he had mustered his Army, and in best manner he could provide all things necessary, he set forward from Tauris; using no other persuasion to encourage his Soldiers, but that they should all as became resolute men, make haste and follow him whom God had given them for a Chieftain and Leader, unto a most assured Victory. The Persian King was at the same time ten days journey from Tauris, when Hyfmael with incredible celerity preventing the fame of his coming, was come to the Mountain Niphates, which parteth Assyria from Assyria; which Mountain, Elvan purposing shortly to pass over with his populous Army, had sent before his Scouts to discover the strait passages; and a multitude of Pioneers to make the ways more convenient for his great Army to pass. Which thing Hyfmael understanding, and politically considering that it would be much for his advantage, if he should first himself pass over those great Mountains, and so upon the sudden find upon his Enemies then lying in security, and fearing nothing less than such a desperate attempt; upon that resolution, raising his Ensigns upon the Mountains; and having with small resistance discomfited them, which kept the passages, came down the same Mountains like a tempest, and furiously assailed the King, then lying in his Camp on the other side at the foot of the Mountain, upon the approach of whom, such a hurly burly was raised in the Kings Camp, that what for the confused tumult of the Soldiers, and fearful outcries of the multitude of base People which followed the Camp, the King could scarcely give order unto his Captains what he would have done, or yet encourage his Soldiers, or put them in order of Battle. So that Hyfmael, giving a horse on foot with his Assyrian Soldiers, there was suddenly begun a most terrible and bloody Battle. Neither did that day the fortune of Hyfmael fail him, whose courage and prowess never failed; for assailing the Kings Battle of Footmen, with three Squadrons at once, he had overcome them and put them to flight before that the Horsemen could arm themselves and mount their Horses, which were for most part unadvised and unbridled at his coming. The King, who had nothing either feared or foreseen this so sudden a mischief, but had vainly perwaded himself, That the very fame of his coming with so huge an Army, would so terrify his Enemies, as he should find none either at Tauris, or in all Assyria, that durst make resistance; was glad now to run to and fro to encourage his Soldiers, to stay his discomfited Battels, yea and to come to handy-blows himself. But when neither his Captains nor Soldiers could put in execution his sudden directions which he was enforced to give in that imminent danger, being at once overcome with shame and desperation, he resolutely thrust himself into the head of his Battle, and there valiantly fighting was slain. Whereupon the Persian Horsemen, the greatest Strength of the Kings Army, having now no King for whom they should fight, betook themselves to flight, after whom followed the Archers, and all the rest of the Kings Army.

When as Hyfmael had with less loss than a man would have thought to great a Victory could have been achieved, possessed the Enemies Tents, he made no great pursuit after them, for that he thought it more requisite to refresh his Soldiers thoroughly wearied and almost spent with long travel and late fight; wherefore for certain days he reposited himself with his Army in those his Enemies forsaken Tents. Afterwards, when he had received Embassadors from divers places, yielding their Cities and Towns, and that the favour of the People generally inclined to him, together with the Victory; he marched with his Army to Seyras; where he was of the Citizens who had before heard of the Victory, joyfully received, and his Army relieved with all things he could desire. Hyfmael there entertained with the greatest honours that the East could afford, as possibly attributing him, did offences preach unto them of the truth and excellency of his Fathers Doctrine, and withal gave out strait Proclamations, tions, That he would account all them for his Enemies, which did not within the space of thirty days renounce their old Superstition, and receive this new found verity (as he would have it.) Wherefore, forasmuch as on the one side were proposed most certain rewards, by the happy course of his Victories, and on the other, was threatened Exile and Torture to such as should obstinately persist in their opinion; in short time he drew all the vulgar People to embrace his new Doctrine. And afterwards having paid his Soldiers with the riches of that great City, he gallantly furnished both his old and new Soldiers that he wanted, with most excellent Armor and Furniture; for in that City one of the greatest and most famous of the East, were many Shops full of all kind of Armor, which the Armors with wonderful cunning used to make of Iron and Steel, and in the juice of certain Herbs, of these which are much used in Europe; not only, but whole Caparisons for Horses, curiously made of thin plates of Iron and Steel. Departing from Seyras, he took also the great City of Sapha supposed to have been the City in ancient time called Sapha, which for the wonderful ruins of the huge Buildings, is deemed to have been the ancient and famous City Tegeracerta. These great matters quickly dispatched, and having in every City placed Governors of his own Sect, he passed over the River Tigris in Mesopotamia of purpose to expulse Morachamus the late Kings Brother, out of Babylon, who was yet in Arms, and had intended (as is before said) to have passed into Assyria, to have joined his Forces with the King his Brother; but now terrified with a most puissant Army, and the Strength of the Persian Kingdom, was in one day fallen from the height of so great a Fortune (thought it not best to try his fortune in the Field against so fortunate an Enemy, but forthwith to withdraw himself into the remotest places of that large Kingdom, and from thence to expect some better Fortune. For he well knew that he was not able to withstand his victorious Enemy, now leading before him a most puissant Army, who not long before had with a small power vanquished and slain his Brother in a great Battle. Hyfmael now by the greatness of his Fame and Forces, and as it were by the Favour of God himself, become a terror to all the Princes of the East, entered into Mesopotamia after the flight of Morachamus, and received all that great Province into his Subjection, every man as it were flying who should first by his Speedy Submission purchase the Favour of the victorious Conqueror. To be brief, Morachamus already terrified, and reposing great hope in himself, or his own power, neither deeming it for his safety to shut himself within the Walls of any strong City, trust up his things of great price, and with his Wives and Children fled into Arabia.

This Morachamus is he whom some Historiographers called Mano-Bog, and is in the Turks Histories called Imis-Bog, who (as they report) afterwards marrying the Daughter of Bajazet, and recovering part of the Persian Kingdom, was suddenly murdered by some of his Nobility, whom he purposed fiercely to have put to death, if they had not prevented the same by murdering of him first. Hyfmael having victoriously subdued a great part of the Persian Kingdom, and filled all the East part of the World with the glory of his name, returned out of Assyria into Media, and took in such Cities and strong Holds as were yet holden by the Garrisons of the late Persian King. And afterwards returning into Armenia, made War upon the Albanians, Iberians, and Scythians, which dwell upon the Borders of the Caspian; for that those Nations, in ancient times tributaries unto the Persian Kings, taking the benefit of the long Civil Wars which were with the Kingdom of Persia, and all the East Countries, with the ruin of the Kings House, had been of late unmolested; had neither paid any Tribute by the space of many years, nor sent any honourable Embassage, for their service, and as was expected, especially in so great a Victory and alteration of the State.

Hyfmael having thus obtained the Persian Kingdom, in short time became famous through the World, and was justly accounted amongst the greatest Monarchs of those Ages. But nothing made him more to be spoken of, than the innovation he had made in the Mahometan Superstition; for by his device and commandment a new form of Prayer was brought into their Mahometan Temples, far differing from that which had been of long time before used. By reason whereof, Eubeker, Home, and Osman, the successors of their great Prophet Mahomet, began now in great regard and reverence, began now to be contemned, and their writings nothing regarded; and the honour of Hali exalted, as the true and only Successor of their great Prophet. And because he would have his Subjects and die Followers of his Doctrine known from the Turks and other Mahometans, he commanded that they should all wear some red Husbands Laces, or Ribband upon their Heads; which they Religiously observe in Persia until this day; whereas they are of the Turks called Cufibis, or Red-heads. And in short time he had so far advanced this matter, that he was more known for his piety and reverence of his Subjects, than for the greatness of his sayings were accounted for divine Oracles, and his commandments for Laws: so that when they would confirm any thing by solemn Oath, King; and when they wished well to any Man, they usually said, Hyfmael grant thee thy desire. Upon his Coyn which he made both of Silver and Gold, on the one side was written these words, La ilaha illallahu Muhame dam refut allah: which is to say, There is no God but one, and Mahomet is his Messenger. And on the other side, Immal braf, lullab; which is to say, Hyfmael the Vicar of God.

Whilst Hyfmael was thus wrestling for the Persian Kingdom, Chafan Chelife and Tebellis (whom we have a little before declared to have bin brought out of the Mountains and Deserts, into the Country-Villages, and afterwards into the Cities, and to have filled the Countries of Armenia and a great part in the latter with the novelty of their new Doctrine and Opinions, first phantastied by one Giumi Siech, and afterward revived by Haider Erdeshi, Hyfmael his Father) having gathered a great Army of such as had received their Doctrine, invaded the Turks Dominion. For after that Tebellis (this cold Prophet) had with wonderful felicity in the presence of many prognosticated of things to come, and the Sophi (of late a poor exiled and banished man) was thought to have grown unto the highest type of Worldly Honours, not by mans help, but by uprightness of life, and the fortunate passage of an undoubted Religion, such a desire of receiving that new Superstition filled the minds of the People in general, that the Cities and Towns thereabouts were now full of them which in token of their new profession had taken upon them them the wearing of the Red Hat, the known Cognizance of the Cafibah. First they met together at the City of Tafia, at the Foot of the Mountain Antiaurus, or as the Turkish History reports, at the City of Attalia, to the number of ten thousand, upon a great Fair-day; where they laid hands upon the chief Magistrate of the City, and executed him, setting his quarters upon four of the highest Towers of the City; and further perwaded by these new Masters of this new Superstition, to take up Arms in defence of themselves and of their sincere Religion (as they termed it) by the force of Publick should be offered them by the irreligious Turks; they all swore never to forsake their Captains for any diffire, or yet refuse any labour or adventure for the honour of their most holy Religion (as they would have it) in defence whereof they had already vowed their Souls and Bodies. These Ringleaders of Rebellion, seeing the minds of their frantick Followers so well prepared for their purpose, and reposing a great confidence in their valor and resolution; and withal considering that the money which was bountifully brought in unto them by the Country People, partly for Devotion, partly for Fear, was not sufficient to maintain so great a multitude, gave leave by publick Proclamation to their unruly Followers, to forage the Country round about them, and to live upon the Spoil of them which would not receive their new found Doctrine. Whereupon they dividing themselves into divers Companies, and ranging up and down the Country, brought in to the Camp abundance of such things as the Country yielded; and forthwith (their multitude still increasing) they entered into Lycania, a populous and fruitful Country, where they refreshed themselves many days, roaming up and down to the great grievance and terror of the People; and brought glia a fear upon the whole Country, that they which dwell in open Durps and Villages, were glad to live with their Wives, Children and Goods, into the strong City of Iconium for Proclamations were in many places set up in the names of Chafan and Techellis, wherein many both Spiritual and Temporal Blessings were in most ample manner propoed to all such as should forthwith take part with them, and follow that their new Doctrine already established in Perfia; but unto such as should obstinately persevere in their old Superstition, after they had once drawn their Sword, was threatened utter destruction without without hope of pardon of Life. So that all the Inhabitants thereabout, terrified with the terror of this Proclamation, some for fear of Death, some upon Inconformity, some for safeguard of their Goods and Possessions (dearer unto them than any Religion) some other indebted, infamous, in danger of Law, besides many fugitive Servants, daily resorted to these new Masters. Not long after, whilst the Turks were in preparation for the suppressing of this dangerous Rebellion, certain Troops of Horsemen sent from Hyfmael, came in good time to these new Prophets; for Hyfmael in favour and furtherance of that new Superstition, had a little before by fit Messengers exhorted them to proceed courageously in their so religious an enterprise, and to join Martial Force unto the Religion they professed; promising further, not to be wanting unto them at their need, but to send them skilful Leaders, and from time to time to furnish them with Coin for the maintenance of that War. All this Hyfmael did openly in despite of Bajazet, of small beginnings to sow the Seed of greater War. For he bearing an old grudge against Bajazet for the former Wars betwixt the Turks and the Perfians, as also for their disagreement in matters concerning their Superstition, and prick forward with the heat of youth, desired nothing more in the greatness of his power, and prosperous success of his Affairs, than to have occasion to make War with the Turkish King; for which purpose he sent his Embassadors unto the State of Venice, to joyn with them in League and Amity, in which form and Chafan as they had long time before, by Caterinus Zemes, Barbarus, and Contarenus their Embassadors, concluded with Ufian-Calfanes the Persian King his Grants that any chief things that he requested of the Venitians, was That they would send him out of Italy by the way of Syria, men skilful in the casting of great Ordnance, and with their Fleet to trouble Bajazet by Sea; promising in the mean time himself to fill Asia the less with his Army by Land, and so to give a fair occasion unto them, to recover by Sea all such places as they had before in the late Wars lost unto the Turks upon the Coast of Peloponnesus and Grecia.

The Venitians having with all countreite entertained the Embassadors, gave them answer, That they would never be forgetful of the ancient League and Amity they had made with the Persian King; the remembrance whereof was unto their State a thing most pleasant; and that they were wonderful glad, that the new King was an Enemy unto the Turk, and had them in such regard, as to participate to them the causes of that War; and further to promise unto them those things, which if his Grace the Emperor of Rome, his Uncle Yaup would have performed, he should not now have had need to make Wars with the Turkish Emperor. But such was the alteration of things and times, that as the Perfians King then living at home in peace, thought it not good to fit whilst Bajazet was busy in Europe; so now their State standing in far worse condition, and fortune, could not perform that which they heartily wished, and most of all desired; for that they thought it not good to break the League which they had not long before made with Bajazet the Turkish Emperor; especially then, when sundry warlike Nations of Europe conspiring together, and divers mighty Kings provoked with no injury, but only envying at their happy estate, made Wars upon them; yet nevertheless were in good hope, that God would stand in their just defence, and still preserve their State, which no Enemies power had for the space of seven hundred years, and more been able to overcome. Wherefore they thought it best to leave unto God, who would as occasion should serve, and as it should stand with the good of their State, do their uttermost devoir to make him understand, that nothing was dearer unto them than the Friendship of so great a King; nor any thing more honourable, than by mutual Counsel and conjunct Forces to assail the Turk their common Enemy.

Shortly after, the Embassadors (having obtained nothing more than the hope of a League to be in time concluded, and being honourably rewarded) returned with their Gallies to Cyprus, and so from thence to Syria, where they had frequent conference with Contarinus Zeme (the Son of Caterinus Zeme, a man famous for his Embassyage unto Ufian-Calfanes into Perfia) Governor of the Venitians Merchants at Damafco. Which thing Bajazet having intelligence of, and of the passage of the Perfian Embassadors that way, complained grievously both by his Embassadors and Letters unto Campan-Corum Sultan of Egypt. That he dealt not as a Friend and Confederat with him, in suffering these Embassadors to pass pass throughout the midst of Syria, unto the Christians their common Enemies, to fit them up to War. Wherupon all the Venitians Merchants, which were at Triplis, Alppo, Damafco, Berytus, and Alexandria, and especially Zeme himself, were forthwith apprehended by the commandment of the great Sultan, and carried in Bonds to Chaires, where they were many times enforced in Chains to answer unto such things as were laid to their Charge; and after they had by the space of a year endured the manifold despights of the proud Mamelukes, hardly obtained to escape with Life and Liberty.

The two feditious Prophets, Chafan and Techellis, well strengthened with the aid of the Perfians, were now come unto Iconium, the most famous City of Lycania; and waiting all the Country before them, drew a great multitude of People to receive their new Doctrine. For the prepping of which outrages, Orchanes and Mahometes, two of Bajazet his Nephews (who in stead of their Fathers Alon Schach and Tasim Schach, the Sons of Bajazet before dead, governed those Countries) gathered together their Forces, and disdaining to suffer such disgrace by such a Rabble of rascal People, in the fight of so famous a City, came into the Field to give them battel. But they in their youthful heat making too much halt, and joyning battel in a place of disadvantage, were by the Rebels overthrown and put to flight. Neither would these Ringleaders in that Victory have forborn to have assailed Iconium, but that they wanted Artillery and Engines of War requisite for the besieging of Cities.

Corcutus also, one of the Sons of Bajazet, having at the same time levied a convenient Army, called Thiatyri, Spiulus, Magnefia and Phoea, durst not further lit or sit forward against the Rebels, although they lay dispersed about the Country fast by him. These new Prophets with Ensigns displayed, marching from Country to Country through the heart of the lesser Asia, entered at length into Bitunys, where near unto the River Sangariar they met with Caragofa Bassa the Viceroy of Asia, coming against them with a great Army well appointed, which he had a little before raised upon the Bruit of the coming of these Rebels; and had also commanded Achmetes (whom the Turks call Achmetes) the eldest Son of Bajazet then living, Governor of the great Countries of Cappadocia and Pontus, to raise his power, and to follow at the Back of the Rebels; who if they should hap to be put to the worse, would neither be able to retire, neither to keep the Field, being so shut up betwixt two so great Armies. But Techellis by his speedy coming frustrated the designs of the Viceroy; for marching with all speed, he was upon Caragofa before he was well aware of his coming, near unto the Mountain Hormus, as he was then taking up of more Soldiers, and daily expected the coming of others, as if he had been going against some puissant Enemy. The Viceroy seeing the Rebels so approach, although he had before not purposed to have encountered them before he had raised far greater Forces; thought it not now to stand with his honour, to refuse to give them battel, although his Army for the most part consisted of the rude Country Fellows, taken up upon the sudden, out of Endygonia, Galaris, Pontus, and Bitunys, raw Soldiers, and for most part unarmed; as commonly they are which in those Countries are pressed against their Wills out of the Towns and Villages, and are of the Turks called Aspis, who of the Janizaries are scarcely accounted for men. But his greatest confidence he reposed in the approved Valour of his ancient Horsemen, by whose means he doubted not, in safety to retire out of the Battel, and to save himself if any thing should fall out otherwise than well; making no great account of the common Soldiers, more than by them if he could, to weaken the Force of the Rebels; who on the other side (their greatest Force consisting of Footmen) had no hope to save themselves by Flight, but only by place and dint of Sword. Which Techellis well considering, exhorted his Soldiers to remember into what Country they were come, and that there was no Cities of refuge, no new power, no other gods of defence to fly unto, if they should not that day play the men. Wherefore he encouraged them to fight far forward against our Enemies, and by Victory defend our Lives, together with the Truth of our Religion, for which we have vowed both our Souls and Bodies. He had scarcely said thus much, but that his whole Army, in token of cheerfulness, gave a most terrible shout, and with one further lay far upon the Rebels. The Viceroy had placed his Footmen in the main Battel in the middle, and his Horsemen in the Wings, thereby to have compassed his Enemies; but Techellis had set all his Footmen in one great square Battel, and his Perfian Horsemen for a refuge. But the Viceroy his fresh-water Soldiers could scarcely abide the sight of Techellis his Army; for in the front of the Battel those Soldiers thronged armed, and all the rest of his Army with red Hats upon their Heads, as if they had been imbrued with Blood, which wonderfully terrified the Bassas cowardly and unskilful Soldiers; so that having endured the Fight scarcely half an hour, they turned their backs and fled. The Turkish Horsemen which had valiantly assailed the Rebels Army on both sides, although they had slain many with their Arrows and Lances, and somewhat disordered the Battel, for that the Footmen were enforced to leave their places, and to press still on forward against them; yet when Techellis his Soldiers (having overcome the Footmen, and dividing themselves into divers Squads) began with their long Pikes to kill their Horses, and to lay hardly unto them, they likewise betook themselves to Flight also. Then the Perfian Horsemen (which all this while had stood still as lookers on) left their standings and following the Rebels, gave many of the Turks in their disordered Flight; and following fast on, inclosed the Viceroy as he was flying of his Horsemen, and could not for the thickness of the dust well discern his Enemies; so that he had been there taken, if he had not been speedily rescued by his Guard, and so delivered from that danger. The rest of the Turks Horsemen saved themselves by flight. In this Battel seven thousand of the Turks Footmen were slain, and all their Ensigns taken, with great store of Provision.

After which Victory, Chafan and Techellis resting their Army one day, marched to the City of Cutais, near unto the mountain Hormus; in this City it is situated as it were in the midst of Asia the less, and is the Seat of the Turkish Emperors Viceroy in Asia; as Sophia in Messia is for his other Viceroy in Europe; for it was reported, that the Country People had for fear of the present War conceived either the greatest part of their Wealth, or the Rebels well knew, that the Viceroy himself with his chief Horsemen were fled thither also; neither doubted they, but that all the Army might be greatly incited by the Wealth of that City, if they should without delay imploy their whole Forces for the gaining thereof, their Enemies now altogether disarmed with their overthrow. Tecellus also deeming that enterprise of so much worth as whereon to gage his whole Forces, coming before the City, placed such Field Pieces as he had before taken in the Battel, and his Archers in such fit places as might annoy the Defendants; afterward he caused scaling Ladders to be set up, and Proclamation made through his Camp, That the whole Spoil of the City should be the Soldiers if they could take it; with promise of greater rewards to them that should first recover the top of the Walls. Filled with this hope, the rebellious multitude approached the Wall, fearing neither Enemies Force, multitude of Shot, or danger of Death; striving who should first mount the Ladders, and some climbing one in the neck of another, so to get up by the ruins of the Wall. The Defendants in the mean time from above casting down upon them great Stones, Timber, Fire, scalding Water, Lime, Sand, and such like without measure; wherewith although many were overthrown and crush'd to death or spoiled, yet others profane flew up in their place; neither was any of them less, for fear of the present danger to shrink back or be discouraged; for the Viceroy on the one side, and Tecellus on the other, were both Eye-witnesses of every mans Valor in that hot service; the one quick forward with doubtful hope, for fear to be enforced to give over the City; the other with the other with the due regard of his Honour, Life and State, all subject to that danger, and therefore in person himself performed all the parts of a worthy Chieftain and courageous Soldier. But at length the Defendants wearied with the fierce Assault of the Enemy, and for most part wounded, Tecellus contented with the flight of his men, and withdrawing such as were hurt, by plain force brake into the City in two places over the heads of the dead bodies; and having repulsed the Defendants, burst open one of the Gates, and thereby brought in his whole Army. Then began a miserable Slaughter of the Soldiers and poor Citizens in every House and Corner of the City. At which instant the Palace (whither the Viceroy had retired himself with his Family) was also taken; the Viceroy himself with his Wives and Children were there also taken Prisoners, and the lately Palace built with Marble, in a rich and sumptuous manner.

The rich City of Cassia, the Seat of the great Commander of the Turkish Empire in Asia, thus taken by Tecellus, and his whole Army both beautified and enriched with the spoil thereof; he perwaded himself, that it was now no hard matter for him to take the City of Pras, the ancient Seat of the Turkish King, and so to endanger the whole State of the Turks Empire in Asia, if he should now without delay carry the terror of himself thither, before the Turks could in that Country make head against him, or the Citizens be able in so sudden a fear to make any sufficient provision for the defence of themselves and their City; and so in the course of his good fortune to use the courage and cheerfulness of his Soldiers. Wherefore appointing a day when he would set forward, he commanded all things necessary to be made ready for the taking of that rich City, being neither strongly walled, neither furnished with any good Garrison for the defence thereof.

But whilst he was making this preparation, a new Army, lately thipt over the Hellespont from Calpis into Asia, enforced him to change his former determination. For Bajazet awak'd at the name of Tecellus, and the fame of the new

Superstition now generally received in Perfia, had long before given countenance to his Sons, Nephews, and the Viceroy of Asia. That they should with all carefulness provide, that that part of his Kingdom took no harm thereby. But after he saw Tecellus of a poor Hermit become a great Captain, and backt also with the Perfian King, and all his Dominions in Asia in danger of some great alteration; he sent Alis Bassa with his Euxerian Army. This Alis an Eunuch, born in Macedonia (yet for his courage comparable with the greatest Captains) had for his many and worthy deserts, in the time of the great Emperor Mahomet, Bajazet his Father, got unto himself both the honour and name of a most famous Chieftain. He having made choice of the principal Horsemen of Egypt, Macedonia, Serbia, Thracia, and joining unto them seven thousand Janizaries (the most assured hope of the Turks in all their expeditions) pass'd over from Calpis into Phrygia, and upon the way directed his Letters unto Achomet and Ceremus, Bajazet his Sons, and to all the other Sanzacks and Governors of the Turks Provinces in Asia. That they should with as much speed as they could, raise their Forces and meet him in Galatia. But Tecellus advertised of his coming, thought it best for him to depart out of Pontus, and to retire to some place of more safety, lest by longer staying he should be inclosed by his Enemies, repairing thitherwards on every side. He therefore made great disadvantage to join Battel; for he saw, that if he staid never so little, he should find no safe passage or place of refuge to retire unto, having left such large and spacious Countries, so many Enemies Cities, so many great Rivers, so many discontented People behind him all which the first favour of the favour of the first course of his Victory, had a little before laid open unto him. Wherefore calling together his Captains and most expert Men of War to consult upon the matter, it was generally thought to be a point of meer madness, or else of extreme necessity, with so small a power of unskilful Soldiers, without any sufficient strength of Horsemen, to joyn Battel with such an Enemy as better knew the Country than he, and far exceeded him both for number and experience of his Soldiers. Wherefore Tecellus trusting up with his rich Prey he had before gotten, began now with speed to retire back again with his followers through Galatia. But the Bassa having intelligence almost every hour by Letters and Espials, both of the retiring of Tecellus, and the way he held, pass'd over the River Sangarius, and coasting the Country, came and encamp'd betwixt the Cities of Cassia and Amyra, which way it was supposed the Enemy would take. Where when he had there a while rested his wearied Soldiers, and was certainly advertised, that the Rebels had taken another way, he set forward again, and after five days march in the Plains of Galatia, overtook the stragglers of the Enemies, who wearied or wounded, were not able to hold way with the Army; all whilst the Bassa commanded to be cruelly put to the Sword. And Tecellus to terrify the great body, or at leastwise with a most horrible spectacle to stay his pursuit, caus'd Caragofes the Viceroy, whom he had carried along in his Chains, to be cruelly impaled by the highway side, upon a sharp stake fixt in the ground, and so left him lying for the Turks to wonder at. But Alis Bassa nothing dismay'd with the horrible death of so great a personage, held on his way with more hast than good speed, exhorting his Soldiers patiently to endure the painfulness of the long march, and to strive themselves themselves to take revenge of those rebellious Thieves and Robbers, who destroying the Country before them, spared not so much as the Turks Children, and the Temples of their Religion; and so the day following came into the Plains of Amyra. The same day Alis Achomet came to the Bassa with ten thousand Soldiers. Alis perceiving that he could not possibly with his whole Army overtake his Enemies, marching with greater speed before him, and grieved at the heart to see them escape out of his hand, resolv'd to prove if he could with his Horsemen overtake them; whereupon leaving his Footmen, Alis Achomet, he himself with eight thousand Horse following the Enemy upon the spur, overtook the Rearward of their Army at the Mountain Olyga, a little from the City of Amyra, unto whom he gave an hot skirmish.

Tecellus which a little before had taken a fit place for his Camp, upon the rising of the Hill, although he saw his men faint with long travel and the scorching heat of the Sun, yet quickly perceiving that he should have to do only with Horsemen, and that in a place of advantage; turning his Army, and orderly placing his Soldiers, as the ground and the shortness of the time would give leave, valiantly received the imposition of the Turks, and with their long Pikes and Arrows at the first repuls'd them; so that it seem'd they would neither have given ground unto the bragging Horsemen, neither have done any thing not becoming their former Victories, had not Alis Bassa sent a thousand Carabines, who in Troop orderly following one another, delivered their Shot as thick as Hail upon the Enemy; with which form many of them being slain, and more wounded, their ranks began to be somewhat disorder'd; whereupon the other Horsemen breaking in, with great slaughter overthrew the Vanguard of Tecellus Battel; in which conflict Chafan Ch-life himself was slain. Tecellus always at hand where most need was, even in the midst of the Slaughter of his men set in order a new Battel of his most ready and best armed Soldiers, the only remedy in so great a distress; and bringing them on into the front of the Battel, oppos'd them against the Horsemen, now (as they thought) in possession of the Victory; commanding them by little and little to retire unto the Mountain, to the intent that they might seem to do that by commandment of the General, which they were like enough to have done of themselves for fear; hoping that it would come to pass, that the Turks finding the disadvantage of the place, would leave so hardly to assail them. But the Bassa encouraged with the first success of the battel, exhorted his Soldiers to urge the Victory, now almost as good as gotten, and not to give the Enemy space to recover the strength of the Mountain, but valiantly to charge them, and with a little short pains the day to end all that War, to the honour of Bajazet their Sovereign, and worthy commendation of themselves in general. In this fort encouraging them, he with a Troop of his best Horsemen (to animate the rest, and to show his own Valour) brake through the Enemies Battel; which thing he in the same heat, with more courage than discretion, attempting to perform the second time, was inclosed by his Enemies and slain; upon whose fall the fortune of the Battel was in a moment changed; for the Turks, which had fought courageously, having been backt almost overthrown eleven hundred men, now difmay'd with their Generals death, began to fight but faintly, and by little and little to give ground, and at last turning their Horses about, fled. On the other side Tecellus his Soldiers, who but a little before had repaid greater hope in the strength of the place and the Mountain, than in their Weapons and Valour, now incouraged with new hope, and taking heart in the faint Charge of their Enemies, began to thrust forward, and with a most terrible noise crying Victory, put to flight the Turks Horsemen, before wearied with long travel, when as they had by the Generals rashness left a notable Victory almost already gain'd. Tecellus although he knew that the Enemy could neither refresh his Forces, nor with any assurance keep the Field, if he should have pursuit; yet having lost many of his best Soldiers, and the rest of his Army fore weakned with Travel, Fasting, and Fighting, determin'd to refresh his wearied Followers upon the Mountain Olyga. From whence after a few days he march'd over the River Halyz unto the City of Tafis, his old dwelling place, and so to the City of Calpis, which the River Manis (much spoken of by the Poets) runneth through, and is now call'd by the name of Maras, but as then the Royal Seat of the Mountain King Aladulus. The Turks Horsemen having thus in some small fort rather revenged the injuries done by the Rebels, than obtained any Victory, returned Achomet, who was then coming on with the Footmen. Not long after, Bajazet understanding of the death of Alis Bassa his General, first Jemal Bassa, a warlike Captain, and of great experience (born in Egypt) in his stead. Who as soon as he had received the Charge of the Army from Achomet, marching forthwith into Cappadocia, and leaving the way on the right hand towards the Mountain Antinarus, came in few daies unto the City of Tafis, the place of Tecellus his abode; where burning and destroying the Country all about, he came and encamp'd with his Army at the foot of the Mountain; the Bassa had in his Army about forty thousand Horse and Foot well appointed, with many Field Pieces, and plenty of Victuals which he brought with him, for fear of want in that bare Country. Tecellus terrified with his coming, having of late received no Aid from Hysmael the Perfian King, and wanting also great Artillery, and besides that seeing his Soldiers greatly both diminished and discouraged with the late Battel at Olyga; determin'd not upon so great disadvantage to meet his Enemy in the plain Field, but to keep the rough Mountains and thick Woods, hoping that if he could be able any time to keep those strong places, he should either receive some Aid from Hysmael, or by the heat of the Turks Leaders take them at some notable advantage. In the mean time many notable skirmishes pass'd betwixt the Soldiers on both sides; for the Turks fetching a compass about the Mountains, and seeking for the best passages, by the easy rising of the Hills, came to skirmish with their Enemies; and Tecellus his Soldiers on the other side falling many times out of the Woods and abrupt places of the Mountains, valiantly assailed the Turks. After they had a long time in this sort, as if it had been in disjunct, rather proved their Forces one upon another, than done any great matter; the Turks trying into every corner, at length perceived two ways whereby their whole Army with Ensigns displayed might without any great difficulty be brought unto the top of the Mountain, and so into their Enemies strength. The Bassa having well viewed these considered places, caus'd the Janizaries at one instant to march up to the Mountain by one of the aforesaid ways, and the rest of his Army by the other;

who with soft pace climbing up the steep Mountains, with their Targets defended themselves as well as they could against their Enemies Darts and Shot. For Techellis his Soldiers having before taken the high Mountains and places of advantage, cast down upon the Turks great Stones and Shot without number, as if it had been of fowls from the Fens. The Turks therefore certain small Field Pieces against the places which most annoyed them, easily drove them from their handings; the Harquebusers still following their Ensigns, shrouded close under the Targeteers and delivered their deadly Shot as showers of Rain upon their Enemies. Whose desperate defence Techellis perceiving, caused a Retreat to be founded, and with all his Army retired farther off into the higher Mountains and rougher Woods. The night following, perceiving that by the evil success of the former skirmish he had lost a great part of his credit and strength, he with great silence forsook the Woods, and passing quite over the Mountains fled into Armenia, then part of the Perfian Kingdom. Neither did the Turks perceive their departure until it was light day, and that their Scouts entering the thick Woods, and finding the Enemies baggage, with some wounded Soldiers were able to flee, brought news unto the Baff, of the Enemies departure, and of his speedy flight into Armenia. Which thing, when he by them that were taken, understood to be certainly true, fretting and chafing like a mad man, that he had not presently upon the Enemies Retreat betwixt the Wood round, he sent his Horsemen forthwith to pursue them; but all in vain, for Techellis was by direct and known ways gone into Armenia. Some few stragglers not able to make so much half the rest, were overtaken by the Turks Horsemen, and brought back to the Baff.

Techellis thus put to flight, Tamir caused strict inquisition to be made through all the Cities of the lesser Asia, for all such as had professed the Perfian Religion; and them whom he found to have born Arms in the late Rebellion, he caused to be put to death with most exquisite Torments, and the rest to be burnt in their Foreheads with an hot Iron, thereby to be known; whom together with the Kinsfolks and Friends of them that were executed, or fled with Techellis, he caused to be transported into Europe, and to be dispersed through Macedonia, Epirus, and Peloponnesus; for fear lest if Techellis now fled into the Perfian Kingdom, should find thence return with new Forces, they should also again repair unto him, and raise a new Rebellion. This was the beginning, course, and ending, of one of the most dangerous Rebellions that ever troubled the Turkish Empire; wherein all, or at leastwise the greatest part of their Dominions in Asia, might have been easily suppressed by the Perfian King, if he would thoroughly have prosecuted the occasion and opportunity then offered.

The remainder of Techellis his Followers, flying into Perfia, by the way lightning upon a Caravan of Merchants laden with Silks, and other rich Merchandise, took the Spoil thereof; for which outrage coming to Tamir, the Captains were all by the commandment of Hymel executed, and Techellis himself to the terror of others burnt alive.

The next year (which was the year 1509, the fourteenth year of Seydhan) happened a great and terrible Earthquake in the City of Constantinople, and the Countries thereabouts; by the violence whereof, a great part of the Walls of that imperial City, with many stately Buildings both publick and private, were quite overthrowen, and thirteen thousand People overwhelmed and slain. The terror whereof was so great, that the People generally forsook their Houses and lay abroad in the Fields; yea Bajazet himself, then very aged and fore troubled with the Gout, for fear thereof removed from Constantinople to Edirne; but finding himself in no more safety than before, he left the City and lay abroad in the Fields in his Tent. This Earthquake indured by the space of eighteen days, or (as the Turks Historiographers report) a month, with very little intermission; which was then accounted ominous, and portending the miserable calamities which shortly after happened in the Ottoman Family. After this Earthquake ensued a great Plague, where-with the City was grievously visited, and for the most part unpeopled. But after that the Earthquake was ceased, and the Mortality swallowed; Bajazet caused the imperial City to be with all speed repaired, and to that purpose gave out commissions into all parts of his Dominions for the taking up of Workmen; so that there were at once in work eighty thousand Workmen, who in most beautiful manner in the space of four months again repaired the ruins of that great City.

Bajazet had by his many Wives, eight Sons and six Daughters, which lived to be Men and Women grown; and the Sons all Governors in divers Provinces of his large Empire; whom the Turkish Historiographers reckon up in this order, Abdullah Zelihi, Alam Seah, Tishan Seah, Achmet, Machmet, Corat, Selim, and Mahmet. Yet Antonius Ursus a German, who long time lived in Bajazet his Court, and (as he of himself writeth) waited in his Chamber at the time of his death, reckoning up the Sons of Bajazet, maketh mention of these five, Sciemfius, Alfemius, Alfemius, Machmet, Selymus, and Corcutus; naming the forenamed by names something differing from the other. Sciemfius the eldest, Governor of Carmania, for his towardsness most dearly beloved of his Father, died a natural death before him, and was of him and his Subjects greatly lamented. Alfemius died in like manner, of whose death as soon as he was advertised, by mourning Letters written in black paper with white Characters (as their manner of writing is, in certifying of heavy news) he cast from him his Scepter with all other tokens of Honour, and caused general mourning to be made for him in the Court, and throughout all the City of Constantinople, by the space of three days; during which time all Shops were shut up, all trading forbidden, and no sign of mirth to be seen; and for a certain space after the manner of their Superstition, caused solemn Sacrifices to be made for the health of his Soul, and seven thousand Alpens to be given weekly unto the Poor. His dead body was afterward with all Princely Pomp conveyed to Prusa, and there with great solemnity buried. Tashan Governor of Caria and Mahmet Governor of Cephis, upon their Fathers heavy displeasure, were by his commandment both strangled.

Of his other four Sons Achmet, otherwise called Achmet, Machmet or Machmet, Corcut or Corcutus, and Selymus; the second (namely Machmet) was of greatest hope and expectation, not given to sensuality or voluptuous pleasure, as Achmet his eldest Brother, neither altogether bookish as was Corcutus, nor yet of so fierce and cruel a Disposition as Selymus; but of such a lively Spirit, sharp Wit, bountiful Disposition, and Princely Carriage of himself, that in the judgment of most men, he seemed already worthy of a Kingdom. Which immoderate favour of the People,

People, caused his elder Brother Achmet, yea and Bajazet also himself, to have him in no small jealousy, as if he had affected the Empire; and was in short time the cause of his untimely death; which thing he nothing doubting, hastened (as fatal things are) by such means as he left ready might have procured any such mortal distrust or danger.

Most of Bajazet his Children were by divers Women, yet Achmet and this Machmet were by one and the same Mother; for which cause Machmet took greater pleasure in him than any his other Brethren; although it were not answered with like love again. Achmet was Lord and Governor of Amasia; and this Machmet, of Magnesia; who desirous to see the manner of his Brothers Life and Government, disguised himself with two of his familiar and faithful Friends, as if they had been religious men, of that Order which the Turks call Imanier. These men are for the most part comely Personages, born of good Houses, who in cleanly Attire made after an homely fashion, do at their pleasure wander up and down from Town to Town, and Country to Country, noting the disposition and manners of the People; whereof as first best their purpose, they make large Discourses afterwards to others; they commonly carry about with them Silver Cymbals, whereon they play most cunningly, and therewith sing pleasant and wanton Ditties; for which while doing, they receive Many of the People, as an Alms given them of Devotion. These are the common corrupters of youth, and defilers of other mens beds; men altogether given to ease and pleasure, and are of the Turks called, The religious Brethren of Love; but might of right better be termed, Epicurus his Hogs; than any professors of any Religion at all. Machmet and his two Corrupters, as men of this profession, travelled up and down the Countries of Pontus and Cappadocia (where Achmet commanded) and so to the City of Amasia; receiving for their merry glee by the way as they went, the Alms and Devotion of the foolish Country People: And being at the length come to Amasia, by coming of Achmet to the Church; who passing by, staid a while listening attentively unto their pleasant and alluring Harmony; which was for that purpose most curiously and skillfully before devised, and by them both with their instruments and voices performed. When they had ended their Music, and according to the manner of their idle profession expected his devotion; Achmet being a man of a spare hand, commanded five Alpens to be given them in reward (which is about six pence of our Money.) Machmet disdaining his Brothers base reward, as a sign of his miserable disposition, would in vain discover himself, as he had before determined; but taking horse, returned with speed to Magnesia; from whence he wrote taunting Letters unto his Brother Achmet, scoffing at his good Husbandry (no praise to a Prince) and in contempt sent him back again his five Alpens; which thing Achmet took in so evil part, as that he was never after-wards friends with him. The report of this fact was in short time dispersed throughout all parts of the Turkish Empire, divers men diversely deeming of his purpose therein.

Not long after Machmet had in this sort played with his Brother Achmet, he attired himself with certain of his trusty Followers, as if they had been Seafaring men, and with a small Bark came to Constantinople, and there landing as Adventurers from Sea, took diligent view both of the imperial City, and of the City of Pera standing opposite against it, curiously noting how all things were by his Fathers appointment ordered and governed. It happened whilst he was thus staying at Constantinople, that Bajazet had appointed a solemn assembly of all his chief Baffes at the Court; which Machmet was desirous to have the sight of; as also of the fashion of his Fathers Courts; but as he with his Companions pressed to have entered in at the Courts Gate, they were by their bafe Apparel taken of the Porters to have been rude Mariners, and so by them kept out. Wherefore consulting what to do in that case, he went and presently bought a most beautiful Christian Captive Boy, and the next day coming again to the Court with two of his Companions (as if they had been Adventurers at Sea) requested to be let in, for that they had brought a Present for the Emperor. So finding means to be admitted to the presence of Bajazet, one of his Confessors (as if he had been a Sea Captain) boldly thrust forth, and with due reverence offered the Present unto the Emperor; which he thankfully took, and in token thereof gave him his hand to kiss, and commanded a rich Garment wrought with Gold to be given unto him, with two others of less value unto Machmet and his Fellow; supposed to be the said Captains Followers; who all this while stood a far off, as if it had been for reverence of the Emperor, but indeed for fear to be discovered. As these counterfeit Guests were returning from the Court in their Garments of Favour, they hapned to meet with three Courtiers which knew Machmet; who discerning from their Hories, had done him Honour and due Reverence, as to the Son of the great Emperor, had he not by secret signs forbidden them, as one unwilling to be known. When he had thus seen his Father, the Court, and the Imperial City, he went again aboard, and so with speed returned to Magnesia.

The report of this doing, had in short time filled both the City and the Court, and was at last brought to Bajazet Ears; which raised in his suspicious Head many a troublesome thought, greatly fearing, that in these life practices lay hidden some secret and desperate Conspiracy, dangerous to himself and his other Children. Wherefore after long discourses had with the three great Baffes then of his secret Council, concerning the matter, to rid himself of all fear, he resolved in any case to take him away. And therefore caused them in his name to write unto Alfemius, a gallant warrior, and always near unto Machmet, to poison him with a secret Poyson, for that purpose inclosed in those Letters sent unto him; with promise of great rewards and preferments for that his service, to be afterwards received from the Emperor; charging him withal, that if he could not effect the matter, he should so conceal it, as that Machmet should have no distrust thereof; the least suspicion whereof, would tend to his utter destruction. This Alfemius for some unkindness bare a secret grudge against Machmet, which Bajazet knowing of, made choice of him the rather; and he on the other side partly to perform the will of his Tyrant command, and partly to revenge his own private wrong, vigilantly awaited all opportunities to bring to effect that he had in charge. At length it fortuned, that Machmet having disposed himself in his Gardens of Pleasure, and being thitherly after his exercise, called to him a Alfemius always at hand, in a gilt meubank. Alfemius him first desired, where-into he had secretly conveyed the deadly Poyson sent from Bajazet. Machmet having drunk thereof, thereof, in short time began to feel himself evil at ease, and presently sent for his Physicians; who thinking that he had been smothered, did to him himself with drinking too much cold drink in his heart, perceived not that he was poisoned, until that within six days after, he died. Of whose death Bajazet advertised, could not abstain from mourning, although he himself had been the only Author thereof; and the more to manifest his heaviness, caused all the Court to mourn with him, and Prayers to be made in their Temples after their superstitious manner, and Alms to be given to the Poor for the health of his Soul. His dead body was afterwards carried to Prusa, and there honourably buried with his Ancestors. Alimohamed the Traitor in reward of his unfaithfulness towards his Master, was by the commandment of Bajazet cast into Prison, and never afterwards seen, being there (as it was thought) secretly made away.

Now had Bajazet but three Sons left, Achomates, Selymus, and Cercesius. Achomates Governor of Amasia, was a man both politic and valiant; but much given to pleasure and delight; him Bajazet and most part of the great men of the Court favoured above the rest of his Brethren; except such as were before corrupted by Selymus. Cercesius for his mild and quiet nature, was of most men beloved, but not thought to fit for the Government of so great an Empire; especially by the Janizaries and Souldiers of the Court, before the beginning of his life declared. But Selymus being of a more haughty disposition than to brook the life of a Subject under the command of either of his Brethren, and altogether given to martial Affairs, fought by infinite Bounties, feigned Courtesy, subtil Policy, and by all other means good and bad, to aspire unto the Empire. Him therefore the Janizaries with all the great Souldiers of the Court, yea and some of the chief Baffles aloft (corrupted with Gifts) withstood above the rest, for their Lord and Sovereign; desiring rather to live under him which was like to set all the World on a hurly burly whereby they might increase their Wealth, the certain rewards of their Adventures than to lead an idle and unprofitable Life (as they termed it) under a quiet and peaceable Prince.

Whilst men stood thus diversly affected towards these Princes of so great hope, Bajazet now far worn with years, and so grievously tormented with the Gout that he was not able to help himself; for the quietness of his Subjects and preventing of such troubles as might arise by the apirings of his Children after his death, determined whilst he yet lived (for the avoiding of these and other such like mischiefs) to establish the Succession in some one of his Sons; who wholly possessed of the Kingdom, might easily repress the pride of the other. And although he had far down with himself, that Achomates should be the man, as well in respect of his Birth-right, as of the especial affection he bare unto him; yet to discover the disposition of his Subjects, and how they stood affected, it was given out in general terms, That he meant before his death to make it known to the World, who should succeed in the Empire, without naming any one of his Sons; leaving that for every man to divine of according as they were affected; which was not the least caution that every one of his Sons with like ambition began now to make full account of their former Preferences, as thinking only upon the Empire, it self.

First of all Selymus, whom Bajazet had made Governor of the Kingdom of Trapezond, rigging up all the Ships he could in Pomus, sailed from Trapezond over the Euxine (now called the Black Sea) to the City of Capra, called in ancient time Tridulia, and from thence by Land to Malatras, the son of the Tartars called Preceptus, a mighty King of the Tartars, whose Daughter he had without the good liking of his Father before married; and discovering unto him his intended purpose, besought him by the sacred Bonds of the Affinity betwixt them, not to shrink from his loving Son-in-law in to fit an opportunity for his advancement. And whilst shewed unto him, what great hope of obtaining the Empire was propoed unto him by his most faithful Friends and the Souldiers of the Court, if he would but come nearer unto his Father (then about to transfer the Empire to some one of his Sons) and either by fair means to procure his favour, or by entering with his Army into Thracia, to terrifie him from appointing either of his other Brethren for the Successor. The Tartar King commending his high device, as a kind Father-in-law with wonderful delicacy caused great store of shipping to be made ready in the Pontic Sea, and Amasia, but especially at the Ports of Cape and Amasia, upon the great River of Tanais, which boundeth Amasia from Asia; and arming fifteen thousand Tartarian Horsemen, delivered them all to Selymus, promising forthwith to fend him greater Aid if he should have occasion to use the same. These things being quickly dispatched, Selymus passing over the River Borysthenes, either to Amasia, or Lebia, came at length to Danubius, and with his Horsemen passed that famous River at the City of Cebia; his Fleet he commanded to meet him at the Port of the City of Varna, called in ancient time Dionysopolis, in the Confines of Bulgaria and Thracia; he himself left levying more men by the way as he went, pretending in these quiet another thing than he had indeed intended; which the better to cover, he gave it out as if he had purposed to have invaded Hungary.

But Bajazet a good while before advertised, that Selymus was departed from Trapezond, and come over into Europe, he sent word that he had left his charge in Asia (the Rebellion of Tachalis and the Perfian War yet scarce quered) and that upon his own head he had entertained foreign Aid to make War against the most warlike Nation of the Hungarians; and farther, that with his Army by Land, he had seized upon the places nearest unto Thracia, and with a strong Navy kept the Euxine Sea; he began to suspect, as the truth was, That all this preparation was made and intended against himself; for the crafty old Sire had good proof of the unquiet and troublesome nature of his Son, especially in that without his knowledge he durst presume to take a Wife from amongst the Tartars, and afterwards with no less presumption of himself raise an Army both by Sea and Land: whereby he easily perceived, that he would never hold himself contented with a small Kingdom, so long as he was in hope by a desperate adventure to gain a greater. Yet thinking it better with like resolution to appease his violent and fierce Nature, than by sharp reproof to move him to farther Choler, he sent unto him Embassadors to declare to him with what danger the Turkish Kings had in former times taken upon them those Hungarian Wars;

Wars; for example whereof he needed not to go so far further than to his Grandfather Mahomet the Great, who many times to his exceeding loss had made proof of the Hungarian Forces; wherefore he should do well to expect some fit opportunity, when as he might with better advice, greater power, and more sure hope of Victory, take those Wars in hand. Whereunto Selymus, answered, That he had less cause to be troubled by the injuries of his Brother Achomates, than was therefore come over into Europe, by dint of Sword and the help of his Friends, to win from the Enemies of the Mahometan Religion a larger and better Province for that little barren and peaceable one which his Father had given him, bordering upon Hiberia and Chelodis, bare and needy People, living as Conies among the Rocks and Mountains. As for the Hungarians, whom they thought to be a People invincible, and therefore not to be dealt withal, he was not of that bafe mind to be daunted with any danger, were it never so great; and yet that in his opinion the War was neither so difficult or dangerous, as was of his late pretended; so far from the ancient propoews of that warlike Nation was now much changed, together with the change of their Kings; and their Discipline of War not only much decayed, but almost quite lost, after that Uladislav, far unlike in Policy and Prowess, had succeeded the renowned Matthias in that Kingdom. Neither had he (as he himself in his cradle learned to be afraid of death, or of the common chance of War, as knowing that neither God nor Man would be wanting unto him, who with an honourable resolution did adventure upon virtuous and worthy attempts; and that therefore he was fully resolved for his own honour (which his Father had in full esteem for himself) either to die honourably in the Field in battle against the Enemies of the Mahometan Religion, or else gloriously to extend the bounds of the Turkish Empire; and that he would not (though one of the youngest in the Osman Family) be accounted inferior to any of his Brethren in Virtue and Prowess. Thus was the Hungarian War never by Selymus intended, notably by him pretended; and with no less diffimulation by Bajazet disavowed. The Embassadors, although Selymus in all his Speeches shewed no token of Peace; yet in his private conference, he flattered unto him divers Gifts, thereby if it might be to appease his fierce and cruel mind. Unto his old Government he joyntly sent Scamandria, which the Hungarians call Schederovia, a strong City of Servia upon the borders of Hungary; with many other strong Towns in the same Country; they gave him also three score thousand Ducats, beside a thousand Garments of Cloth and Silk; with good Store of Provision wherewith to relieve and content the Souldiers by him entertained; left that they drawn far from home in hope of Spoil, should take it in evil part if they should be sent away empty handed. Selymus in a happy time having received these Gifts, returned the Embassadors unto his Father, with more doubtful answer and uncertain hope than before; yet changing nothing in himself of his former resolution, secret Messengers and Letters from his Friends in the Court still whetting him forward (too much already inflamed with desire of Sovereignty) perswading him to make hie and to repulse his greatest hope in his quick speed; for that they understood, that about the time of his setting forward, his Brother Achomates was coming with a great power, being sent for out of Cappadocia by his Father.

In the mean time Bajazet, moved the rather with the fear of Selymus, resolved upon that, whereof he had long before in his mind deeply considered, and now laid openly, That he would appoint his Successor, who instead of himself, spent with years and sickness, should bring with him the flower of Youth and strength of Body, fit to govern to great an Empire. But when those things were propounded unto the Souldiers of the Court by the four great Baffles (who place unto the Emperours of Peace and War had next with gainful by those Martial Men, crying aloud with one voice, That they would know no other Emperor but Bajazet, under whose conduct and good fortune they had now served above thirty years; and therefore would not suffer him to live a private life in obscurity, who with so many Victories and strong Cities taken, had brought the Osman Empire unto that height of Renown and Glory. They said moreover, that there was in him yet strength enough, if he would but with the reverend honour of his Age retain the Majesty of his place, and the Glory he had gotten with his long and happy Reign, and most famous Victories; and that of his Children, such an one should undoubtedly in his due time succeed in the Empire, as of right ought; only they wished, that the old Emperor might in the mean time live in health with a long and happy Reign; neither needed he (as they said) to fear that after his death any controversy should arise among his Sons about the Succession; for that the Osman Progress used to attain the Imperial seat, according to the old custom of the Ancients, the Osman Kings, by Right and Order only, and not by Corruption or Faction. But if he would needs upon his own private good liking, or as it were by new adoption, proceed to make choice of such an one as the People and the Men of War (his most loyal and faithful Subjects) could not so well like of, it would be an occasion of much more trouble, and happily the means to bring in that confusion of the State, which he thought thereby to eschew. For then, beside the dislike of the People, the other Brethren would never endure so notable an injury, or ever be at quiet, until they had (as men wrongfully cast off and disinherited) by strong hand and endangering of all, recovered their honor lost by the headstrong Will of their aged Father.

The Souldiers thus before instructed by the Friends and Favourites of Selymus, (who with many and large Promises had corrupted their Captains and chief Officers) spake these things frankly, to have deterred the old Emperor from his purpose. But he thinking that they had (as he himself did) especially affected Achomates his eldest Son, (for that they had generally protected, that they would against all injuries defend his honour, unto whom the Empire should of right appertain) said he would make choice of Achomates, if it should stand with their good liking. But the chief of the Souldiers (who corrupted by Selymus, had together fold both their Faith and themselves) cunningly commended Achomates, and seemed wonderfully to like of him; yet to accept of him for their Sovereign, Bajazet yet living, they said was not agreeing with the ancient custom of the Osman Kings, neither for the behoof of the men of War, neither yet good for the State of the Empire; forasmuch as neither his Brethren Cercesius and Selymus, neither the Souldiers of the Court, could patiently endure the least touch of the suspicion of Infolity; which they must needs do, if he as a suspicious Father should doubt either of the Love or Loyalty

alty of his most dutiful Sons, or of the Faith and Contancy of his most faithful Servants, whereof he had made so many trials. Bajazet, being thus focused unto them all unquestonable, that by the odious prejudice of that Fact, the Soldiers should be left debarred of the rewards usually granted unto them during the time of the vacancy of the Empire, arising of the Spoil taken from them which are of Religion different from the Turks. For it is a custom, that immediately upon the death of the Turkish Emperor, all the Jews and Christians which dwell at Constantinople, Pera, Hadrianople, Thessalonica, and Prusa, especially Merchants, exposed unto the injuries of the Turks, are by the Janizaries and other Soldiers of the Court, spoiled of all their Wares and Goods, and become unto them a Prey; neither will they give their Oath of Allegiance unto the new Emperor, until he have granted unto them all that Prey, as a Bounty, and have solemnly sworn by his own Head (the greatest assurance that can by Oath be given amongst the Turks) freely to pardon all the Offenders, and for ever to forget all the outrages before committed. When Bajazet saw his Men of War thus generally to oppose themselves against the translation of the Empire to Achmet, he of purpose to corrupt the minds of them which were before already corrupted, promised to give them five hundred thousand Ducats if they would forsake Achmet to Achmet, and accept him for their Sovereign; which Mass of Money his Customers and Receivers undertook to levy of the same Merchants Strangers and Jews, and to pay it as Bajazet had promised. Yet the overthwart forwardness of these Men of War overcame the good Fortune of Achmet, although the reward promised was great; for why, they had in their Martial Minds conceived far greater Rewards and Preferments, if instead of a peaceable and quiet Prince, a monstrous Tyrant of restless nature (as was Selymus) might by their help and means aspire to the Empire. Thus Bajazet, driven from his hope, thought it best for the present to dissemble the matter; and concealing his grief, with patience to put up that dishonour, until a fitter opportunity were offered for the effecting of that he so much desired.

Selymus advertised from his Friends, with what affection and favour the Soldiers of the Court had in the secret favour of him openly withstood the earnest desire of Bajazet for the preferment of Achmet; because he would no longer frustrate the expectation of his Favourites by lingering and delay, or seem to distrust the ready good Wills of the Men of War towards him, left the borders of Hungary, and with his Army marching through Thracia, incamped at length upon the rising of an Hill not far from Hadrianople, from whence the neighing of his Horses might easily be heard, and his Tents from the high places of the City discovered. From thence he sent a Messenger unto his Brother now lying in the City, and certified him, That forasmuch as he had not of many years before seen him, he was now therefore desirous to come unto his presence to visit him, before he crossed the Seas back again by his appointment to Trapezond; and the rather, because it might chance that he should never see him again, being now become both aged and disabled; besides that, it much concerned (as he would have had him to believe) the quietness of his Kingdom in Asia, and the unity of his Children, if the controversies betwixt him and his Brother Achmet, which could not safely be committed to Messengers, might by themselves be discovered to him their Father, as an indifferent hearer and decider thereof. Wherefore he humbly besought him to appoint him a time and place to give audience, and not to deny him leave to come and kiss his Father, which thing his Ancestors never refused to grant to their poor Friends, much less to their Children. Bajazet who a few days before understanding of the coming of Selymus, and thoroughly seeing into his devices, had called unto him certain of his Sanzacks or chief Captains, and had sent them Companies out of the nearest parts of Greece, and had also set strong Watch and Ward through the City; fearing left under the colour of parlie, his Soldiers attending about his person, corrupted by Selymus and his Friends (who even then loaded with Gifts and Promises, were secretly upon the point of revolt) should be quite drawn away from him, and so he himself at length be either by open force oppressed, or secret Treachery circumvented, thought it best to cut him off at once from all hope of conference or access unto his presence. Wherefore seriously blaming him, that he had upon his own head brought his Army into another mans Province, that he in Arms required audience, and last of all, he insolently abused his Fathers lenity and patience; he by the same Messenger sent him farther word, That he should not presume to approach any nearer unto him, or expect any thing appertaining to peace, who guarded with forearmed hands had without his Fathers leave entered into Arms, and spoiled the Countries of his Friends; and that therefore he should do well, with all speed to retire out of Thracia, yea and out of Europe also, and disbanding his Forces, again to retire himself unto his own charge in Pontus; in which doing he should find greater favour and kindness with him his Father, than ever he had before; but if he would needs proceed in the course by him begun, that then he would no more take him for his Son, but for his Enemy, and before it were long, sharply chastise for his malapert Insolency, little differing from unnatural Treachery. The Messenger with his answer dismissed, it was not long after, but that Bajazet was by his espials advertised, that Selymus the night following was risen with his Army, and marched directly towards Constantinople; whether he was sent for by his Friends, in hope that upon his forwardness to his avail arise in that so great and populous City. Whereupon Bajazet fearing left in flying at Hadrianople, he might lose the Imperial City of Constantinople, early in the morning by break of the day departed from Hadrianople towards Constantinople. Upon his departure Selymus peaceably entered the City of Hadrianople, the Citizens fearing, that if they should have made any resistance, their unfeasonable faithfulness towards Bajazet might have turned to their utter destruction. Selymus after he had a while retrained his Army with the plenty that City, according to his former determination for forwardness of purpose by long and speedy Marches to have prevented his Fathers coming to Constantinople. Bajazet was yet scarcely come to Chirius, or rather Taurulum, an ancient ruinous City almost upon the mid way betwixt Hadrianople and Constantinople, when warning was given of them that followed his Army, that the forerunners of Selymus were at hand, cutting off the stragglers of his Army, and with hot skirmishing stayed and troubled his Rearward. The aged Emperor more moved than terrified with the strangeness of the matter, because his marching should not seem as if it were a Flight or Chase, commanded his Standard to be set up, and all his Army to make a stand, of purpose that if Selymus should come on to give him Battle, he might find him in readiness. The great Captains and Noblemen then present with Bajazet, whether it were for old acquaintance, or upon some new inclination of their affection, or else upon hope of new Alliance and Preferment, withholding well unto Selymus, and therefore indirectly and cunningly favouring him, seemed not to like of Bajazet his resolution, to be so far moved (as they said) with the youthful heat and lightness of his Son, as to seek revenge, whereas the Victory it fell out, he held him nothing but sorrow; but the overthwart threatened destruction both to himself and all them that were with him; the imminent event thereof seemed to be so much the more dangerous and fearful, by how much he was at that time inferior unto his Son in warlike Provision and number of men. Wherefore it was good for him (they said) to moderate his anger, and not now in the winding up of his life to make too much haft by a miserable death in a woful Battle to stain the whole glory of his former life. There was (as they would have persuaded him) but one only course to be taken, full of whole some Policy and Safety; and that was, That he should with such speed as he had begun, march on forward to Constantinople, that so Selymus excluded out of the City, (his chiefest hope) and then not knowing which way to turn himself, should either of his own accord, or for fear of his greater Forces, be driven out of return; and so by with his rascal Followers more honestly by the hands of them whose Countries he had spoiled, and upon whom he must of necessity live in his return, than by the sword of his Father. The Author of this Counsel was Musapha, the most ancient Baia of those which being in greater favour with the Emperor, were only members of his Privy Council, and sway all matters of importance concerning either Peace or War; he then upon an unthankful and malicious mind loathing Bajazet, as one that had too long reigned, hated him also for certain private displeasures conceived of the emulation of the other younger Baia's by him promoted; and secretly bare great affection to Selymus, both in condition and favour, resembling his Grandfather the Great Achmet, by whom he was brought up himself, and him of all the Sons of Bajazet he thought most worthy of the Empire. This Musapha was born in the Town of Serez, near unto Amphipolis the Son of a Greek Priest, a man of a lively crafty, and fit to wit, always subject to corruption; which diseases of mind were in him well to have been discovered by his froward look and faine Eyes, the certain notes of a nature to be suspected. Next unto this Musapha was Bostanges Baia, born of the honourable House of the Ducagins in Asiabula, and therefore called Ducagins; a man for his Covetousness, Ambition, and Treachery, infamous; as the foul and miserable end of his life afterwards declared. Unto this man, Selymus had by secret promise betrothed one of his daughters, not marriageable, as a reward of his corrupt Fable. By which sleight he had also allured Aga (Aga or Captain of the Janizaries, and great Master of the Household) to promise his Aid for the obtaining of the Empire; whereunto he said he was by Destiny called; and by his means drew other inferior whom he hoped not to remove whatsoever might please their humors. Yea the Captains almost generally either corrupted with reward, or for fear following the inclination of the greater Commanders, of themselves leaned that way.

Of all the rest, only Cherlogies Baia (whom the Turks Historians call also Achmet Horrecaoglu) a faithful, constant, and upright man, free from all double dealing and deceit, a faithful and assured Friend unto Bajazet his Father in and Insolvency of Selymus; was even there by oppressed, before he should approach any nearer unto the Imperial City, for fear of raising some further trouble or tumult there, than were well to be appeased; which was the thing that Selymus he thought (as Cherlogies said) that the naked Tartarian Horsemens, although they were in number more, would ever be able to abide the first charge of Bajazet his well armed Penions. As for the Janizaries, of whose approved Faith and Valour tried in many dangers, he had before that they would none to the uttermost of their aged and victorious Emperor, who had of long time so well of them deserved; and also to revenge his quarrel upon disobedient Selymus, who neither fearing God the just Revenger of such ungracious dealing, neither the infamy of men, had most unseasonably lift up his Sword against his Father, wickedly to deprive him of life, of whom he had received life. Wherefore he persuaded him, in his own just quarrel to go forth unto his Soldiers with cheerful countenance, and putting them in remembrance of the bene-received at his hands, at all of their Allegiance and Duty; to make them to understand, that reposing his trust in their Fidelity and Valour, he had resolutely set down with himself, in that place before he went any further, by their faithful hands to chastise the presumptuous insolency of his unnatural Son, together with his rebellious Followers.

But now that we are fallen into the remembrance of this Cherlogies, it shall not be amiss, both for the honour of the man, and the great love he always bare unto the Christians, to step a little out of the way, to see the cause why he being a Christian born, turned Turk. For he was not (as almost all the rest of the great men about Bajazet were) of a Child taken from his Christian Parents, and so brought up in the Mahometan Religion; but now being a man grown, turned Turk; yet so, as that he never in heart forgot either the Christian Religion or love towards the Christians; a thing not common among such Renegades. He being the Son of one Cherlogies, a small Prince of Byzia near unto the black Mountains, and going to be married unto a Lady whom he most entirely loved; and unto whom he was already betrothed, honourably defended of the House of the Despot of Serez; his incontinent Father with lustful Eye beholding the young Lady, as a rare Feature and incomparable Beauty, desired to have her for himself; and regarding more the satisfying of his own inordinate desire, than his own honour, or the Fatherly Love of his Son, took her in marriage himself; all his Friends labouring in vain to dissuade him, as with open mouth crying shame of so foul a Fact. Wherefore the young man, moved with the indignity of so great an injury, and driven headlong with despair, left first to the Turks Garrisons which lay not far off, and from thence to Constantinople; where the fortune of the man was to be wondered at. For being brought before Bajazet, who with cheerful countenance entertained him, for that he was honourably defended, and well liked both of the man, and of the cause of his revolt; smiling upon him, said, Be of good cheer Noble Turk, for thy great courage is worthy of far greater fortune than thy Father's! He could afford thee now in stead of thy Love wrongfully taken from thee by thy Father, (the Kingwoman of a poor exiled Prince) thou shalt have given thee in marriage the Daughter of a great Emperor, of rare and singular perfection. And not long after abjuring his Religion, and changing the Name of his Father's Adornments and Christofites, he married one of Bajazet his Daughters, a Princess of great Beauty; and deferred to have a place among the Baffes of greatest honour in the Court. Yet still retaining the remembrance of his former Profession, with a desire to return thence again; inasmuch that he kept close a secret closet and image of the Crucifix, which he shewed to Jo. Lafaris, as to his trusty Friend, as he himself reported. This man at such time as the City of Modon was taken by the Turks, and a multitude of poor Christian Captives cruelly put to death in the sight of Bajazet, by earnest intreaty saved the Venetian Senators there taken; and afterward by earnest suite delivered Andreas Gritti, being Prisoner at Constantinople, and condemned to die: who not many years after was chosen Duke of Venice. He was the chief means whereby the Venetians to their great good obtained Peace of Bajazet. He also by his great Authority, and of his own charge released considerable Christians from the servitude of the Turks and set them at liberty. Neither is his kindness towards the furtherance of good learning to be forgotten; for at such time as the foresaid Jo. Lafaris the notable and learned Grecian, by the appointment of Leo the Tenth, fought ancient works of famous Writers, he procured the Turkish Emperors Letters and Patents, that he might freely at his pleasure search all the Libraries in Greece, to the great benefit of good Letters. Now Bajazet encouraged by this mans perswasion (as is aforesaid) and hearing as he lay in his Pavilion, the Alarm of the Enemy, with the tumult and clamor of his own Souldiers as if they had been men afraid; and sundry Messengers also at the same time coming unto him with news, That Selymus with his Tartarian Horfemen had almost inclosed the Rearward of his Army, and already taken some of his Baggage; grinding his Teeth for very madness and grief of mind, with Tears trickling down his hoary Cheeks, got him out of his Pavilion, and in his rage he was at the same time so troubled with the Gout, that he was not able to sit on Horfback; and turning himself unto the Pensioners and Janizaries standing about him, as their manner is, said unto them,

Will you, Foster-Children, valiant Souldiers, and faithful Aspers of my Person, who with great fortune have served me in Field above the space of thirty years; and for your faithful and good service have both in time of Peace and War, of me received such rewards, as by your own confession and thanksgiving far exceeded your own expectation, and the measure of our Treasures? Will you, I say, suffer the innocent Father to be butchered by his wicked Son? And your old Emperor, tormented with age and diseases, to be cruelly murdered by a company of wild Tartars, little better than arrant Rogues and Thieves? Shall I be now forsaken in this my heavy old age and last act of Life? And shall I be delivered unto mine Enemies, by them, I say, who many years ago with great faithfulness and invincible Courage defended mine Honour and Right against my Brother Zemes? And have many times since, not only valiantly defended this Empire against most warlike Nations, but also most victoriously augmented the same? But I will not so lightly believe that which to my no small grief is brought unto mine ears, concerning the revolting of mine Army; neither if I did believe it, am I so fearful as to be therewith discouraged, or to seek to make shift for my self. For to what purpose should I think of flight; as though I could in any other place find more faithfulness or surer defence than with you? And concerning your Asbomates and Christofites, which should be your duty to defend Treachery? If any of you (for I cannot believe that you are all so mad) without regard of faith, of worldly shame, or the fear of God, have polluted your minds with the pernicious conceits of so foul a Treason; do you think to gain greater Rewards and preferments by your Treachery and Villany, than by your Fidelity and Integrity? There be many, which wish of my Person, persuade me to reserve this my sick and feeble Body unto my better fortune, and to commit my self to flight, so rather to save my life with shame and infamy, than to end my days with honour and glory; Which is so far from my thought for the apprehension of my fear to do, that I will to the contrary forthwith give the first Enemy battle; and in this my last danger make proof of all your Fidelity and Valour, and of every one of your good Wills in particular; and so by conduct of the Highest, either defeat the power and break the strength of this graceless man, or else having reigned above thirty years as my Emperor, and all my days together with them which shall unto the end continue with me, I will die in fullness and Loyalty, although I should be most shamefully and dishonourably betrayed and forsaken of some of mine own Guard; which thing though lying Fame would make me believe, yet will I not fear it until I see the proof thereof.

The common fort of Janizaries, unto whom the great Commanders and Captains corrupted by Selymus, had not for their levity and multitude communicated their purpose of transferring the Empire to Selymus, began to cry out as if it had been with general consent. That he should not doubt to join battle with his Enemies, and to make proof of their constant Fidelity and wonted Valour. Which was done with such cheerfulness and desire expressed by great Shouts, clapping of Hands, and clattering of Armor, that it seemed they would play the parts of resolute Souldiers, and that as guiltless men they took it grievously to be once suspected of Treason or Infidelity. Others also who formerly had their hearts were well affected to Selymus, for faithful sake followed them with like cry; but especially the great Commanders both of the Army and of the Emperors Court, now changed their affection, whether it were for shame of the Fact, or for fear of discovering themselves out of season, is uncertain. Wherefore according to the manner of such men, which through their Fidelity and mischievous disposition, fearing to be convinced and discovered, add unto the present a second and new Treason or Treachery, to cover the former; by Mustapha and Bosphanus (not daring now to shew themselves for Selymus) to make a great shew of their feigned Loyalty towards Bajazet, departed themselves out of his Pavilion, to encourage the Souldiers; and to martial the Barrel.

Bajazet sick in his Chariot, by the advice of Cherfogeles the faithful Bassa, placed his Barrel in this order: The Sarzacks (which are the Governors of Provinces) with their Horfemen, in number about six thousand; set in the Front of the Barrel; the Spachlogans and Siliphits, which

which are the chief Horfemen of the Court, and as it were the Emperors Pensioners, were placed as two Wings on each side the great Squadron of the Janizaries, in the midst whereof was old Bajazet himself. Other forty thousand Horfemen (Servants to the great men of the Court) were left in the Rearward, and to guard the Baggage. These Slaves (so for indeed they are) for their Apparel and Furniture, yea and Valor also are so inferior to their Masters, by whom they are so sumptuously maintained, both for strength and ostentation. The Barrel thus ordered, Bajazet commanded the Trumpets to sound, and a red Ensign in token of battle to be displayed. On the other side, Selymus placing his Tartarian Horfemen in both Wings, and his Turks in the midst, in manner of a half Moon, for that in number of Horfemen far exceeds his Father, did almost on every side inclose him, and to charge him. The Tartars when they were come within an hundred paces of their Enemies, casting themselves (after the manner of their right) into great Rings, empty within in manner of a Crown, and so running round, that they might both hacke and cut the Enemies liver their Arrows, cast upon their Enemies whole showers of Shot; as if it had been Hail, to the great annoyance of the Turks; when as in the mean time the other Tartarian Archers further off, shooting their Arrows not right forth, but more upright towards Heaven, which falling directly down, fore gauged the Turks Heads and feet. But the old Souldiers (taught by the example of their Father) fered close together, and casting their Targets over their Heads, as if it had been one whole Roof or Penthouse, received their Arrows with less harm, and hasted with as much speed as they could to come to handy blows. The Pensioners also at the same instant heavily charged the middle of Selymus his Barrel, where the Turkish Horfemen stood; and Ajax Captain of the Janizaries, drawing out seven hundred ready Harquebussiers out of the Squadron of the Janizaries, with them assailed the hindmost of one of the Wings of the Tartars; and the four thousand Servants left in the Rearward, as desirous as the rest to show their forwardness, with great Slaughter repulld the other Wing of the Tartars, which came to have spoiled the Turks Carriages. This fierce battle betwixt the Father and the Son, with doubtful event endured from Noon until the going down of the Sun; Selymus in many places still restoring his declining Barrel, and fighting himself, as for an Enemy. But after the Tartars, hardly charged by the Harquebussiers, were not able to abide the Shot, especially their Horfes, being with the unwonted noise thereof wonderfully terrified, and so carrying back their Riders whether they would or no, began to fly; the rest of the Horfemen could neither by commandment, threatening, or wounds be enforced to stay, but turned their Backs and fled. The Footmen also whom Selymus had attired and armed after the manner of the Janizaries, being forsaken of their own Horfemen, were now by Bajazet his Horfemen compassed about and almost all slain.

Selymus his Army thus overthrown, and himself hardly beset, was by certain Troops of his Turkish Horfemen which yet staid with him, delivered from the present danger; and being wounded, was mounted upon a fresh Horfe, and to with all the speed he could fled after the Tartars. But doubting to be pursued and overtaken by his Fathers faithful Horfemen, he changed his Horfe, and took another of a wonderful swiftness; and so referring himself to his future fortune, with a few of his Followers fled to Varna, and from thence by Sea to Capha.

The Horfe whereon Selymus fled was all black, called Carabul (that is to say, a black Horse), whom Selymus as a good Servitor ever after exempted from all service; and had him in such estimation, that covered with Cloth of Gold, he was as a spare Horfe without a Rider led after him in all his great Expeditions, first into Persia, and afterwards into Egypt, where he died at Cairo, and there to the imitation of Bucephalus, Great Alexander, Horfe had a Monument erected for him: wherein Selymus shewed the Father and the Son in his own Brethren, whom he cruelly murdered, and hardly afforded to some of them to honourable a Sepulture.

In this Barrel, of forty thousand which Selymus brought into the Field, escaped not above eight thousand, but they were either slain or taken prisoners. Of Bajazet his Army were left about seven hundred, and three thousand hurt with Tartarian Arrows: which loss he presently revenged with extreme cruelty, causing all such as were taken prisoners to be without mercy put to the Sword in his sight; whose heads were laid together by heaps, and their dead bodies cast into the River and Towed. Of this notable Barrel betwixt the Father and the Son in the year 1511, Chirulius called in ancient time Teurulum, before an obscure old ruinous City, (or as Jovius calleth it, a Village) became famous; but much more afterwards by the fatal Ministry of Selymus: who not many years after, stricken with the same disease, and with the same disease, ended his days in the same place with an untimely and tormenting death; God (as it is to be thought) with revenging hand in the same place taking just punishment for his former disloyalty towards his Father, as shall hereafter in due time and place be declared.

Where he says Bajazet fled in the same place where he had obtained the Victory, till such time as all his Souldiers were again returned from the chase of the Enemy; after that, he held on his way to Constantinople, and there bountifully rewarded his Souldiers. In the mean time Accomates heark of all the trouble which had happened betwixt his Father and his Brother Selymus, with the event thereof, came with an Army of twenty thousand from Amasia, through the Countries of Galatia and Bithynia, unto the City of Scutari, called in ancient time Christopolis, (though some suppose it to have been the famous City of Chalcedon) which City is situated upon the Straite of Bosphorus, directly against the City of Constantinople. In this place Accomates encamped his Army, near unto the Sea side, expecting what course his Father would take after so great a Victory. For beside the Prerogative of his Age, and the especial love of his Father towards him, the general affection of the Vulgar People, with the good opinion he had of himself, had already filled his mind with the hope of the Empire. Wherefore he ceased not night and day to find Messengers over that narrow Straite, to Constantinople; and most earnestly to solicit Bajazet his Father, in so far an occasion to make halt to dispatch what he had so long before determined, concerning the resignation of the Empire. He also implored his Friends and Familiars in best manner he could to commend him to his Father, and in most ample sort to extol his grave purpose for translation of the Empire; and to do the utmost of their device, that seeing God and good Fortune had justly overthrown the rash attempt and force of his Brother Selymus, and by their good means might the sooner obtain the Empire, whereof he was the undoubted Heir.

willing to listen to the Em-

Bajazet, who of himself and according to his old good liking was altogether desirous of the Preference of Achometes, was by their persuasions easily intreated to hasten the performance of that he had before determined for the transferring of the Empire. And making no great secret of the matter, caused the Carion Gallies to be made ready for the transporting of Achometes from Scutari to Constantinople. But the great Baffices with the Souldiers of the Court (the secret Favourites of Selymus) understanding the matter, began again openly to resist and impugn his purpose determination, and to allege the same reasons they had before at Helles ample alleged in fine they said plainly, That they would by no means suffer him so far to disfigure himself as an insufficient man to resign the Empire, who of late had with so valiant and courageous an heart fought for the honour of his Crown and Dignity; and that therefore so long as he lived, they would acknowledge no other Sovereign, but Bajazet: yet for all that as they meant not thereby to cut off Achometes his hope, so neither ought he to distrust the good will of the Men of War; but that he being a Man of most approved and known Valour, might in due time by their general good liking enjoy his right, which should then without all question be due unto him as the eldest Son of their Emperor. They said moreover, that they had in the late Battle against Selymus sufficiently declared what minds they were of, both towards their Emperor and Achometes, and what confidence they were to repose in the fidelity of their Souldiers, who to manifest their Faithfulness and Loyalty, had not refused to offer themselves unto the hazard of a most unequal Battle, yea their lives unto death it self. O foul diffimulation, the covert Mask of all Mischief, under which meer Treachery is here pretended for great Loyalty, the aged Emperor too much flattered, Achometes shamefully deluded, and (the Man that might not as then without some addition of disgrace be named) Selymus, even Bloody Selymus, secretly fought for above all Men to be preferred.

Bajazet by this forwardness and infidelity of the Souldiers again disappointed of his purpose, or else (as some thought) delighted with the Victory of Sovereignty; for that after the late Victory he seemed (as one grown young again) neither to feel himself old or unable fit to govern so great an Empire: sent word to Achometes, how the matter stood, and that he should forthwith depart from Scutari to his old charge at Amasia, from whence he would again call him at such time as he had with new bounty won the minds of the Souldiers, and procured the good liking of other the great men in Court, whereby to great a matter and not usual might the better and with more security be effected.

Achometes thus deceived of his hope and expectation, grievously complaining that he was so mocked of his Father, and contemned of the Souldiers of the Court, began to mix his new request with words of heat and discontentment, and to inveigh against his Father, for making him a by-word (as he termed it) and a laughing stock unto the World, after he had taken the pains to come so far, and that by his special appointment. But if he proceeded so to doat, and to make so great reckoning of the Souldiers of the Court, that in respect thereof he neither regarded his promise, nor did was right and just; he would himself by force or Arms take upon him the defence of his own honour and right, so lightly esteemed by his Father, and revenge the disgrace offered unto him by others.

Whereunto Bajazet answered by the Cadelecher (which is a man of greatest place and authority amongst the Turks in matters concerning their Superstition, and therefore of them honoured above others, as the sacred interpreter of their Law) that he neither well nor wisely without just cause to fall into so great rage and choler, as by his speech and force to think to extort that good which was only by love and loyalty to be gained; whereas all things should be surely kept for him, and the Empire undoubtedly defend unto him, if by uncinely haste he did not mark that hope which he ought by suffrance and patient expectation to cherish; he might as the Cadelecher told him) learn by that late example and fortune of his Brother Selymus, what might be for his own good and welfare; and that it was a thing of far more danger, desperately to thrust himself headlong into such an action as he could not possibly see the end of, than moderating by reason his hot passions, expect with patience the opportunity of time, and fitness of occasion, with the alteration of matters, all tending to his good.

Achometes inflamed with anger and grief of the repulse, all the while the Cadelecher was delivering his Fathers Message, gave him many sharp rants, and had much ado to stay himself from offering of him violence, oftentimes threatening him, that in short time both his Father should dearly buy the changing of his purpose, and the Souldiers of the Court their treacherous dealing; and so sending him away with this short answer, he presently rose with his Arms, and passing through Bithynia, cruelly spoiled the Country in his return to Amasia. There daily more and more enflamed with the grief and the indignity of the repulse before received, he determined to invade the lesser Asia; that if it should fall out, that he must needs by force of Arms try his right against either of his Brethren, he might thereby use the Wealth of that rich Province. Whereby if it should chance that he should by the practice of any, fall of the whole Empire, yet he should at the least wife be possessed of the one half thereof, and be the reader for all events, having all these great and rich Provinces in his power. Wherefore calling unto him his two Sons, Amurath and Aladin, young Princes of great hope, after he had grievously complained of the unkindness of his Father Bajazet, and of the injuries done against him by his Enemies in the Court, he declared unto them, that there was now no time to be lost, but that he should forthwith depart from Amasia to his old charge at Amasia, from whence he would again call him at such time as he had with new bounty won the minds of the Souldiers, and procured the good liking of other the great men in Court, whereby to great a matter and not usual might the better and with more security be effected.

Achometes thus deceived of his hope and expectation, grievously complaining that he was so mocked of his Father, and contemned of the Souldiers of the Court, began to mix his new request with words of heat and discontentment, and to inveigh against his Father, for making him a by-word (as he termed it) and a laughing stock unto the World, after he had taken the pains to come so far, and that by his special appointment. But if he proceeded so to doat, and to make so great reckoning of the Souldiers of the Court, that in respect thereof he neither regarded his promise, nor did was right and just; he would himself by force or Arms take upon him the defence of his own honour and right, so lightly esteemed by his Father, and revenge the disgrace offered unto him by others.

own youthful disposition ready enough for such a matter, and now encouraged with their Fathers persuasion, did what they were by him commanded, and had in short time raised a notable Army of voluntary Souldiers, of whom the greatest part were of servile condition. But Achometes himself, besides his old Army which he had in former time lead against the Perfian Rebels, levied new Forces also, and called forth into the Field all the able men that were to be found in the Cities round about; and so running through the Provinces proclaimed himself King of Asia, and such as would not forthwith yield unto him, those he and his two Sons in divers places persecuted with all hostility; by which means many Cities, especially such as were but weakly fortified, partly for fear, partly by constraint, were delivered over unto him.

After that, he entred with his Army into Lycania, and the borders of Cilicia, where by Embassadors and often Letters he requested Mahomet his Brothers Son (who then governed those Countries) to aid him in his just quarrel against them, who by crafty and insinuating persuasions had to his dishonour and disgrace withdrawn his Fathers good will from him, and so far seduced him, as that he was determined to appoint another Successor in the Empire, than him his eldest and first begotten Son; which their malice he would (as he said) prevent, and by force of Arms recover his right, which his Father knowing to be due unto him, was about to have put him in possession of whilst he yet lived, had he not by the insinuating practice of others been hindered; for the recovery whereof, if Mahometes would out of his Province aid him with men and victual, and so further his just cause, he promised that he should find a far better Uncle than he had found a Father; and that his present Friendship should in time be most amply and bountifully repaid.

Whereunto Mahometes answered, that he could not do what his Uncle had required, except he were so commanded by his Grandfather Bajazet, whom alone he acknowledged for his dread Sovereign; and that it was not for him to judge, whether he did right, or otherwise: That he would not in his life time resign the Empire to his Son. But this (he said) he was not ignorant of, that he was not to yield his obedience to any other, so long as he lived possessed of the Empire; to whom both his Father Tizik and Aladin were bound to live, and himself also had given their Oath of Obedience and Loyalty. Wherefore it was good for him to pacify himself, lest in seeking untimely revenge of his Enemies, he should to the offence of all men wrong his Father; and by too much heat and half overthrow both his hope and honour; which of right should be most grievous if he could but in the mean time have patience, and stay himself a while. Achometes, who expected nothing less than such an answer, but thought that Mahometes would either for love or fear presently come unto him, and now finding his requests to be with greater gravity and consideration denied by his Nephew, than they were by reason of him demanded, entred with his Army into the borders of his Province, and with fire and sword began to destroy the Country before him. Which Mahometes with such power as he had thinking to remedy, was by the way encountered by his Uncle not far from Amasia, and there they were both slain. Wherefore for refuge, was there certain days besieged by Achometes and at last together with his Brother (then but a Child) delivered into his hands, at such time as the City was by the fearful Citizens by composition yielded unto him. Achometes having taken the City with his two Nephews, called Mahomet his Counsellors, with his Foster Brother, by whose persuasion it was supposed that he had so answered his Uncle and endangered himself, to be put to death.

Their proceedings of Achometes filled Bajazet with grief and indignation, that he should in so great years be fet upon by two of his own Sons, one after the other. Yet to prove if those troubles might without more bloodshed be pacified, he sent his Embassadors unto him to approve him of his dilatory; and to command him forthwith to fee a liberty his two Nephews, Mahometes and his Brother, and so without more stir to get him again to Amasia; which if he should refuse to do, then to denounce unto him open War. But he, which by how much the more he had after his repulse ambitiously affected the Empire, had resolved with himself to deal so much the more cruelly in his proceedings; having received this Message from his Father, caused the chief Embassador (for that he had in frank speech delivered his Message and denounced unto him Wars) to be in his own presence put to death; and threatened the rest with the like, if before the going down of the Sun they avoided not his Camp.

This outrage highly offended Bajazet, and alienated the minds of many before well affected to Achometes; for that without any reverence of his Father, and contrary to the Law of Nations, he had violated the Embassadors sent to him for Peace. Upon the first bruit hereof, the Souldiers which then waited at the Court Gate, in the hearing of Bajazet exclaimed, that the infidelity of Achometes was not longer to be suffered, but forthwith by force to be repressed; that by suffrance and delay he would grow from evil to worse; and that if Bajazet should prolong the time, and in facterily seek by fair means to reclaim him, he should afterwards in vain crave the aid of his best Souldiers against his rebellious Son strengthened by his own long suffrance. Mahomet also the chief Baff, with Bajazet and others of great place (who secretly favoured Selymus, and had cunningly caught these things by fit men to be dispersed amongst the Souldiers) began at the first to mutter, and as it were to wonder at the strangeness and inhumanity of the Fact, in such like sort, as if they had condemned the Deed done, but not the Doer. But afterward, when they saw that Bajazet was thoroughly heated, both by his own angry disposition and the speech of the Souldiers, and upon the confidence of his former Victory against Selymus, now ready to seek revenge; they began then to heap fresh coals upon the fire, and bitterly to inveigh against Achometes, as a Traitor to his aged Father and the State; and withal highly commended the Fidelity and Courage of the Janizaries and Souldiers of the Court, who for the safety and honour of their aged Emperor, were most preit and ready to expose themselves, their lives, and whatsoever else they had, unto new dangers.

So was Achometes by the craft and subtlety of these great men, by the anger of his Father, and the judgment of the Souldiers, proclaimed Traitor; and order taken, that the Souldiers of the Court with the European Horsemen, should with all possible speed be sent against him into Asia. But when choice was to be made of some valiant and worthy General that might take upon him so great a Charge, which seemed especially to appertain unto some one of the great Baffices; it was strange to see, how they all began to strain to courtship at the preference, and every one to refuse refuse the place and disfigure himself, saying, That it were a great indignity, that the Emperors Army should be led against his Son by any of his Servants; and the Souldiers (having their selfe beforehand) said plainly, That they durst not, nor would they fight against his Son. And thus ended against the Son of the Emperour, and their Apparent of the Empire, except they were conducted and commanded by some of the Othoman Blood in person present with them; for so had his Brother, long before when he rebelled in Cilicia, and now of late, Selymus his rebellious Son, beene so much assisted by his Souldiers. And the conduct of Bayazet himself, and not by any of his Servants. These things all tended to this purpose, that Selymus might by indirect means be reconciled to his Father (whom they secretly favoured, although for fear of displeasure they durst not so much as to name him) but not by direct means, and this very means, to make way for his return to Constantinople, and so consequently give him power to seize upon the Empire. For it was probably supposed, that neither Bayazet himself, being very aged and diseased; neither Corusmus, altogether buried in his study, would undertake the Government of the Affairs of the Othoman Family: only Selymus was left, to whom that charge might be committed, all the Nephews of Bayazet by reason of their tender years, as yet unfit for the same. At these speeches of the Baffes and the Souldiers, Bayazet as a man perplexed and in doubt, flung away in discontent and rage, exclaiming, that his real Affairs, and diseased Body; but complaining deeply, that Corusmus in following the vain title of Learning, with a quiet contented kind of life, had in the mean time neglected other studies and honourable qualities, better befitting his Princely Birth, than to be thus buried in his study, and toiling with himself, and devising what course to take. Musapha the old Baffi, who all the time of his Reign had used to disburden him of his Cares, having by way of talk drawn him into a full discourse concerning the proceeding to the intended War, set upon him with this crafty and premeditated Speech, framed of purpose for his destruction.

Thou Majesty may not (most dread Sovereign)
 although by years and strength of Body you were never so well able, you may not I say, either transfer your Army, or your self plac'd into perform into Africa, to chase the Barbary troops from Libya, and chase Achomates, you leave a far more dangerous Enemy behind you in Europe, who may in your absence seize upon Thracia, Grecia, yea and the imperial City it self, destitute of sufficient defenders.
 Do you think, that Selymus strawling the new Forces greater Spirit and Courage, than to be daunted or dismayed with the misfortune of one battle? Or if you think that our own armies will be able to conquer and call Concitus into Europe with the Forces he levied the last year, who in time of your sickness may withstand the attempts of Selymus? will be far those self a most worthy and victorious Emperor? You are deceived, and (if I may be bold so to say) you thoroughly see not into the doubtful Event of things, if you think not, that you must at one time wage against two, and that you must either be the remainer part of your Empire, in Achomates and Europe;

 For whilst you shall go to expulse Achomates out of

Capadda, Selyms nearer at hand, and awaiting all opportunities, will by and by at your back, raise a most dangerous War in the very heart and chief strength of your Empire. But if you, moved with the greatness and due consideration of the danger, shall go about to defend Thracia, and for that purpose resist with you the most approved and faithful Soldiers, and the best of the Army of Asia, on a fire of your face; neither will Achomemans be able to resist if Welf and War, until such time as he hath drawn the Empire of Asia unto himself. Wherefore if it be not to be imputed to your fault, but to your fate or fortune, that two begotten of your self should by your self and the consent of all men be judged Traitors to your Crown and dignity; whereas the One through valour, the other through craft, and by your contentment, hath risen up in arms against you. Why do you not in so doubtful and perplexed a matter prefer safe and sound advice before that which maketh under the shew of Majesty and Honour; and whom you cannot both at one time correct and be revenged upon, to set upon them as occasion shall require. If they are together by the edge betwixt themselves; Then, by the way of safety, this is the only way, if you shall resolve (as I am sure you will) to drive out one nail with another, and so to overcome your Enemies. Moderate a while your hot desire of revenge, and for the present dissemble your grief; grant unto one of them pardon, and in such take him into your grace and favour, and lay him against the other; so shall you without danger, and without blood, have the one slain whom you love not, with the hazard of the other whom you trust not: and at your pleasure oppress him to whom you shall commit your Ensigns and Army, the hands of your faithful and trusty Soldiers being ever at your appointment ready to take revenge. So shall you with security make an end of this war, expelling ungrateful Achomemans from you, and rather to overcome (as your Enemy) by him whom you wish also to perish.

Mulissabai had scarce made an end of speaking, but the other Baffaes (as they had before agreed amongst themselves) began where he left, and with all their cunning laboured to pervert Bajazet to call home his Son Selymus, and to make him General of his Army against his Brother; faying, that he had already indured sufficient punishment for his former disloyalty, and that therefore he liked that he should be reduced Child would from thenceforth contain himself within the compais of his most dutiful obedience; whereas Achmet proud of his Birth-right, having of late violated his Fathers Embassadors, and filled all Asia with Rebellion, was not like to be brought to any reasonable comformity, until he were by force of Arms plucked down from his Throne; and in like manner as was his Brother Selymus of late, perceiving that in resolving of a matter of so great consequence, Cherogezes Baffa (his Son-in-law, and the only faithful Counsellor then about him) fat fell, hanging the head, as a man not of the same opinion with the rest, flood a great while in doubt what to resolve upon; he could not but have forgot, that he had already done against him by Selymus, who was yet alive, and he thought that he had out of Asia invades Europe, surprised Hadrinople, given him Bartel, endangered his person with his Tartarian Horsemen, and that only by the goodness of God he had obtained the Victory; on the other side, his Majesty considering, his Nephews imprisoned, his Country invaded, and the Cities of Asia ransacked, and all those goodly Countries presently burning with the fire of Rebellion, to filled his old heart heart with anger and indignation, as that he desired nothing more than to be revenged. Whilst he was thus struggling with his own thoughts, and doubtful what to do, the unfaithful Balaïes by deep deceit and treachery (Chefegies most infamously perfwading the contrary) overcame him so far, as with his own hand to write Letters to the Empress, promising him, that forgetting all injuries past, he would upon the hope of his Loyalty receive him into his former grace and favour, and make him General of his Army, if he would without delay repair to Comstantinople, and so pass over into Asia against his rebellious Brother Achomates.

Whilst these things are in doing at Confamingle, Cocurus advertised by Letters from his Friends of the weak estate of his aged Father, and by what persuasions he had been induced (after Achmetus was proclaimed Traitor) to call upon him Selymas, and to make him General of his Army; but when he was arrived at the place, and finding it unliking him in his Gallies, failed to Confamingle; where being arrived, he went presently to the Court, attended upon with a great number of his Friends and Favourites; and entering into the Privy Chamber, humbled himself before his Father, and kissed his hand; and after much talk had betwixt them of divers weighty matters, he was reported to have spoken unto him as follows:

It is now about thirty years, since I (most reverend Father, and dread Sovereign) pac'd that I (being chofen and proclaimed Emperor by the Prerogative of the Souldiers of the Court, by general consent of the Citizens of this imperial City, and by the grave judgement of the wise and grave Judges of the Court) have been oblig'd to my self, and to my glory, to leave you with mine own hand delivered from this self glorious world, and the pollution of this most glorious Kingdom and Empire: Which thing what worldly wight would have done? but either a mad man, or else a most kind and loving Son? Unto which so rare an example of a religious and loving heart, I was not by the least able to come up, but by the assistance and contemplation of your crows (sacred presence) and the due consideration of my duty. Neither did it in the course of so many years; ever repeat me of that my singular kindeff: and duty done, when as I contemning my self with such things as you had unto me assigned, and with the general commendation of my well affected friends, I was oblig'd to leave you, and to pursue the great estate and highst type of worldly honour, not to be compar'd with the quiet contentment of most pleasing studies: when as I account'd it a vain thing, and not becoming the resolution of a fitted and quiet mind, to long after thes'e worldly things, which being bad and enjoy'd to the full, work no full contentment in the insatiable desire, man and beast is furnished withall. Forsooth, O how false meditation of Heavenly things promit'd unto my contemplative and ravish'd mind, things of far more worth and Majesty than all the Kingdoms and Monarchies of the World. But whilst I was tracing this path, little regarding worldly honour, or the glory of an Empire, and was for pure Devotion and desire of the Kingdom of Heaven, I was oblig'd to leave Arabia, and the Altar of our most dread Prophet Mahomet, and so to the Indians, as to men of a more exact Knowledge and sincere Profession: you in the midst of my travell drew me out of Egypt by the long hands of the Egyptian Sultan, bad again into Phrygia: commanding me, that shewing the manifest signs of Heavenly things, which in my heart I had, I should fall into the hands of the learned Priests, to be more regard of my life and health, and to expect the fruits both of my Loyalty towards you, and of your fatherly Love towards me as if you had been then of opinion, that the time would come, when for the evil disposition of some, and the good of others, I should be obliged to the study of Wisdom and Learning, might be a stay both unto your self and the whole Ottoman Family. Since which time I have ever both dutifully obeyed your command, and with as much care and industry as I could, discharged my charge; and in the late Persian War, did with the assistance of my Field mine Army, wherewith I defended the Frontiers of my Province from the incursions of the Barbarians. But after that they were vanquished, and by your Forces driven out of the lesser Asia, and that my unworthy self, a greater General, the one of them in Europe, as a still more desperate Regiment, had in plain Battle assailed the person of your most sacred Majesty (his reverend Father, far spent with age, and then grievously tormented with the Gout) of purpose to have at once deprived you both of your Life and Empire, and of the Kingdom of Asia (seeking by this Disloyalty and most horrible Treason, to have in plain Battle, your Kingdom, had beheaded and taken Prisoner your Brothers Son, your Nephew, young Princes of great expectation, your faithful and loving Subjects;) and proceeding further, had set all that part of your Empire on fire and brul; I thought my self in duty bound to repair hither, to your Majesty, for I saw it was come to pass, not without the assistance of your Majesty, that I might at such time especially request the just reward of my due desert of you my most reverend and loving Father, the most religious observer of Equity and Justice; whom as you having had too good knowledge of the fidelity of your poor Brethren, might most fully and most advantageously perceive, in which you on that great occasion might even grant unto me your faithful and obedient Son, although my former deserts had merited no such thing. Wherefore most gracious Sir, I humbly pray and beseech you by all that tenderly Love and affection towards me, and known to me of your Majesty's favour, and the coming of Selymus, to have regard of mine Honour, with the state of your Empire's for when he shall once in Arms break in, he will at a trice cut off all hope of pacification; and supported by the Men of War, he will confound all things at his pleasure; for I have seen, and know, that he will be so. Therefore, O Commanders of your Armies, altered in disposition towards you, do but expect the good offer of time, when they may willingly salute for their Emperor and Sovereign, him, whom your good fortune of late full force against their Will, overthrow in open Field. I therefore beseech you, to have regard of mine self, and for the rare desert of mine ancient Loyalty towards you, as of good right due unto me, restore to me again what you may, and whilst it is yet in your power, in this sudden and momentary occasion now presented. For your Majesty shall in vain favour my most just and upright claim, after that you (having seen the same) shall have granted me my just and ambitious man have for ever lost your liberty, together with your self.

Constantine with tears standing in his Eyes having ended his Speech, the aged Emperor moved with a Fatherly Affection, and the reasonable persuasion of him, his only loyal and most kind Son, comforted him up with good words, and willed him to be of good cheer; and wittall discovered that he was a true Son, and a true Christian, in the loving home of Sophus; telling him further, that he could be well content to resign to him power of the Empire, but that it was not in his power to presently do so, for fear of the Soldiers of the Cæure; who had (as he said) of late wittifood him in the like motion, and would again with tooth and nail gallynify it, if he should attempt the least occasion for them to suspect any such matter.

matter; but that by the plot now laid, Selymus should under the title of honour be drawn out of Europe, together with the Soldiers of the Court, into Asia against Achometes, both bars unto his present desire for transferring of the Empire, in whose absence it should be in his power freely to dispose thereof at his pleasure; which he promised presently to resign unto him, so soon as they were once passed over into Asia. Which thing once done, although it were not altogether to their liking, yet feared he not, that either the Captains of Soldiers, who had of late so honourably and faithfully defended him against Selymus, should now for his sake dislike of Corusus, or attempt any thing not befitting the glory of their late desert; but rather hoped, that if his two unnatural and rebellious Sons, Achometes and Selymus, should once joyntly batten (as it was most like they should) that either the one or the other, by the just Judgment of God perished for their too great disobedience, murdered by the hands one of another. Corusus not much disliking of his Fathers purpose, and resting himself wholly upon his Favour, thought it not good further to argue the matter his Father had so well considered of; but taking his leave, returned to his lodging, not without hope of obtaining the Empire, and so remained many days after at Constantinople; during which time he fought neither by Gifts nor golden Promises to procure the love and good liking of the great Baffees or Soldiers of the Court; for that he as a plain upright man, thought it not good by suit and corruption (the great Promoters of the unworthy) to seek for that at their hands which was of right due unto him by his Fathers Favour and Promise.

In the mean time Selymus his last Friends advertising him of the coming of Corusus to the Court, advised him to make haste, and with all speed possible to come to Constantinople; for that it was to be feared, lest Bajazet being very aged, and vitally easily to be drawn away, might by the persuasion of Corusus be induced to alter, yea and perhaps quite break off the course before well for his most ready preference. Upon which news, Selymus attentively waiting upon nothing more than to have access unto his Friends in Court, and before resolved, at his first coming thither not to spare for any cost in corrupting the Men of War, and so to possess himself of the Empire; made now no stay, but with certain Troops of Horsemen, commanding the rest to follow after, came with wonderful celerity to Constantinople. Corusus with the great Baffees and Courtiers, and most part of the Soldiers of the Court, going to meet him at the Gate of the City, at his entrance received him with a kiss (as is the manner of the Turks) and brought him through the middle of the City, all the People running out by heaps to have a sight of the man, of late in every mans mouth for his desperate Rebellion, but now welcomed with much thundering Shot in token of triumph, and the joyful Acclamation of Men, Women, and Children, and People of all sorts. So that it easily appeared, that all the hatred before conceived against him for his late outrage against his Father, was now quite forgotten; and that he would in short time before his other Brother arise upon the Empire.

The next day after, Selymus came to the Court, and having access to his Father, fell prostrate before him and kissed his Feet, and with the greatest show of humility possible, craved of him pardon for his Disloyalty. O deep Dissembler, and Traitor of all other most treacherous! of late in Field with Sword drawn to have slain his aged Father, but now prostrate at his Feet; and within an hour mounted perforce into his Imperial Seat.

The old Emperor smiling upon this Crocodile, in most kind manner, took him up, and courteously said unto him:

Thy Faults, Son Selymus, are so much the less, for that they have found speedy repentance; wherefore do the more willingly grant thee pardon; but since thou hast hereafter endeavoured thyself, that God who hath bestowed on thee a notable Spirit and Courage, may also be thought to have indited thee with a good and well disposed Mind. There is a Marital matter ready, worthy thy hardness, wherein thou mayst sufficiently manifest unto the World thy forwardness and courage; there when time serveth let it appear.

Shortly after was called a Counsel for the Wars, but especially for the shuffling of a General to go against Achometes; the honour of which place where many would have given to Selymus, he began with great diffimulation to refuse, making as though he would not in any case be preferred before his Brother Corusus, to whom he would (as he said) willingly give place, both in respect of his years and learned discretion, who could no doubt with greater Authority and Willom manage that War: As for himself, now he had obtained his Fathers gracious Pardon and Favour, he could well content himself with any corner of the Empire, were it never so little.

But Corusus and his Friends, who had repented all their hope and all their devices in the departure of Selymus with the Soldiers of the Court; as if they had with great modesty contended on both sides, again perswaded him, yea and instantly requested him, not to refuse that honour by general consent without any difference to his Brother given to him as to a worthy Captain of great experience in Martial Affairs. So Selymus with wonderful cunning deluding Corusus and his Favourites, whilst he seemeth craftily to refuse the thing he most desired, is by the general consent of all parts chosen General of the Army; to go against his Brother Achometes, which was no sooner made known unto the Soldiers, especially the Janizaries and other Soldiers of the Court; but they before instructed, with loud Acclamations fluted him not for their General only, but for their Sovereign Lord and Emperor also; and so without further delay put themselves in Arms to defend and make good that they had done, if any better disposed should seem to withstand them or dissent from them.

Selymus by the Soldiers thus flattered Emperor, at first made shew as if he had been half unwilling to take upon him the Empire; and so began faintly to refuse it, as moved to do by the due reverence and regard of his Father, yet living. But after a while he suffered himself to be intreated; and then commending himself and his cause wholly to the Men of War, to bind them unto him the faster, promised beside the particular favours he ought them, to bestow a right great and general Largess amongst them; which he afterwards accordingly performed.

After that he received the chief Prefates and Commanders of the Army, there before sent, to go forth with unto his Father, and to take such order (seeing it was the mind of the whole Army) it should be so that the Empire might by his good Will, without further trouble or tumult be forthwith transferred unto him.

Mulapha the great Baffee, in whose wily head all this matter was (to his own worthy satisfaction) first hammered; whether it were upon a new furnace of his own, or that Selymus, (as it was given out) had threatened to kill him, except he would go and shew all the whole process of the matter to his Father; coming as a man diffamated to Bajazet, (who awaked with clamour and tumult of the Soldiers, was come out of his Chamber, into the open rooms of his Palace) in few words delivered unto him this most unwelcome Message, as followeth:

Emperor (said he) the Men of War have in their Counsel flattered Selymus both their General and Emperor, which their choice they require thee to ratify, being ready presently to break into the Court to kill us both, if thou shalt refuse forthwith to resign the Empire. They all with one consent request thee to resign the throne, which they have already put into the hands of another. Wherefore it is a thing of far more danger, to seek to recover that thou hast already lost, than willingly to yield that which is already taken from thee, seeing it is not by any force or policy to be regained. They in Arms, in fury, and now entered into Rebellion, think upon some greater mischief.

Bajazet troubled with fear and choler, and then too late perceiving the treachery of the Baffees, and how he had been by them betrayed, pausing a while at the strangeness of the matter, afterwards in fury broke out into these Words:

Faith and Forsworn, do you thus betray me? and with such monstrous villany requite mine infinite Bounty of old ty? Why do you not also as Murderers take away my Bajazet to life, which could not endure for a while to expect the dissolution of this my weak and aged body? but despite your just and lawful Sovereign, must needs in just hope sit up my wife and graceless! mean to resign over you my Kingdom good as it was with your desired Empire, the Centre of God, and Murderers of his Father; to whom ere it be long, you shall sell dearly pay the price of this your perfidious dealing and treachery against me. And be himself beginning his Empire by most unnatural treason, murder and bloodshed, shall now (I hope) escape the heavy hand of God, the undoubted and severe Revenger of so great Impiety and Treason.

Mulapha, with Bosfanges and Afax as false as himself, returning back again to the Soldiers, speaking not a word of the sorrow and indignation of Bajazet, told them how that he was well content to resign the Empire, and so had appointed Selymus (to whom both God and the general consent of the Men of War had already delivered the Empire) to succeed him in the Empire. When this their Speech was generally reported, they whom Selymus had before corrupted, began now to hold up their hands and look big on the matter; and others who before stood doubtful what to do, seeing now no other remedy, in half joynted themselves unto the same Faction. Whilst all these things were thus disorderly carried by the unruly Soldiers, Selymus was by them mounted upon a courageous Horse, and so with all Pomp conducted up and down most of the fair Streets of the imperial City; and with the general voice and clamor of the People (howsoever their minds were for most part otherwise affected) flattered Emperor. And the same day both the great Baffees and the Soldiers in general, were all solemnly sworn unto Selymus, as their only Lord and Emperor.

Corusus, whether it were for grief of his hope now lost, or fear of his life, although Selymus had promised to give him the City of Myrleus, with the Island of Lebes, secretly embarked himself, and so returned to Adenople.

Bajazet of late one of the greatest Monarchs of the World, but now thus thrust out of his Empire by his Son, detesting both him and the treachery of his Subjects, and overcome with sorrow and Melancholy, determined of himself, before he were thereto enticed by Selymus to forsake

Constantinople, and to retire himself to Dumetia (a small City wholly situated in Thracia, not far from Hadrinople, where in former time he had for his pleasure bestowed great cost, and now as he thought best fitted his present estate.) Wherefore causing great store of Treasure, Plate, Jewels, and rich Furniture to be trussed up, he with five hundred of his Household Servants, full of Heaviness and Sorrow, with Tears trickling down his aged cheeks, departed out of the Imperial City, towards Hadrinople, with purpose from thence to have gone to Dumetia. Selymus brought him about two miles upon his way, and so returning again to Constantinople, took possession of the Palace.

Bajazet being then about seventy five years old, or as some report full fourscore; and beside his old distaste of the Court, fore weakened with heaviness and grief of mind, was not able to travel above five or six miles a day, but was constrained by the extremity of his pain and weakness, to stay sometimes two or three days in a place. Whilst he was thus travelling, Selymus no less careful of the keeping of his Estate, than he had before been for the obtaining of the same, began now to doubt, That if he should depart from Constantinople, and with all his Forces pass over into Asia against his Brother Achometes, Bajazet in the mean time might in his absence return to Constantinople, and so again possess himself both of the City and Empire. Wherefore to rid himself of that fear, he resolved most Viper like, before his going to kill his Father, and so most unnaturally to deprive him of life, whom he had received life; such is the cruel and accursed Nature of Ambition, that it knoweth neither Father, Mother, Brother, Wife, Kindred, or Friend, no sometimes not her own Children; the fury whereof was never in any one more pregnant, than in this most monstrous and cruel Tyrant Selymus.

The readiest and most secret way he could devise for the effecting of this his damnable device, (which without great impiety could not be so much as once by him thought upon) was to work it by poison; upon which resolution he secretly compacted with Haman a Jew, his Fathers chief Physician, to poison him; promising him for his reward a Pension of ten Ducats a day during his life. And for that men are oftentimes with terror and fear, as well as with reward, enforced to be the ministers of mischief; he to be the more sure of this Jew, (prone enough for gain to do evil) threatened him with most cruel death, if he did not both secretly and speedily work this feat, commanding him so soon as he had done it, to return unto him to Constantinople.

The deceitful Jew moved both with the fear of death and hope of reward, (two great motives) coming shortly after to Bajazet, and finding him very weak, seeming to be very careful of him, told him, That he would prepare for him a portion, which should both redress to him his health, and also strengthen his weak body, if it would please him to take it the next morning early lying in his bed. Bajazet nothing distrusting his old Physician whom he had so often and so long trusted, said he would gladly take it. Early the next morning cometh the Jew with the deadly poison in a Cup of Gold, Bajazet yet sleeping, which he set down in the Chair of State, and so stood waiting until the aged Prince should of himself awake. But Bajazet sleeping soundly (as oftentimes it chanceth when men sleep their last) and wishal somewhat longer than flood with the Jews purpose, he presuming of his wonted practice, awaked him and told him, That the time to take the portion was almost past, and asked him if it were his pleasure then to take it. Bajazet doubting no Treason, willed him to bring it; whereof when the Jew had taken the essay, (having before himself taken a preservative against that poyson) he gave it to Bajazet to drink, who cheerfully drank it up; the Physician commanding them that waited in his Bed-Chamber, and attended on his person, to keep him well covered with warm clothes, and not to give him any thing to drink until he had well sweated. This cursed Jew having thus poisoned the aged Prince, to avoid the danger of the Fact, and to carry off the first news thereof to Selymus, secretly conveyed himself away, and in hast fled to Constantinople. But Bajazet attainted with the force of the Poyson, began first to feel most grievous gripings in his Stomach, the strong pain whereof appeared by his miserable complaining and heavy groaning; in the midst of which torments he gave up the Ghost in the year 1512, when he had reigned thirty years. The Turks report that he died a natural death, but Antonius Utrinus a Genoway, who at that time served in Bajazet his Chamber, and was present at his death, reporteth, That upon his dead Body the evident tokens of Poyson were to be seen. His dead Body with all his Treasures were presently brought back again to Constantinople, and delivered to Selymus, who caused the Body of his Father to be with the greatest solemnity that might be, buried in a most sumptuous Tomb, in a Chappel near unto the great Mahometan Temple, which he had before built for himself at Constantinople; which Monument there remaineth this day to be seen. His Servants were all by Selymus restored to their places which they before held in the Court in the time of their old Master, excepting five of the Pages of his Chamber, who lamenting the death of their Master above the rest, had attired themselves all in mourning Apparels for which cause they were by the commandment of Selymus cast into prison, where two of them were put to death; the other three at the suit of Selymus, Selymus his Son, and of other two Baskies, were saved; but being stript of their rich Apparel, and whatsoever else they had gotten under Bajazet, they were inrolled for Common Souldiers under Sulphares Bassa. Of these three, Antonius Utrinus (the Genoway before spoken of) was one, who after ten years miserable Captivity amongst the Turks, at last escaped at such time as Selymus was by the Persian discomfited; and with much ado returning again into Italy, wrote the History of all such things as he himself had there seen, with the calamities of Bajazet his House, and a great part of the tyrannous Reign of Selymus.

Haman the false Jew (as the same Author reporteth) coming to Constantinople, and expecting some great reward for his foul Treason, by the commandment of Selymus had his head presently struck off, with this exprobration of his Treachery, That opportunity serving, he would not stick for reward to do the like against Selymus himself. Of this Bajazet, Janus Vitalis writeth this Elogium:

Carmannos, Cilices, Sauromatasque domas:
Bajazeth, domi proles tua te petit armis,
Et te per Pandet amovet imperio.
Adjicit inde novum sceleris scelus, & tibi miscet
Pocula letiferis illita gramminibus.

The LIFE of

SELYMUS,

First of that NAME,

The THIRD and most WARLIKE
 Emperor of the Turks.

1512. THIS Selymus, by favour of the great Baffles and Men of War whom he had before corrupted, having deprived his Father Bajazet first of the Empire, and shortly after of his Life also, and now fully possessed of the Empire himself; first took view of the Treasures which the Turkish Kings and Emperors his Ancestors had before of long time heaped up in great abundance; out of which he gave unto the Soldiers of the Court two millions of Ducats; and for a perpetual remembrance of his thankfulness towards them augmented their daily wages, allowing unto every Horseman four Aspers a day, and to every Footman two, above their wonted allowance. By which exceeding bounty, he greatly assured unto himself the minds of the Men of War.

Selymus going in to Asia against his Brother Achomates.

Shortly after he passed over with a great Army into Asia, leaving the government of the Imperial City of Constantinople unto his only Son Selymus; and marching into Galatia came to the City of Anagor, in hope there to have oppressed his elder Brother Achomates, but he was understanding before of his coming, whilch wisely considering how unable he was to withstand his Forces, fled before into the Mountains of Cappadocia upon the Confines of Armenia, taking up men by the way as he went, and praying aid of all sorts of People, yea even of such as were but of small ability themselves, and unto him meer Strangers; that so he might in best manner he could, provide such strength as might serve him to make head against his Brother, and for the recovery of Asia.

Selymus having spent that Summer without doing any thing worth the speaking of, and considering that he could not well winter in that cold Country near unto the great Mountain Taurus, by reason of the deep Snows and extrem cold there usually falling, and that to go farther was to no purpose, forasmuch as Achomates flying from place to place, and Mountain to Mountain was not to be surprised, he retired back again into Bithynia, and sending his European Horsemen down to the Sea-coast, and the Janizaries to Constantinople; resolved to winter with the rest of his Army at Prusa. At which time being wholly bent against Achomates his Competitor of the Empire, he for certain years continued the League which his Father Bajazet had before concluded with Uladislau King of Hungary, Sigismundus King of Polonia, and the Venetians. And thinking no care (no not of Children) superfluous which might concern the establishing of his Empire, he called unto him five of his Brothers Sons, Orchemes the Son of Alem Scach; Mahometes the Son of Teian Scach; Orchemes, Emirja, and Musa the Sons of his Brother Mahometes; all young Princes of great hope, of years betwixt sixteen and twenty, excepting Musa who was not past seven years old; Of all these, Mahometes (whom his Uncle Achomates had a little before taken Prisoner at Laredo, as is before declared, and upon the death of Bajazet had again set him at liberty) being about twenty years old, was for rare Figure and Princely Courage accounted the Paragon and Beauty of the Othoman Family; which great perfection, as it won unto him the love and favour of the Men of War, and also of all the People in general; so did it hasten his speedy death, only Selymus his cruel Uncle envying at his life. After he had got these poor innocents into his hands, he sent for divers of his great Doctors and Lawyers, demanding of them, Whether it were not better that some five, eight, or ten persons should be taken away, than that the State of the whole Empire should with great effusion of Blood be rent in sunder, and so by civil Wars be brought in danger of utter ruin and destruction? Who although they well perceived whereunto that bloody question tended, yet for fear of displeasure they all answered, That it were better such a small number should perish, than that the whole State of the Empire should by Civil War and Discord be brought to confusion; in which general calamity, those few must also of necessity perish with the rest. Upon colour of this answer, and the necessity pretended, he commanded these his Nephews before named, to be led by five of his great Captains into the Castle of Prusa, where they were all the night following most cruelly strangled. It is reported, that Mahometes with a Pen-knife slew one of the bloody Executioners sent into his Chamber to kill him; and so wounded the other, as that he fell down for dead; and that Selymus being in a Chamber Chamber fast by, and almost an Eye-witness of that was done, presently sent in others, who first bound the poor Prince, and afterward strangled him with the rest; whose dead bodies were buried at Prusa among their Ancestors. The cruelty of this Fact wonderfully offended the minds of most men, inasmuch that many even of his Martial men filled with fierce indignation, for certain days absented themselves from his presence, thumning his fight as if he had been some fierce or raging Lion.

the Lists of Amurat
and Aladin, the Sons of A-

his Breth-
ther.

Of all the Nephews of old Bajazet, only Amurat and Aladin (the Sons of Achometes) yet remained, whom he purposed to surpise upon the fuddain, and so to rid himself of all fear of the Brothers Children; having then left none of his Othoman Family, but them and his two Brethren upon whom to exercise his further Cruelty. These two young Princes had a little before recovered the City of Amasia, from whence they were the Summer before expelled by their Uncle Selymus, at such time as Achometes their Father was glad to flee into the Mountains of Cappadocia. Selymus fully resolved upon their destruction, sent Ufegi one of his Baffes with five thousand Horsemen, who by great journeys travelling to Amasia, might upon the fuddain come upon these two young Princes, and take them altogether unprovided, and as then fearing no such danger, which was thought no great matter for the Baffa to do, forasmuch as he might with his light Horsemen easily prevent the lame of his coming; and the City of Amasia where they lay, was neither well walled, nor as then furnished with any sufficient Garrison for defence thereof; besides that, Achometes himself was at that time absent, busied in making up of Soldiers upon the Frontiers of Caramania. But Mulphaba the old Baffa, by whose special means Selymus had obtained the Empire (as is afore declared in the life of Bajazet) being privy unto his wicked purpose, and now in mind altogether alienated from him, detesting his most execrable Tyranny, both for the unworthy death of Bajazet, his Father, and the guiltless blood of so many young Princes his Nephews by him shed without all pity; and having compassion of the imminent danger whereto these two Brethren were now like also to fall; by secret and speedy Messengers gave them warning of the coming of the Baffa, and all that was intended against them. Who upon such knowledge given, presently advertised Achometes their Father thereof, and laid secret ambush to meet that within few days after the Baffa coming with his Horsemen towards Amasia, fell before he was awar into the midst of his Enemies; at which time also, Achometes following him at the heels, so that him in with his Army on every side, that most of his men being slain, he himself with divers other Captains were taken Prisoners and brought to Achometes, and by his commandment committed to safe custody.

Now it fortuned, that some of Achometes Soldiers spying that the Prisoners whom they had taken, told them how they had been deceived, and how all the matter had been carried (so hard a thing it is to have even the greatest Councils in Court kept secret) boasting that they wanted not their Friends, even of such as were most inward with Selymus, who secretly favored the better cause, and would not long follow the cruel Beasts to rage further: all which things Selymus his soldiers returned again after they were ransomed and retained home. But Ufegi the Baffa lying still in Prison, and getting certain knowledge of the whole matter, by secret Letters gave

Selymus to understand, that Mulphaba the great Baffa whom he most of all trusted, had secret intelligence with Achometes, and had been the only cause of the loss of his Army.

Selymus of late envying at the great Honour and Authority of Mulphaba, and wishing him dead, (whose desert he was not able, or at least unwilling to require) caused him upon this accusation without further trial to be secretly strangled in his fight, and his dead body (as it were in scorn of his former felicity) to be cast out into the Street for every man to gaze upon. This was the shameful end of this treacherous Baffa, who had of long time at his pleasure commanded all things in the Turkish Empire, and was for Riches, Power and Authority, next unto the Emperors themselves; but now lieth as a dead Dog in the Street, no man daring for fear to call earth upon him. A rare spectacle of the uncertainty of worldly Felicity, and a worthy example of Disloyalty. But Achometes hearing what had happened to Mulphaba, in revenge thereof, as according to his courteous nature let all the rest of the Prisoners at liberty.

Selymus thirsting after nothing more than the guiltless blood of his Brethren and Nephews, upon whom he had against all right usurped the Kingdom, whereof he never thought himself sufficiently assured so long as any of them breathed; began with the first of the Spring to devise against them; he might first take away his with himself, how he might first take away his Brother Corcutus, who then lived at Magnesia, Brother Corcutus, who then lived at Magnesia, and having cast off all hope of the Empire, gave himself wholly to the study of Philosophy, which he (seduced with Ambition) had now in evil time a little before forsaken; but now retiring himself thereto again, as to his greatest contentment, spent his time in quiet contemplation, not attempting any thing against his cruel Brother usurping the Empire. Selymus resolved upon the destruction of this harmless Prince, suddenly commanded his Captains to make choice of ten thousand Horsemen to be in readiness within three days, giving it out that he would make an inroad upon the fuddain into Cappadocia. In the number of these Horsemen, Antonius Manervinus a Genoway, Author of this History (as he himself reporteth) was one.

All things being in readiness against the appointed time, Selymus in person himself set forward with his Army from Prusa, still keeping the way on the right hand; so that the Soldiers, who thought they should have marched directly into Cappadocia, and so to Amasia, as it was before commonly reported; began now to perceive by the contrary course they held, that they were to go for Lydia and Ionia. When a valiant Soldier among the rest, who had sometime served one of the Baffes in Corcutus his Court, by divers circumstances gathering the intention of Selymus, secretly conceived himself out of the Army, and being excellently well mounted, taking the nearest way, came to Magnesia, and gave Corcutus warning of the coming of his Brother. Corcutus considering the great danger he was in, richly rewarded the Messenger, and leaving his Houle in such order as it was wont to be, fled with two of his Servants to the Sea side, in hope to have found passage either into Crete or else Rhodes.

The next day after Corcutus was departed, early in the Morning came Selymus to the Castle of Magnesia before the rising of the Sun, in hope to have found Corcutus yet in his bed; but being deceived of his expectation, he fell into a great rage, and with cruel torments examined all his Brothers Servants and Eunuchs. What was become of him, and where he had hid himself? and with much ado got it out of them. That he had warning of his coming by a fugitive Soldier, and was thereupon fled, but whether they knew not. Wherefore Selymus staid there fifteen days, during which time he caused diligent search to be made all over the Country, and along the Sea Coast, for to have apprehended him. But when after much search he could hear no tidings of him, he caused all his Brothers Treasure and rich Furniture to be trussed up, and to be sent by Sea to Constantinople. So leaving one of his Captains with a thousand Horsemen in Garrison at Magnesia, he returned again to Prusa with as much speed as he came from thence; verily supposing, that his Brother was for safeguard of his life, by Sea fled into Italy. And while Selymus was thus gone, his Son in Law, lying with a Fleet of Gallies upon the Coast of Ionia, had taken from Corcutus all hope of escaping by Sea: so that he was fain to hide himself in a Cave near unto the Sea side, not far from Smyrna; living in hope, that after a few days the Fleet would depart, and so he should find some opportunity to escape.

After he had thus a great while in fear most miserably lived with Country Crabs and other like wild Beasts (as a Diet for a man of State, and was with extreme necessity enforced to find his man for relief to a poor Shepherds Cottage thereby, he was by a Country Peasant discovered to Gassime, who with too much diligence sought after his life; and being by him apprehended, was carried towards the Tyrant his Brother at Prusa.

Right welcome to Selymus was the report of his taking; who as soon as he understood that he was within a days journey of Prusa, sent one Kritzen-Ogli (who of his quaint look was called Kritzen-Zeinal) to strangle him upon the way, and to bring his dead Body to Prusa.

This Captain coming to Corcutus in the dead time of the night, and awaking him out of his sleep, told him his heavy Message; how that he was sent from his Brother Selymus to see him executed, which must as he said presently be done. Corcutus exceedingly troubled with these heavy news, and fetching a deep sigh, desired the Captain so long to spare his life, until he might write a few short lines unto his Brother Selymus. Which poor request being granted, he called for Pen and Paper, and readily in Turkish Verse (for he had spent all his time in study) reproved his Brother of most horrible Cruelty; upbraiding him, that he had not only most disloyally thrust his Father out of his Empire, but also most unaturally deprived him of Life, of whom he had before received the fame; and not so content, had most tyrannously slain his Brothers Children; and now like an unmerciful wretch thirsted after the guiltless blood of himself, and Achometes his Brethren. At last concluding his Letters with many a bitter curse, he besought God to take of him just revenge for so much innocent blood by him most unaturally spilt. And when he had thus much written, he requested the Captain, that it might together with his dead body be delivered unto Selymus. So without any further delay he was according to the Tyrants command presently strangled. The next day after, when the dead body was presented unto Selymus, he uncovered the face thereof, to be sure that it was he, and seeing a Paper in his hand, took it from him; but when he had read it (for all his cruel nature and stony heart) he burst out into tears; protesting that he was never so much grieved or troubled with any mans death as with his; for which cause, he commanded general mourning to be made for him in the Court, and with Princely solemnity buried his body. Three days after, he caused fifteen of those diligent searchers who first found Corcutus, to have their Heads struck off, and their bodies to be flung into the Sea, saying, That if he were by any extremity driven to fly and hide his Head, they would not stick to serve him in like manner as they had done his Brother.

Now of all the Posterity of Bajazet remained none alive to trouble the cruel Tyrants thoughts but only Achometes and his two Sons; who upon the approach of the Spring, set forward with his Army from Amasia, excited by the often Letters of his Friends, who assured him, that Selymus might upon the fuddain be easily oppressed, if he would with all expedition come to Prusa; forasmuch as the Janizaries and European Horsemen, the undoubted strength of his Army, were at that time absent, and he himself as one hated both of God and Man, could not in so fuddain and unexpected danger tell what he were best to do, or which way to turn himself; wherefore they wished him without delay to hasten his coming, and not to expect the milder Weather of the Spring. Left in the mean time Selymus should call together his dispersed Forces, God (they said) did oftentimes offer unto men, both the opportunity and means to do great matters if they had the power to lay hold thereon, and therefore he should do well now by celerity and courage to seek to better his evil Fortune, which but a little before had bereft him of his Fathers Kingdom; for if Summer were once come on, he must either gain the Victory by plain Battle, which would be a hard matter, or else get him packing out of Cappadocia and all Asia the less.

Achometes, who before had promised unto himself better success, as well for the great Strength he had of his own, as for the new supply of Horsemen he had procured from Hymael the Persian King, but especially for the hope he had, that Selymus generally hated for his late Cruelty, should in the time of the Battle be forsaken of his own Soldiers; yielded to the persuasions of his Friends, who with many pleasing words fed before his Eyes glorious things, easy to be spoken, but hard to be effected. Wherefore, when he was come into Galaia with somewhat more than fifteen thousand Horsemen, having for half left his Footmen by easy marches to come after him, Selymus advertised of his coming, by speedy Messengers sent for his Horsemen to Prusa. In the mean time whilst he is levying other common Soldiers, and expecting the rest of his Forces, Fortune which always favoured his attempts, did then also aver the danger prepared for him by the unfaithfulness of his Followers, and shewed to him the open way to Victory. For Achometes secret Friends which were in Selymus his Camp, concluding firm in their good will toward him, did earnestly by Letters persuade him (being already set forward, and now come as far as Paphlagonia) to make halt, and to come before Selymus his Forces were come together; for that he had sent for the Janizaries, and European Horsemen, and did with all speed and diligence make all the preparation he could possibly, which for all that would all come late, and he should upon the fuddain come upon him, before he were provided. Which Letters being by chance intercepted, gave Selymus certain knowledge both of his

his Brothers purpose and coming, together with the Trefalon intended against him by his own Servants; wherefore executing them who had writ those Letters, he in their names caused others to the same effect to be written to Achomates, perswading him with all force possible to come to him, and not to stay for his Footmen, for that Selymus might easily be oppressed with a few Troops of Horsemen, if Achomates would with speed but come and show himself unto his Friends and Favourites; who upon the first signal of Batel would raise a tumult in the Army, and upon the sudden kill Selymus, and having got the victory in the Batel. Which Letters so written, Selymus caused to be signed with the Seals of them whom he had before executed, and found means to have them cunningly delivered to Achomates, as if they had been sent from his Friends; who giving credit to the fame, and presuming much upon his own Strength, doubted not to leave his Footmen, who followed easily after him, under the conduct of Amurat his Son; and came and encamped with his Horsemen near unto the Mountain Horminus, upon the Bank of the River Parthemus. Selymus also departed from Prusa, and having received into his Army ten thousand Janizaries (but a little before came over the Strait) sent before Sinan Baf, General of his Asian Horsemen, to know and make proof of the Strength of his Enemies. The Bafsa not knowing as yet where Achomates lay, neither of what force he was, being deceived by the darkness of the Morning, fell into a place of disadvantage, where he was met by the Army of Selymus, who lost seven thousand of his men, was glad with other eight thousand which were left, to fly back to Selymus.

For all this loss, was not Selymus discomfited, or doubtful of the Victory, but forthwith marched on forward to the River Elatas, which runneth directly out of the Mountain Horminus into Pontus, watering most large Fields upon the right hand, which at this day are called the Plains of the new Land. So did Achomates also, who although he knew his Brother to be every way too strong for him, yet being incouraged by the late Victory, and in hope that his Friends in Selymus his Army whom he vainly supposed to have been yet living) would in the very Batel do some notable matter for him, and that Victory would follow his just quarrel; resolved neither to retire back, neither to expect the coming of the rest of his Army. The River was between the two Camps, and the number of both Armies certainly discovered, yet could not Achomates (to whom the open Fields offered a safe retreat unto the rest of his Army) possessed with a fatal madness, be perswaded (considering the greatness of the danger) in time to provide for the safety of himself and his Army, by a sudden retreat; but by inevitable destiny to his fatal destruction, which presently after ensued.

Selymus a little before the going down of the Sun, with his Army passed over the River Elatas, and gave general commandment through all his Camp that every man against the next day should be ready for batel; and in a Wood not far off placed a thousand Horsemen in ambush, under the leading of Canoglis, his Wives Brother, a valiant young Gentleman, whom his Father had a little before sent from Taurica unto his Son in law with a chosen Company of Tartarian Horsemen; untill Selymus gave in charge, that when the Batel was joyned, he should show himself with his Horsemen upon the back of his Enemies, and there to charge them.

River.

As soon as it was day, Selymus in a great open Field put his Army in order of Batel, placing his Horsemen in two Wings, so that all his Spearmen were in the right Wing, and the Archers and Carabins in the left; in the main Batel stood the Janizaries with the rest of the Footmen. On the other side Achomates having no Footmen, divided his Horsemen into two Wings also.

Whilst both Armies stood thus ranged, expecting but the signal of Batel, a Messenger came from Achomates to Selymus, offering in his Masters name, to trie the equity of their quarrel in plain Combat hand to hand; with this offer he did refuse, he then took both God and the World to witness, that Selymus was the only cause of all the guiltless blood to be shed in the Batel, and not he; whereunto Selymus answered, that he was not to trie his quarrel at the appointment of Achomates; and though he could be content so to do, yet would not his Soldiers suffer him so to adventure his person and their own safety; and so with that answer returned the Messenger back again to his Master, giving him for his reward a thousand Aspers.

Achomates having received this answer, without further delay charged the right Wing of his Brothers Army, who valiantly received the first charge; but when they were come to the sword, and that the matter was to be tried by handy blows, they were not able longer to endure the force of the Persian Horsemen; who being well armed both Horse and Man, had before requested to be placed in the foremost ranks, by whose Valour should the right of Selymus his Army was disordered, and not without great loss enforced to retire back upon their Fellows. Which thing Selymus beholding, did what he might by all means to encourage them again; and presently brought on the left Wing with their Arrows and Pilots, instead of them that were fled; and as the same time came on with the Janizaries also, who with their Shot enforced Achomates his Horsemen to retire. Achomates himself carefully attending every danger, with greater Courage than Fortune came in with fresh Troops of Horsemen, by whose Valour the Batel before declining was again renewed, and the Victory made doubtful; but in the fury of this Batel whilst he was bearing all down before him, and now in great hope of the Victory, Canoglis with his Tartarian Horsemen rising out of ambush, came behind him, and with great outcries caused their Enemies (then in the greatest heat of their Fight) to turn upon them; at which time also the Footmen standing close together assailed them afront, and the Horsemen whom the Persians had at first put to flight, now moved with flame, were again returned into the Batel; so that Achomates his final Army was beset, and hardly assailed on every side. In fine his Ensigns being overthrow, and many of his Men slain, the rest were fain betake themselves to flight. Where Achomates having lost the Field, and now too late seeking to save himself by flight, fell with his Horse into a Ditch, which the rain filling the day before, had filled with water and mire; and being there known and taken by his Enemies, could not obtain so much favour at their hands as to be presently slain, but was reserved to the farther pleasure of his cruel Brother. Selymus understanding of his taking, sent Kiregen (the same squint-eyed Captain which before had strangled Cornelius) who with a Bow-string frangled him also. His dead Body was forthwith brought to Selymus, and was afterwards by his commandment in royal manner buried with his Ancestors at Ergla.

Now Amurat, Achomates his Son, understanding upon the way by the Persian Horsemen (who ferred together, had again made themselves way through the Turks Army) of the loss of the Field and the taking of his Father, returned back again to Amur; and there after good deliberation, resolved with his Brother to leave themselves both to fight; he with the Persian Horsemen, passing over the River Euphrates, fled unto the younger Persian King; but Aladin the Hymmer Brother passing over the Mountain Amarus in Cilicia, fled into Syria, and so to Campfan Gaurus the great Sultan of Egypt.

After the Victory, Selymus having in short time and with little trouble brought all the left of Asia under his obedience; and there at his pleasure disposed of all things, determined to return to Constantinople; but understanding that the Plague was hot there, he changed his purpose, and passing over at Callipolis and so travelling through Gracia, came to Hadriacople, where he spent all the rest of the Summer, and all the Winter following; and afterward when the Mortality was ceased, returned to Constantinople; where it was found that an hundred and three score thousand had there died of the late Plague.

Hyfmas the Persian King, whose Fame had then filled the World, heard of the arrival of Amurat, sent for him, and demanded of him the cause of his coming. The distressed young Prince, who but of late had lost his Father, together with the hope of so great an Empire, and now glad for safeguard of his life to fly in to Amurat, was oppressed with sorrow, by his heavy Countenance and abundance of Tears, more than by Words, expressed the cause of his coming; yet in a short strained Speech, declared unto him, how that his Father, his Uncle, with the rest of his Cousins, all Princes of great Honour, had of late been cruelly murdered by the unmerciful Tyrant Selymus, who with fury fought also after the life of himself and his Brother, the poor remainders of the Orkoman Family, who to save their lives, were both glad to fly, his Brother into Egypt, and himself to the Feet of his Imperial Majesty.

Hyfmas moved with compassion, and deeming it a thing well becoming the greatness of his Fame, to take the poor exiled Prince into his protection and to give him relief, willed him to be of good comfort, and promised him Aid. And the more to assure him thereof, shortly after gave him one of his own Daughters in marriage. For it was thought, that if Selymus (for his Tyranny become odious to the World) should by any means miscarry (as with Tyrants commonly falleth out) that then in the Orkoman Family, fore shaken with his unnatural Cruelty, none was to be preferred before this poor Prince Amurat; besides that, it was supposed, that if he should invade him with an Army out of Perfia, that upon the first fight, all the lesser Asia mourning for the unworthy death of Achomates, would at once revolt from him, who for his Cruelty and shameful Murders had worthily deserved to be hated together both of God and Man.

Wherefore in the beginning of the Spring Hyfmas furnished Amurat his new Son in Law with ten thousand Horsemen, willing him to pass over the River Euphrates at Arifaga, and to enter into Cappadocia, as well to make proof how the People of that Country were affected towards him, as of the strength of the Enemy; after whom he sent Vala-Ogli, the most famous Chieftain amongst the Persians, with twenty thousand Horsemen more, with charge, That he should

(will follow Amurat within one days journey; and he himself with a far greater power laid behind in Armenia, doubting to want Victual, if he should have led to great an Army through those vast, barren and desolate places, whereby he must of necessity pass).

Amurat marching through the lesser Armenia, and entering into the Borders of Cappadocia, had some others he took by force, which he either sacked or else quite razed, and brought such a general fear upon the Inhabitants of that Province, that the People submitting to that Promise all the way as he went, it was thought he would have gone directly to Amur, had not Chendemus (an old Warlike Captain whom Selymus had left for his Lieutenant in Asia) with a great Army had met him at Scholia, which at this day is called Sivas; his Chendemus had also long before advertised Selymus both of the preparation and coming of the Persians, as soon as he had learned by his Espials, That they were passed the River Euphrates. Upon which news Selymus came presently over into Asia, and commanding all his Forces to meet together at Pusa, had with wonderful celerity levied thereabout forty thousand common Soldiers, which he soon as Amurat understood, as well by such informers as he had taken, as by advertisement from his Friends; although he was very desirous to have fought with Chendemus, yet doubting that if Selymus should with his wonted celerity come against him, he should be vanquished in the Straits of the Mountain Antitaurus, he retired back again to Vala-Ogli. But Selymus, who all that year had in his haughty thoughts been plotting some such notable exploit as were worthy his greatness, standing in doubt whether he should by Sea and Land invade Hungary, the Rhodes, or Italy, at that time fore shaken with Civil Wars; having now so fit an occasion given him by the Persians, to the great joy of all Christendom, converted himself wholly unto the East, and in thirty days march came to Asfaga. Where joining his Army with Chendemus, when he understood that his Enemies having harried the Country, were again retired, prick forward with the grief of the injury and desire of revenge, with hope of Victory he resolved to follow after them foot by foot, and forthwith to enter into Armenia the greater, the principal Province of the Persian Kingdom.

But the difficulties of this notable expedition, which were in Counsel propounded by them which had best knowledge of those Countries, were great and many, all which by his own good hap and invincible courage, he himself afterwards overcame; for the Soldiers which had in short time already marched by Land out of Ilyria, Epirus, and Macedonia, into Cappadocia, mult of necessity in this long expedition take upon them new labors; they were to endure the sharp and pinching cold of the huge Mountain Caucasus, and by and by after the most vehement and scorching heat in the Plains of Armenia the lesser, with extremest Thirst, Hunger, and most desperate want of all things; and well the more, for that the Persians in their Retreat (spoiling the Country as they went, had utterly destroyed all that might serve for the use of man, of purpose to leave nothing to their Enemies but want of all things, if they should pursue them; besides that, his most expert Captains stood in no small doubt of the petty Princes of Armenia the lesser, and the Mountain King Arctabulus, whom they were to leave behind them at their backs, without any great assurance of their Friendship, who

who they well knew would leave them, if any thing should happen otherwise than well to Selymus, either in the Batrel, or for want of Victuals, or in the frail passages. For they were to be relieved with Victuals from the Armenians: and Aladules Forces then in readiness, were neither for number nor power to be consumed; who with their Castles commodiously placed, and strong Garrisons, at his pleasure commanded all the fruits, passages, and entrances which led out of Cappadocia into Armenia and the Persian Kingdom: for all the Mountain Countries were under his command, and his Kingdom stretched from the Mountains called Selimus near unto Pontus, all alongst the great Mountain Taurus unto Armanus, which divideth Cilicia from Syria.

Amongst the rest, old Chendemus Viceroy of Natusia, a Man of great experience, and of all others in greatest credit, favour, and authority with Selymus, perswaded him to stay a while in Cappadocia, and there to refresh his European Soldiers already weary of their long Travel, and so to expect the coming of his Enemies. And to perswade him from the dangerous expedition into Persia, spake unto him as followeth:

It is not to be thought omit my sight and invisible Emperor, that the Persians are fled for fear, because they retired before they yet see upon us their Enemies: it is a juggles, and they plainly go about to entrap us, whiles they by flight make a false semblance of fear. Know we not what cunning Heads and able Bodies Persia breedeth? Will they thus flee? Turkish light Horsemen or Archers, which with their courageous United Hosts and their slow Irony Arm-ed, feared not the Scythian host? or (if they be too little) which by their Valour have vanquished so many Nations, and gained unto their King so great and large an Empire? Think you, that you have either greater or better Forces than had long ago, Caesar's own Uncle, or Great Mahomet your Grandfather's who divers times proving their Force against this Enemy, were more than once put to the worst. I my self then serving in their Camps near unto Trapezond and the Mountains of Nicopolis. I will not deny, but that the great Ordinance which you carry with you may stand you in great stead, so that if place may be found to bestow, so that place may be but this fortified Ground, the frozen and abrupt Mountains, with the vast and solitary Plains beyond them, terrify me, whom all the armed Forces of our Enemies in places of great advantage could not dismay. You must fight not only with your valiant Enemies, but with the difficulties of Nature also. Neither may your Majesty give any credit to the Armenians or Aladules, Princes of most doubtful Faith: although at your first setting forward they shew a fair Face, and seem never so friendly: for they will but expect and await some fit occasion to take you at an advantage, and so to set upon you when you least fear them. But advise you were assured of Victory, O what should worse Blood be shed? For the Soldiers to fight for you the same? with what other Soldiers, with what other Forces will you defend Grecia, if the Christian Kings hearing that you for enlarging your Empire, or desire of Fame being gone into the furthest part of Armenia, shall in the mean time invade you? Wherefore if it be better and more wisdom, with safety to defend your own, than with danger to fight for you the same? if Princes of doubtful Policy have respect the glory of their Victory, not in the greatness of the slaughter of their Enemies, but in the safety and preservation of their own Soldiers: spare to object your self and your Army to most manifest danger, and unadvisedly to commit all at once to the hazard of great Fortune: which being a most foolish and unwise

Mistress, if she shall but once daily with your dangerous attempts, you shall through your rashness in far shorter space tumble down head-long from the top of so great Majesty, than you have thereunto a while ago by your rare Virtues worthily aspired.

Selymus as he was of a rough and fierce Nature, so would he have all things done according to his own device and direction: and though he were not a little moved with this Speech of fo grave a Counsellor and most expert Commander, and saw many of his Captains troubled with the imagination of the future danger: yet in a fume refusing some little of that which Chendemus had said, he dismissed the Council, protesting openly, that he would proceed in his intended purpose, hap what hap should, from Friend or Foe: although that old Fellow were (as he said) so careful of his life, that he feared to die a noble Death. Which Selymus had no sooner said, but presently others about him, accustomed to serve his Humor, which envied at the glory and wealth of old Chendemus, took hold upon these words, and beginning with the greatness of his Forces, the valour of his Soldiers, the force of his Artillery, with his own invincible Fortune, made easy matters of all the former difficulties, and with great words laboured to extenuate all that the grave Basia had before said concerning the prowess and power of the Enemy. After that, they began to discredit Chendemus, saying, That he (being a martial Man, and of known reputation in all his most warlike Actions) had not said a false semblance of courage, of any distrust he had of the Victory, but of purpose to hinder that most honourable Expedition, and to cut off all hope of Victory, which was (as they said) as good as already gotten: being before loaded with Amurats his great Promises, and the Gold of Persia. Wherefore they wished him to beware of the loss of his great wealth and treason, and to proceed on in his Expedition so much the more boldly: and not to think that his Soldiers would refuse any danger or labour, so long as they saw courage in himself, but would be ready (as they said) to undertake the most desperate difficulties of War, and desired nothing more, than to be conducted into those far Countries, where by their martial Prowess and valiant Acts they might make their Emperor Selymus equal with the Great Alexander, and themselves comparable to his Macedonians. And to work the utter destruction of this most faithful Counsellor without all recovery, these false Flatterers furnished bold-faced Accusers, who falsely and shamefully affirmed, that he had received great sums of Money from Amurat, and did not therefore in time go against the Persian Robbers, whereby all the former Calamities happened (as they said) to that Province. For which pretended Cause, Selymus commanded Chendemus further hearing to be slain: but he desired to terrify others from like liberty of Speech; and withal to teach them, to deem those devices and counsels as most excellent, which their Sovereign thought as it were by divine Inspiration find out himself, and so to accept of them without contradiction. The sudden death of this most faithful Counsellor Chendemus, struck an exceeding fear into the minds of all Men, for that so honourable a Personage, of late in so great credit and favour with his Sovereign, was without hearing Executed; who they had known as a Man of great account, both for his prowess and policy, to have stood fast on Selymus his side, first in his Wars against his Father, and of late against his Brother: not doubting but that Selymus by nature cruel and suspicious even of cringes; would with little Tyranny, not spare Men of meaner calling, which spared not his dearest and most ancient Friends.

Selymus marching from Arsenge, came to the Confines of the lesser Armenian Kings, and of Aladules; where by his Embassadors he requested the Kings of those Nations (who were then in Arms) that they would join their Forces with his against the Persian, and to go with him into Armenia the great; promising that when the Wars were happily ended, he would give unto them all such Territories as should chance in those Wars to be taken from the Enemy as a reward of their Aid. But these poor Kings, which hated both Hydarnas and Selymus for their manifold injuries they daily received in the Frontiers of their Dominions, lying in the midst between them, (as commonly it falleth out, that the weakest go to the walls) craftily expecting the Event of this War, would not openly show themselves; but answered that they had taken up Arms for no other purpose, but for the defence of themselves and their Kingdoms. Not meaning in that doubtful War to bear themselves as Enemies unto either of those great Princes their Friends and Neighbors, of whose just grievances they were not able worthy to determine; yet if he would without Hostility in reasonable manner pass through their Dominions, they promised to give free passages unto him and his Army; and after he was entered into Armenia the greater, to relieve him with such Provision of Victual as their bare Countries could afford.

Selymus thus deceived of his this first Hope, (for why he thought that those poor Kings, who were the first, either for love or fear have been ready to have done him all the service they could) dissembled his grief for the present, as wholly bent against Hydarnas, fearing that if he should by word or deed defend those poorer Princes, he should have them at his back his most assured and most dangerous Enemies. Wherefore passing the Mountains called Pendjes, he came in eight days unto the great Mountain called Mofchi, which the famous River Euphrates, with his mighty stream and huge broken banks, separateth from the great Mountain Antitaurus, and with perpetual steep ridges runneth into Iberia and Celchis, and on the East discovereth Armenia the greater; here Selymus with Ensigns displayed marching along the bank of the River, departed not from the same, for fear to lack Water in that hot and dry Country; and so held on his way directly Eastward, leaving the Country of Armenia the less upon his left Hand, and the Frontiers of the Kingdom of Aladules on the right, until he came unto the Mountain Persia. This great Mountain, famous by the rising of two great, and notable Rivers out of it, is for the wonderful fertility of all things, of the barbarous People called Lepus, which is to say, fruitful, for Euphrates and Araxes there running out of two divers and contrary Mouths, with many arms, water and enrich that champaign and dry Country every way, if happily they could intercept some which might give him the knowledge of his Enemies. But the Armenians, whether it were for fear of the coming of the Turks, or that Hydarnas their King had so commanded, were all before fled out of that part of the Country, where by Selymus was to pass with his Army; and having forsaken their Houses and carried away with them, or else by Fire destroyed whatsoever might serve for the use of Man.

The Turkish Scouts after they had by the space of two days scoured up and down the Country, returned back again to Selymus, not having taken so much as any one Man; shewing unto him, That all things were destroyed before him, and nothing left but wild Fields and a most desolate Country, without any appearance of Man or Beast; and that they were of opinion that either the Armenian Guilds were deceived in the way, or else had of purpose brought them into such desert places, whereas wanting Pasture for their Horses, and Food for Men, they must needs together perish with Hunger. Which their present fear was greatly increased by the weak Kings whom they had left behind them at their backs; but especially by the hatred both Hydarnas and Selymus had had a few days at the first taken the Turks with Victual, but after they were further entered into Armenia, performed nothing of that he had before most faithfully promised; seeking therein the favor of Hydarnas, who he thought would with the same good fortune vanquish the Turks; that he had not long before the greatest part of the East. Selymus perplexed in mind, began now to suspect Treason, to fear Famine, to dread the Deserts and forsaken places, and with grief of mind to call to remembrance all that old Chendemus his faithful Counsellor had before most truly told him; for that he, who showed himself in so reasonable manner, with cheerful Countenance, as a Man nothing dismayed; which firm constancy seemed to promise unto their discouraged minds good success, with speedy Victory. Wherefore calling unto him his Guilds, and such as best knew the Country, and understanding by them, that on the right Hand beyond the Mountain Persia lay the rich and fertile Country of all Armenia, he rose with his Army, and compassing the Hill toward the North, turned down toward the River Araxes, and above the City of Coy passed his Army over the River, his Footmen by little Bridges, and his Horsemen by Fords; for Araxes, until it have passed such Rivers as fall into it out of the Mouths of Pendjes, runneth but with a small stream, and in some places eafie to be passed over.

Selymus had scarcely well got over the River, and incamped his great Army, when Vasfa Oglu (who having joyined his Forces with Amurat, lying incamped not far off and fearing lest the City of Coy and the unprovided Citizens should by the sudden coming of the Enemy be oppressed) quickly rose with his Army, and set forwards to meet the Turks, for that City of all others in that Country, for fresh Fountains and Rivers, most pleasant (wherein the Persian Kings for the great plenty of all manner of Fruit, and whollomness of the Air, leaving Taurus were wont to spend most part of the Summer) had then in many rich Citizens, and sumptuous Buildings; which Vasfa Oglu thought good betimes to refuse, and not with dishonour to lose that rich City, looking as it were upon it, and leaving it unto the Enemy, to suffer him there to refresh his hunger-starved Soldiers with plenty of all things. Callistan an Armenian Born, and present in those Wars, who by many good probabilities (as he writeth) shew unto him, That this City of Coy was in ancient time that most famous City which was called Artaxata, which Domitius Corbulo destroyed. Neither did Hydarnas himself (although he had but a little before sent the greatest part of his Forces against the Caramani, who were then risen up against him in Rebellion, as he that made no great reckoning of the Turks, or ever thought that they durst have come so far into Armenia) make any delay, but forthwith as soon as he had heard of the coming of Selymus, came also in person himself unto his Army.

By chance Vasfa Oglu (who contrary to all Mens expectation had until then slunked to fight, or come come in fight of his Enemies, of purpose with less danger and loss of Men to overthrow them afterwards, being fore weakened and almost spent with long Travel and want of Victuals) lay then incamped near the City, when as the Turkish Scouts, upon the coming of Hyfmael, perceived by the great rising of the dust, and by the neighing of the Perfian Horses, that some greater power was at hand. Which so soon as it was noised in the Turkish Camp, they began to rejoice exceedingly, and to conceive the first hope both of their safety and victory; glad, that now meeting with their Enemies, they should either by Victory turn their labour, toil, famine, and extremities wherewith they had of long time driven, into ease and plenty of all things, or else by honourable death and all their miseries at once: for many of the Horsemen, especially of them that came out of Europe, whose Horses were starved for want of Forrage, and the common Footmen spent with long Travel, and grievously troubled with the Flux, (who travelling in the extreme heat of the Sun, had for most part lived upon Crabs and other wild Fruits, with a bad dipping made of Meal and Vinegar, and almost despairing to get the fight of their Enemies) began now to die in every corner.

Hyfmael as soon as he was come within sight of his Enemies, reposing great confidence as well in the valour of his Soldiers, as in his own rare Fortune, the more to terrify them, thought it good forthwith to give them Battle: Thereupon he sent an Herald unto Selymus, accompanied with certain skillful Soldiers, which should in best sort they could take view of the number and force of their Enemies, of their Artillery and in what for they lay incamped; and to tell him, That forasmuch as he had no Title unto Armenia, nor that the Turks had at any time claimed any interest therein, he could not but marvel, why he had against all right entered with his Army into his Dominion: but if he happily upon a vain presumption, to the imitation of Alexander of Macedon, should think too much of the World his own, as he could by the Sword and his own good Fortune win, he should then make himself ready against the next day to make proof of his Fortune, and the Forces of others not inferior to his own.

Whereunto Selymus answered, That the fresh remembrance of the manifold Injuries done to the Turks by the Perfians, was such, as might give him just cause to take up Arms: for as much as long ago both his Grandfather Mahomet the Great, and his Uncle Cajum, and even of late his Father Bajazet, and he himself also in his Wars against his Brother Achomet, had received great wrong and dishonour from the Perfians. All which things, although they were of themselves important, yet he esteemed not of them as sufficient causes of War, but only fought after his Enemy Amurat, his Brothers Son, who had of late spoiled Cappadocia; whom if he would quietly and friendly deliver unto him, as the mutual Laws of amity and friendship amongst Princes of Estates and Kingdoms required, then he would withdraw his Forces, and peaceably return into his Kingdom; otherwise, he threatened with Fire and Sword to destroy, not the Frontiers of Armenia, but even the heart of Perfia. And so dismissing the Herald, both the Armies for that day lay still in their Trenches, expecting the dreadful issue of Battle.

The next day Selymus by perswasion of his Captains brought his Army into the open Field, and in order of Battle set forward against his Enemies, which lay about two Miles off, thinking that Hyfmael, a Prince of so great name, would without delay accept of Battle: yet what though the Perfian King was of what number of Men he had, what manner of Horsemen, how Armed, and with what Weapons, he could not certainly learn: for beside that the Perfians are by nature ingenious and subtil, the Soldiers generally so revered and loved Hyfmael their King, that not one was found to have gone from him to the Turk; whereas many revolted from Selymus to him, as it was afterwards learned of the Perfian Captains.

Selymus, who had at that time eighty thousand Horsemen under his Ensigns, placed Chafan Bassa his Lieutenant General of Europe, with his European Horsemen in the right Wing; and Snan Bassa with his Asian Horsemen in the left; and before them both the Acanziz, which were voluntary Horsemen, the forerunners of the Turks Army, who in hope of spoil follow the Turks Wars out of all Countries: In the middle Battle he placed the Aspi or Common Soldiers, which were and half naked People, as Men of little worth or estimation, are commonly thrust into the Front of the Turks Battels, to receive the first fury of the Enemy, and to blunt their Swords, more than for any other good service; directly behind them he bestowed his great Artillery, guarded with four thousand Horsemen: Last of all followed himself with his chosen Penions and Janizaries, compassed about with small field-Pieces, and his Carriages, as with a double Trench; for he had (as their manner is) so environed himself round with his felled Camels made fast one to another with long Chains, that they stood him in stead of a strong Trench, from whence he might speedily relieve any part of his distressed Army; and in case of extremity being in the midst of his strength, might as out of a sure Fort repulse the furious Assault of his Enemies. He also commanded his Footmen in the vanguard of his Battle, that upon the approach of the Enemies Horses, they should speedily withdraw themselves aside into two parts, leaving place for the great Ordnance which was placed behind them, to play in the middle between them. On the contrary part Hyfmael, who by the Turks Fugitives understood all the devices of his Enemies, calling unto him the chief Commanders of his Army, shewed unto them, That there was no doubt of the Victory, so that they could shun the fury of the great Artillery, which he assured them would easily be done: when they saw the Turkish Footmen divide themselves, they would also in like manner withdraw themselves into two parts, and give place to the fury of the great Ordnance; for which purpose he caused two great Engines to be displaced, whereunto they should at the time appointed retire, the one for himself and those whom he conducted, the other for Vasfa Oglu and the rest of his Army.

Hyfmael (as Josius reporteth) had in his Army about thirty thousand Horsemen, without a great number of Footmen, amongst whom were ten thousand Men at Arms, resolute Gentlemen, of great experience; all gallantly mounted upon courageous barbed Horses, and themselves bravely Armed, both for the flesh and terror of the Enemy: their Weapons were a good Lance, a fure Sabre, and a Horseman's Mace; the rest were Armed with strong Curbises and Head-pieces, and were either Archers on Horseback, or else used light Horsemen's Swords made of Ash after the Spanish Fashion, wherewith they served as the half Staff. As for Guns they had none, in which thing only and number of Men, they were inferior inferior to the Turks. But such was the invincible courage and noble minds of the Perfians, that concerning the huge multitude of their Enemies (who were in number about three hundred thousand) and making no great reckoning of their great Artillery, they doubted not with few to give them Battle.

Hyfmael having given the signal of Battle, came on with his Army, exhorting his Soldiers then to remember the Honour they had long before gotten in many Battels, and courageously to follow him their Sovereign, whom they by their worthy service and many victories made the greatest Monarch of the East; telling them, that they should have now to do but with naked Men, whose Weapons were but weak Staves and light Targets, and their Horses little poor Jades almost dead with hunger, never able to abide the first charge of his valiant Men at Arms.

On the other side, Selymus perceiving the coming of his Enemies by the rising of the dust, caused knowledge to be given through his Army by his Captains and Officers, that the time of Battle which they had so long wished for, was now come; wherein if they would worthily accept themselves against those their proud Enemies, they should to their immortal Fame extend the Turkish Empire from the Perfian Sea to the Mountain Caucasus: but if they cowardly forgetting their ancient Prowess, should faint in time of Battle, they were not then to think by any means to escape by flight back again through those great Plains and desolate countries; where they should by the way either shamefully perish, or else to their perpetual infamy be taken Prisoners, and as base Slaves, during their lives be enforced to serve the Perfian Women; forasmuch as beside the great distance of the place, both the great River Euphrates, and the huge Mountain Taurus, and the faithless King Adalens, who had shut up all the passages, did cut off all hope from them, if they should be overcome, by any means possible to escape back again into Cappadocia.

When Hyfmael was come near with his Army, and the Aspi upon sign given dividing themselves, made place for the great Artillery to play, as was before appointed; he also presently dividing his Horsemen, charged the right Wing of the Turks Army, which with force, that after a most terrible fight betwixt the half armed Turks, and the valiant Perfian Men at Arms, Chafan Bassa, the great Commander of the European Horsemen, with the foremost of that Wing being slain, and many more after them, he enforced all that Wing to retire unto that place where Selymus himself with the Janizaries stood. On the other side, Vasfa Oglu having received no little harm by the Turks great Ordnance, because he had not so speedily cleared himself and his followers of that danger, as had Hyfmael, charged the Asian Horsemen in the left Wing, and there in bloody Battle made great slaughter of the Enemy, but not with like good hap as did Hyfmael; for whilst he most courageously in the foremost Ranks, assailed his Enemies, he was struck with a small shot and slain. With whose fall the Turks were greatly encouraged, inasmuch as that they which but now were glad to give ground, and had lost the third part of that Wing, began afresh to renew the Battle, and valiantly to withstand the Perfians; and with their Harquebusers (wherewith the Perfian Horsemen were wonderfully terrified) drove them head-long upon the Turks common Footmen. The Perfians whether it were forced by necessity for that they had lost so great a Commander, and not well able to govern their Horses, terrified with the thundering shot, or else for that the open side of the Footmen presented unto them greater place of advantage, setting themselves together brake through the middle of the Battle of those Turkish Footmen, and bearing them down before them with a mighty slaughter, came to the great Ordnance, and there flew the Canoniers, who discharging their Field-Pieces at all adventures, in that great medly made a foul slaughter, as well of their own Men as of their Enemies. And so without stop (as victorious Conquerors) made way through the midst of their Enemies, until they came to the right Wing, where Hyfmael was still hardly charging the European Horsemen, who having before lost their General, and being many of them slain or wounded, were already enforced to retire; but now charged afresh upon the side, had much ado to endure the fury of their Enemies, but as Men in extreme danger, were glad to cry to Selymus for help.

In this hard distress, Selymus in two places opened his Carriages, and with such flood as it were entrenched, and presently sent out part of his Horsemen. And by and by turning himself unto his Janizaries, said, This day Victory is reserved (most worthy Soldiers) unto your valour and labour, wherefore now valiantly set forward, and as fresh and courageous Men, assail your wearied Enemies; your Horses are all on a water with Sweat, and the Men themselves faint under the weight of their Armour. But yet for all that Selymus could say, those great Plains and desolate countries, where still, as Men willing in going to a dangerous to keep themselves within the safeguard for their Masters, were whistling at their leisure left forward, the Perfians in the midst of the heat of this Victory, compassing in the European Horsemen, flew them down, Selymus looking on and seeing in vain to help them. Fabrizius Carreus great Master of the Rhodes, who of all the things had certain intelligence, wrote to Leo the Tenth then Bishop of Rome, that the Janizaries refused to be commanded by their Masters, were not by any perswasion or intreaty to be induced to relieve the distressed European Horsemen; but as Men distrustful the event of the Battle, chose rather in their strength to expect the success thereof, than with most manifest danger to expose themselves unto the violence of the Perfian Horsemen, which had as a Tempest overturned the vanguard of the Turkish Footmen.

The Perfians were now ready on every side to have assailed Selymus in his greatest strength; when Snan Bassa, although the Wing he led was sore rent and weakened, yet following the Perfians through the midst of the heaps of the slain Footmen, came in, in good time for Selymus, and with certain fresh Troops which had escaped the fury of Vasfa Oglu, restored the Battle before almost lost; but especially by the invincible courage of Ala Beg and Adalens his Brother, descended of the honourable family of the Mahometziz, which for Nobility amongst the Turks is accounted next unto the Osmanis; both of them for courage resembling their Warlike Father Malcovezin, famous for that woful expedition he made into Friss against the Venicians in the Reign of Bajazet. Selymus also not yet discouraged but still in hope, commanded all the great Ordnance wherewith he was environed, which he had reserved as his last refuge, to be discharged; by the violence wherof, such slaughter was made, as well of his own Men as of his Enemies, mingled together, that what for dust, what for smoke, and thundering of the Artillery, having on both sides almost lost the use of sight and hearing, and their Horfes being fo terrified with the thundering report of the great Ordnance, that they were not now to be ruled, the Bartel was broken off; the Victory yet doubtful. The

The only day of Doom.

Hyfmael in this furious Batrel, having received
ſhot, by perſuaſion of his friends withdrew himſelf to have his Wound ſearched; which thing undoubtedly was the ſafeguard both of Selymus and his Army: for the Perſians by and by following their King, left the Victory, now in all Mens opinion almost gotten. But after that Hyfmael perceived the Wound was not deep, for that the ſtrength of his Armor had fo broken the force of the ſhot, that it pierced not far into his Body,
he was about to have charged the Turks aſreth:
but underſtanding of the death of Vaſſa Oglu, in whom for his ſingular experience in martial Affairs, he had reposed his greateſt confidence; and his Captains alſo perſuading him not to make fo light reckoning of his Wound, the grief whereof he yet felt not, being warm, but to have regard to his own Health: He in fearely order ſol-ly marched away in ſilence, that his departure had no reſemblance of flight. And paſſing by the City of Tauris, willed the chief of the Citizens to open the Gates of the City to Selymus (if he ſhould come thither) and to receive his Gar-riſons, rather than by vain conſtancy to fall into utter deſtruction; and ſo marched himſelf into the Conſines of Media.

The *Perſi-
an* Tents taken by the Turks.

But the Turks intrigued with many difficulties, having no hearts for ſo far, nor ſtrength for wearied to purſue their Enemies, yet coming to the Perſian Tents, took them without reſiſtance: where beſide the rich Pavillions wrought with Needle-work of Silk and Gold, and much other precious Furniture, many noble Ladies and Gentlewomen were found, which after the manner of the Perſians had followed their Husbands in thoſe Wars, whom Selymus cauſed to be all freely ſet at liberty untouched, excepting one of the Wives of Hyfmael, whom he detained and gave her in Marriage to one of his Baſſes.
Some which were preſent at this Bartel, reported that amongst the heaps of them that were ſlain, were found the dead bodies of divers Perſian Women, which being Armed, and following their Husbands, died with them in the Batrel; whom Selymus cauſed to be honourably buried.

Thus was that notable Bartel fought in the Galderan Fields near unto the City of Coy, betwixt thoſe two great Princes, the ſeventh day of Auguſt
in the year of our Lord, 1514. In which Bartel Selymus loſt above thirty thouſand Men, amongst whom was Chofan Baſſa his great Lieutenant in Europe's ſeven Sanzaks, in which were the two Malaccian Brethren, who labouring the one to reſcue the other, were both together ſlain.
Bide his command, and the great City of Tauris, leaſt reckoning he loſt moſt part of his Illyrian,
Maccedonian, Servian, Epirot, Theſſalian, and Thracian Horſemen, the undoubted flower and ſtrength of his Army, which were in that mortal Bartel almoſt all ſlain, or grievouſly wounded.

Selymus for all this great loſs, by the confeſſion of his Enemies having gotten the Victory, and receiving Embaſſadors from Coy and the Cities thereabouts, and the great City of Tauris, promiſing to relieve him with whatſoever he needed, and to do what elſe he ſhould command;
marched directly to Tauris, deſiring both to ſee and poſſeſs himſelf of that City, as one of the chief Palaces of the Perſian Kings. This City is two days journey diftant from Coy where the Bartel was fought, and is verily thought to be the famous City called in ancient time Ez-bahana, about an hundred and fifty Miles diftant from the Caspian Sea. The Citizens were ready at the coming of the Turks, and brought them great ſtore of Victuals out of the Gates of the City, where Selymus had lodged his Army in the Suburbs, thinking it no ſafety to lodge within that great and populous City, contenting himſelf to have the Gates thereof delivered unto him, which he kept with ſtrong Guard. Some report that Selymus durſt not truſt the Perſians, and therefore never went into the City but dif-guised in the Habit of a common Soldier. Yet ſome others ſay, that he did with great magnicent Banquet in the ſtately Palace of the Perſian

King, and there had great diſcours with them of Tauris concerning his late Victory. But whilt he thus ſtaid at Tauris, and with himſelf purpoſed to ſpend that Winter in Armenia, he called together his great Captains and Commanders of his Army, to know how they liked thereof;
who fearing his diſpleaſure, wholly referred themſelves to his own reſolution. Only Maſtaſpa his chief Baſſa chafed to ſay, That it were good that the minds of the Janizaries and the other Soldiers of the Court ſhould therein be known.
Which his Speech Selymus took in ſuch evil part, that he preſently commanded him out of his ſight, and deprived him of his greateſt Honour;
and the more to diſgrace him, ſent one of his Jeſſers
after him, who in great ſcorn and deriſion coming behind him, cut off part of his Tailcoat that hung down, as the Faſhion was. But the Jani-zaries underſtanding the matter, and much offended with the indignity offered unto the great Baſſa whom they dearly loved, roſe up all together in Arms, and told Selymus flatly, That they would not in any caſe Winter ſo far from home in the Enemies Country; and therefore that it were beſt for him beſides to conſider of the matter, ſo that they were reſolutely ſet down to forſake him if he would needs ſtay, and not with ſpeed return. Selymus much troubled with this infolency of the Janizaries, and hearing daily, that Hyfmael with new ſupplies out of Iberia,
Albania, and Parthia, was coming upon him with greater power than before, and conſider-ing withal what difficulty and danger he had eſcaped in the late Bartel, preferred rather by his good fortune and force of his great Artillery, than the valour and proofs of his Soldiers, and withal ſuſpecting the multitude and ſtrength of the Taurians, of whoſe fidelity he could make no reckoning, he changed his former determination, and reſolved again to return into Cappa-docia; whereupon having contrary to his promiſe exacted a great Maſs of Money from them of Tauris, he departed thence, carrying away with him three thouſand Men, the beſt Artificers in that City, eſpecially ſuch as were ſkilful in making of Armor and Weapons, and ſo with ſpeed retired towards the River Euphrates, a longer way than that whereby he came; fearing to return again by the head of Araxia and the Mountains Periander, for meeting the Iberian and Albanian Horſemen, who were reported to be then coming againſt him.

Hyfmael underſtanding of his departure, followed after with as much ſpeed as he could, leaving behind him for haſt his Carriages and ſuch of his Soldiers as were not able to endure
ſo long and ſpeedy a march: yet for all his haſt (forasmuch as Selymus was gone a great way before him) he could not overtake any part of his Army, until he was come to the great River Euphrates,

Euphrates, where Selymus ſtaying two days, and having made divers little Boats, was paſſing over his Footmen; which becauſe they were not ſufficient for the ſpeedy transportation of ſo great a multitude, many for haſt ſwam over the River with Bladders, and ſome adventured to go over upon the broken pieces of their Carriages, which they had for that purpoſe burſt in ſunder. Selymus himſelf got over to the farther Bank in a little Boat, having before cauſed his Horſemen with their Horſes at once to take the River, of purpoſe to break the violence of the ſtreem, whereby his Footmen and Camels with their burdens got over with leſs danger, and ſome of his Field-pieces were alſo with leſs difficulty tranſported; yet for all the ſpeed he could make, the Georgian Horſemen, the force of Hyfmael's Army, being come within ſight before the Turks were all got over, raiſed ſuch
a fear and a fit all along that ſide of the River, that two thouſand of the Turks were in their haſty paſſage there drowned, divers Field-pieces left ſticking in the Mud, and much of their Baggage carried away with the force of the River.
The Georgians conſidering themſelves with ſuch things as were left, purſued them no further:
for the wheels of the Turks Carriages entangled together with the violence of the ſtreem, had ſtayed a great part of the Turkish Traſh, floating in the River; and much more was in divers places driven upon the ſhore, all which the Georgian Horſemen eaſily drew out. Hyfmael in the mean time rejoicing at nothing more, than that having chafed away his Enemies, he had alſo recovered much of the great Ordnance whereby he had before received ſo great hurt.

Selymus by ſpeedy flight thus got out of the hands of the Perſians, found his paſſing much more dangerous at the Mountain Anitauras, than he had before thought of: for Aladulles, the Mountain King having now his fortune in contempt, and diligently waiting for his prey, had with his ſavage People before taken all the trait paſſages of the Mountain Country; who every night in theiſt manner aſſailed the Turks, as they with their weak and weary Companies paſſed through thoſe rough and broken ways; and robbing their Carriages, preſently fled into their haunts and places of refuge in the thick Woods and rocky Mountains. Aladulles himſelf in the mean time
(by whoſe flight all this was done) every day excusing himſelf, if it had been done againſt his will, by the rude mountain People, enured to ſuch deſperate Robberies, whom nevertheleſs
he ſaid he would in ſhort time ſeverely chaſtiſe fo ſoon as he could find the Authors thereof.
In the mean while, for ſaſhion ſake ſending a little ſpare Provision for certain days, did every night rob and ſpoil the Turks by his Soldiers, as they could take them in places of advantage.
Agaiſt which theiſt Selymus could neither by Policy, neither his Soldiers by Induſtry provide any ſufficient remedy. Wherefore diſ-ſembling the injuries he daily received, purpoſing to be thereof in time revenged, together with the ſoul and treacherous dealing of the faithleſs King; holding on his way, he with much ado came at length to Trapendaz, and from thence to Amſia, where he ſpent that Winter in repairing his ſoreweakened Army, purpoſing with the ſiſt of the Spring to make War upon Aladulles and the mountain People, who in his return had done him ſo great harm and injury.

In this fort Jovian, one of the great Hiſtoriogra-phers of that time, reporteth the aforeſaid Wars betwixt Hyfmael and Selymus, whoſe credit in that matter other Writers have ſince for moſt part followed. Howbeit, Jo. Ant. Manavimus, a Gene-way, who ſerved in thoſe Wars, doth in his Book concerning Turkiſh Affairs, dedicated to the French King, much otherwiſe report the ſame:

which to ſatiſſie the deſirous Reader, I have thought good here in few words to ſet down, as it is by himſelf reported.

Selymus (ſaith he) with his Army, in number about three hundred thouſand Men, being come to the River Euphrates, found the Bridge broken down by his Nephew Amuraz, and his Enemies encamped in convenient place on the farther ſide of the River, with their Forces greatly increaſed by new ſupplies lately ſent from the Perſian Army about ninety thouſand Men Horſe and Foot, the Horſemen for moſt part furniſhed with two Horſes apiece for ſervice: And though Selymus did what he might, to know whether the Perſian King were in perſon himſelf in the Camp, or elſe (which he moſt feared) was rai-ſing of greater Forces in Perſia, yet could he by no means learn the truth of that he deſired.
Wherefore repairing again the broken Bridge, he firſt ſent over his two great Lieutenants Jo. Gre-cia and Natolia, who paſſing over the River, encamped themſelves as they thought convenient. The next morning, about two hours before the riſing of the Sun, Amuraz ſuddenly aſſailed the great Commander of Grecia, Chofan Baſſa, in his Trenches, and by plain force diſcomfited
the Turks, and by good Fortune took from them their Tents: Whereupon ſuch a terror and fear came upon the other great Commander of Natolia, that his Soldiers thruſting themſelves for fear into the River, ſwam over with great danger, and again joyned themſelves with the reſt of the Army. Selymus troubled with the great loſs thus received, cauſed all his great Artillery to be placed all alongſt the highmoſt Bank of the River Euphrates; and becauſe the Enemy ſhould not perceive the ſame, ranged certain Companies of his Soldiers before the Ordnance, as if they ſhould preſently have paſſed the River:
who upon ſignal given, ſhould forthwith withdraw themſelves and give place to the great Ordnance bent upon the Enemy. But when Fire was given to theſe great Pieces, many of them being overcharged, burſt in ſunder, and ſlew divers of the Turks: Many alſo of their rich Horſes and Mules being ſunder unto the River ſide, and terrified with the thundering Shot, leaped into the River, and were there drowned together with their riders. The Perſians alſo receiving great loſs, retired farther off for fear of the great Artillery. So Selymus without reſiſtance paſſing over the River, marched forthwith toward the Enemy, whom the Perſians as Men nothing difmayed, notably encountered. The Bartel was of long time doubtful, and much Blood ſhed on both ſides; and if the approach of the night had not broke off that mortal Fight, the Perſian Army rather overcharged with the multitude of the Enemy, than vanquiſhed by valour, had undoubtedly received a great overthrow; but through the benefit of the night, they without further loſs eſcaped the purſue of the Turks.
Upon this Victory, Selymus left his Carriages and Baggage with his Footmen; and taking with him only his Horſemen, ſet forward with intention to have upon the ſudden ſurprized the regal
City of Tauris, before the news of the late fought Bartel could be carried thither: but in the mean time being no leſs careful of their affairs.

in the Battel, where coming to Hyfmael's thefe he craftily laid in the Turke way, commanding them upon the approach of the Enemy to fly as if it had been for fear. Selymus in the morning having defcried thefe Horfemen at hand, fupposing them to be fuch of his Enemies as being overtaken with the night, were not able to follow the rout of his Army, exhorted his Souldiers courageously to purfue their difcouraged Enemies.

The Persians feeing the Turks, of purpose be- took themselves to flight; and they following no deceit, followed fast after them, until that about mid-day being weary of the purfuit, and coming to a little River which was in their way, they there halted to refresh themselves; and after they had taken a short repast, again purfued the Persians, still leaving behind them fuch as were not able to fall to follow, prick forward with hope, that before night they should furprife and ransack the rich City of Tauris; and thefe Hyfmael's Horfemen thus drew far from the Footmen, the Persian Horfemen left in ambush, in the mean time fet upon the Turks Footmen, lying (as they fuppofed) in great security, and with a great slaughter overthrow them; at which time they also took all Selymus's his Treasure and great Artillery. Which overthrow was by speedy Pofts, about two a Clock in the night made known to Selymus (who now in his mind already conceived the ficking of Tauris) and withal that the fierce Enemy was within at the heels. Selymus wonderfully abashed with this unexpected news, and the loss of his Footmen, forthwith came to retire; which the ten thousand Persians which had before of purpose fled, perceiving, now turning themselves upon the retiring Turks, charged them hardly; so Selymus enclofed both before and behind by his Enemies, received a great overthrow; and the Turks thus hardly be- trove, and almost despairing of their lives, and having lost their Legions, brake out fiercely to bat- tle, to rescue their Enemies and flock. Selymus seeing all desperate and forlorn, breed himself to fight aloft with the rest; and passing the River Euphrates, brake down the Bridge, which he had but a little before repaired, for fear the Persians should further purfue him, and with much trouble and no less danger coming at length to Amfias, assembled thither the relics of his difcomfited Army. Such of the Turks as remained behind, and were not able in flight to keep way with the rest, were all slain by the Persians.

The Genaway Author thus concludeth his History, that the Persian King did not more rejoyce at this Victory, than did he himself for the overthrow of the Turks, hoping in that their so great a confufion, to free himself of his long and miserable thraldom, and to find a way un- to his native Country Parents; as afterwards he did; for flying first to Trapfand, and then tak- ing passage into Europe, he came to Hadrin- ople, from whence he travelled by Land on foot to Salonica, and there chancing upon certain Ships of Christian Merchants which had brought Corn thither, he was by them transported un- to the Island of Chios; from whence he joyfully returned to Genoa his native Country, after he had amongst the Turks endured ten years Cap- tivity; most part whereof he lived as a Page in old Bajazet's Privy-Chamber, and the rest as a Souldier of the Court in the Reign of Selymus; and therefore well acquainted with the fashions of the Turks Court, and manners of that barbarous Nation.

Now shall it not (as I hope) be much from our purpose, here with Jovius a little to digress in comparing thefe two great Princes Hyfmael and

Selymus together, who in that Time had filled the World with the glory of their Fame; that wa- tered with bloody Broils, and the wonderful chances of War, may a little repose our selves with matter of a milder Van, neither unpleafant nor unprofitable.

These two mighty Princes, as they were for royal descent, strength of body, courage of mind, riches, and power, equal, and had there- by obtained like fame and renown; so in condi- tions and qualities of mind, and martial disci- pline, they much differed. First of all (beside the mutual hatred of the one Nation against the other, delivered as it were by Succession from their Grandfathers and Fathers) thefe two Princes, and so likewise their Subjects also, were at great odds about an idle Question of their vain Super- stition, the one preferring and honouring Eubeke- rik, Henavrik, and Otoman, as the most true and lightfull Successors of their great Prophet Mahomet; the other with no less devotion honouring Hely, and detesting the three former; differing otherwise in few or no points of their most fond Superstition; yet did they under the colour and zeal of their Religion (as they would have it) both pretend just causes of War, although their evil difsembled ambitious desires, plainly declar- ed unto the World, that they both ftoe at one and the same Mark, viz. By confirming their power and strength, to extend the bounds of their great Empires. For Hyfmael's of purpose affected the fame and glory of Darius and Xerxes the ancient Persian Kings; who having subdued Asia, with great boldness passed over into Eu- rope; and Selymus the greatness of Alexander of Macedon; who subverted the Persian Empire. Which their aspiring thoughts, masking under the veil of zeal towards their Religion, seemed not altogether vain; Fortune with like indiffer- ence immediately favouring their bold ambi- tions and endless desires. But in Hyfmael ap- peared such a wonderful devotion and gravity, that his haughty thoughts were with the reverend Majesty thereof covered; whereas in Selymus, his inhuman cruelty did blot and obscure all his o- ther princely Vertues; for he with reward and punishment retained the Majesty of his Empire, but with the greater fame of severity than bounty. Because it was expedient in the exact disci- pline of that fertile Government, whereof the greatest strength of the Ottoman Empire consist- ed, to use all rigor and severity; otherwise it stood with the State of Hyfmael, who leaved al- ways his Armies of his Nobility and Men free Born, with whom temperate Justice, civil Courte- sie, and popular Clemency, are of greater force, to win their Fidelity, Faith, and Loyalty; for that there is no Man well Born, which feareth not more the blench of infamy than the heaviness of punishment; so that it was not to be marvelled, if Hyfmael by fuch honorable Vertues did mightily defend the glory of his Majesty and Renown. Unto thefe his rare Vertues, was also joyned a comeliness of Face (the fairest gift of Nature) well befitting so great a Monarch; for he was well Colored, quick Eyed, yellow Bearded, and that which amongst the Persians is accounted the sign of ancient Nobility, hookt Nofed; and was withal exceeding Eloquent; by which good Gifts, he wonderfully won to himself both the Eyes and Hearts of fuch as beheld him. But in Selymus, his stern Countenance, his fierce and pierc- ing Eyes, his Tartar-like pale Color, his long Mustacho on his upperlip, like Britfles, frild back to his Neck, with his Beard cut close to his Chin, did fo exprefs his martial difpofition and inexor- able nature, that he seemed to the beholders to have nothing in him but Mischief and Cruelty. Which diversity of countenances was also accompanied with no less diversity of affections, and to con- sequently with far unlike manner of Govern- ment. For Hyfmael was of nature courteous and affable, eafie to be seen and spoken withal, doing nothing that befeemed his Regal Function, but in the fight of all men; his manner was to dine openly in the company of his Nobility, delighting much in Hawking and Hunting, ac- companying with his Noblemen and the Embaf- sadors of foreign Princes; He would oftentimes run, leap, and prove Maltresses with his chief Courtiers, being himself a most excellent Horf- man and cunning Archer; in his exercises he was fo popular, that he would not stick open- ly to bath himself and swim in his Princely Baths; his Wives, the beautiful Daughters of his Nobility or Neighbour Princes, Ladies of great Chastity, he kept so lowly and undiversed; as if the ancient manner of the Persian Kings, who always used most tendrly to love and cherifh their Wives, doing them all the honour poffible in Court, as Partakers of all their Fortune; and carried them, their Children, Nurfes, and rich- est Furniture into their farthest Wars, to their great trouble and charge, by the presence of fo dear Pledges, the more to encourage their minds in time of Battel. Whereas Selymus contrariwise did all things in fecuring his meat alone with- out any company, attended upon with his Pages and Eunuchs only, and fatisfying Natures want with fome one simple dish of meat: He seldom went abroad but to the Church, upon the Friday the Turks chief Sabbath; and then so befet with his Penfioners and other Souldiers of the Court, that although he used to ride alone mounted up- on fome courageous Horse, yet was it a hard mar- cher by face to know him among fo many armed men, who with great Pride and Infoleny kept back the beholders: He was seldom feen abroad in the City, chusing rather for his recreation to pass over in his Gally into Asia, and there along the Sea coast to take the air; his Wives he would not suffer to come to Court, neither used their company but for procreation fake, and that (as was thought) without any great good coun- tenance or familiarity; for that he being not greatly given to Women, but more delighted with un- natural pleasure, sought a mans body and mind to be not a little weakened with the allurements of Women; wherefore he seldom referred to the cloister of choice Paragons in the midst of Con- stantinople, thur in on every side with high and blind Walls. Those dainty pieces, either taken from their Christian Parents, or by chance fur- prised by Pirates, are there most curiously kept by ancient Matrons and old Eunuchs, by whom they are with all diligence instructed in the Prin- ciples of the Mahometan Law, and to read the Arabian Tongue, and withal, cunningly and comely to sing, play, dance, and fow; but Selymus of all others used seldomest to fee their allurements, as a man not greatly delighted with Women, or desirous of many (and oftentimes unfortunate) Children; having but one Son (Selyman) by the Daughter of Amhamet a Tartar King, who afterwards by the fuffurance of God, proved a great Plague to the Christian Com- mon-Weal. Such part time as he had from his serious and weighty Affairs, he used to spend in walking in his Gardens with fome of his Bafifes or other great Courtiers, and in beholding and noting the Noblemens Children there sporting themselves, would discourse and confult of many things of great importance. Some hours he would spend in the Baths, and reading the Histories of his Ancestors and other foreign Princes; imitating therein his Grandfather Mahomet the Great, who caused almost all the Histories of the famous Princes of the World to be tranflated into the Turkish Language, and their lively counterfeits to be with cunning hand drawn, that by their worthy examples he might be the more enflamed to extend his fame and glory. He would many times scoff at the great busi- ness of his Father Bajazet, who (as he said) was fo drowned in the Study of Averrois (de- termining nothing certainly of the Nature of the Soul, and the Motions of the Heavens, that he desired rather the name of a flurr Difputer, amongst the idle Professors of Philosophy, than of a renowned Chieftain amongst his valiant Souldiers and Men of War.

One of the Persian Embassadors finding him pleafantly difposed, demanded of him, why he did not wear his beard long, as his Father Bajazet, and other great Princes of that Age had done, thereby to seem unto their Subjects of greater Majesty; to which he answered, That he liked not to carry about with him fuch an unnecessary handfil, whereby his Bafifes might at their pleafure lead him up and down the Court, as they had done his Father; noting thereby, that Bajazet whilst he yet lived, had been too much overruled by the Bafifes; which he could by no means indure, following no mans advice but his own in whatsoever he took in hand.

But to come unto the Persians themselves, they in their Wars had great difadvantage of the Turks; for as they were strong in Horfmen, fo were they destitute of expert trained Foot- men, by whose only means the Turks have achieved their greatest Victories, and performed their greatest Wars. Beside this, it was a great want in the Persians, that they had not the use of Guns, against whose fury no sufficient re- sistance can be made, or force of man opposed; as appeared by the lamentable example of Umm Calfone at Aranga, and now of Hyfmael in the Caladeran Fields; whose victorious Armies of Horfemen were in both places put to the worst by the terror and violence of the Turks Artil- lery. For the naked Turkish Horfman is not to be compared with the Persian Man at Arms; who comes into the Field armed with a strong Cuiras, a fure Head-piece, and a good Target; whereas the Turkish European Horfmen, al- though naked, use only a fquare or crooked Buckler, wherewith they dearcely cover them- selves; and the Asian Horfmen Bucklers made of soft Reeds, wound round, and covered with fome kind of Silk. The Persian Horfmen also, wearing their Pouldrons and Gauntlets, and bearing Staves of good Ash, armed at both ends, fight with them as occasion ferveth at the halt Staff, after the manner of the Nudimians, and with doubling and redoubling their often thrusts from high, do easily wound or kill the unarmed Turks, with their Horfes; whereas the Turkish Horfmen, after the manner of the Grecians, couching their Staves in their Reits, do at the first course most commonly break the fame, be- fore made of light and brittle Fir, and fo pre- fently come to their Scimitars, or Horfemens Macces, being in all other things far inferior to the Persian Men at Arms. As for the Turkish Archers on horseback, they are in no respect to be compared with the Persians, who well mount- ed and furely armed, and using both greater and stronger Bows, shoot more deadly Arrows, and fo make small account of the Turks, so that all things well considered, the Persian Army devoted to their King, as well for the great and firm opinion conceived of his high Courage and divine Spirit, as for that they were to him by Faith obliged; although it was in number far inferior, yet had it been of the Turks invincible, if it had not been overwhelmed by the cruel, cowardly, and murdering Artillery, and wonderful multitude of Men. The cause why Hy-mus came out of so many great and large Provinces under his command, was for that he came with his multitude to cover the face of the Earth, and to drink the Rivers dry brought now to small an Army against the Turkish Emperor, breaking into the heart of Armenia; was for that Hy-mus to win the hearts of the People by Bounty, had remitted a great part of his Customs and Tributes, so as then stood best with his Policy, having but lately applied to the Kingdom, and thrust down his near Kinsmen, the Posterity of Urfu-Cassians and Jacup, the rightful Inheritors thereof; so that his Coffers being empty, and wanting Money, the finews of War, he was not able to raise to great an Army as otherwise he might out of those populous Kingdoms and Countries, yielding plentifully all things necessary for man's use. Whereas with Selymus it was far otherwise; whose Horsemen, Footmen, Captains, Canoniers, both at Sea and Land, Officers of Peace and War, received their daily Wages and monthly Pays in ready Money, of his Customs and Paymasters; for the delaying of which charge he never wanted Conjoining an incalculable Mass of Money always in store in the seven Towers at Constantinople; and his yearly Tributes and Revenues fell exceeding all his charges by a fourth part. The Strength of the Persian King consisted in three kind of Soldiers; the first of which were they which were accounted Soldiers of the Court; the second, such as were by Custom and Duty bound to serve him in his Wars; and the third, such as were sent to him from the Princes his Neighbours and Confederates. Those which were accounted Soldiers of his Court, had their certain Stipends, and were altogether maintained of the Kings charge; of whom, according to the old custom of the Persian Kings, they at certain times receive Armor, Horses, Apparel, Tents, and Wages, every one as he is in place and degree. And being attended upon with a gallant and strong Garrison of these, he maintained the Majesty of his Court, especially when he rideth in Progress. The Nobility and ancient Gentlemen of his Country, who hold Lands and Possessions defended unto them from their Ancestors, or holden by the gift of the King, are sent for in time of Wars, and are of duty bound to perform such like service as the Nobility and Gentlemen of Italy, France, and Spain do unto their Sovereigns; these hardly amount to the number of twenty thousand, whereof it is well if the third part come well armed; the rest content themselves with Head-pieces and Jacks; and use for their Weapons under Arms, Spears or Bows, which they can most conveniently handle, discharging their Arrows very near unto that they aim at, either forward or backward. They which come unto him from foreign Princes, confederate or tributary, are commonly sent from the Kings and Princes of Berberia, Albania and the Countrey bordering upon Africa, Armenia, who being half Turks, bear a mortal hatred against the Turks. Hy-mus the Persian King had then under his Dominion these great and famous Countries, Armenia the greater, Sulvania, Perfia, Allyria, Mesopotamia, Media and Parthia; whereof Armenia is the chieftest, famous for the great City Taurus, called in ancient time Ecbatana; this Country yieldeth unto the Persian King his best Footmen; but his choice Horsemen come from out of Perfia, and especially from Sograt, called of old Cyropolis; next unto them are from Affria; the chief City whereof is Begdat, called in ancient time Babylon. The Medes and Parthians are of all others accounted the best Archers next unto the Syrians.

But now to return again from whence we have a little too far strayed. Selymus after his great expedition against Hy-mus, wintering at Amasia, Selymus with a small army entered into Armenia, raised such a power, that with the first of the Spring he entered again into the Confines of the Persian Kingdom, with a greater Army than he before, and that somewhat sooner than the extreme cold of that part of Armenia (subject to the snowy Mountain Taurus) would either well suffer, or that the Enemy thought it had been possible for him to have done. There was upon the further side of Euphrates a strong Town called Clamassum, situate a little above that place where the River Mela (much celebrated by the Grecian Poets) falleth into the River Euphrates; which Town for the commodious situation thereof, standing upon the first entrance of the passage into Armenia the great, the Persian had furnished with a strong Garrison; this Town Selymus thought good in any case to be master of, by taking whereof, and of some other Holds thereabout, he should open a fair way for himself into his Enemies Country. Hy-mus at the same time was gone with all his power against the Hyrcanians, Bactrians, and other savage People dwelling near unto the Caspian Sea, then up in Arms against him; which withheld opportunity Selymus taking, and making a bridge over the River Euphrates, passed over with his Army, came before the Town, and laid hard Siege to the same before his Enemies were well aware of his coming. The Turks at their first approach compassing the City round with their huge multitude of Harquebusers and Archers, drove the Defendants from the Walls; and still without rest or intermission bringing on fresh men, as Selymus had before taken order, and others at the same time breaking open the Gates, and in divers places scaling the Walls, enforced the Defendants to forsake their standings, and to retire themselves into the Market place; where although they were before fore spent with labour and wounds, yet did they there with wonderful courage a great while notably withstand the multitude of their Enemies till warming in, and in defence of their Country, like resolute men, fought it out unto the last man.

Selymus having taken and ransacked Clamassum, with two other small Castles which the Defendants had for fear been abandoned, although he was with a deadly hatred and ambitious desire prick forward against Hy-mus, and thirsted after nothing more than the subversion of the Persian Kingdom; yet he thought it not good further to enter into Armenia, before he had out of those Forests and Mountains chased the Mountain King Aladules, who but the year before had most treacherously done him and his Army so many injuries in his return from the Persian Expedition. For Aladules was not without cause fearing his own estate, as soon as he understood that Selymus had again taken the Field, and that he was come to the River Euphrates, and to Clamassum, speedily assembling his Forces, had in short time raised a great Army for the defence of himself and his Kingdom, purposing then if Selymus should go farther into Armenia, then after after his wonted manner to look on as a beholder, and by the event of the War, to take occasion of Prey, and by shutting up the passages of his Country, at his pleasure to rob and spoil the Turks in their return. Wherefore Selymus leaving a Garrison at Clamassum, retired back again over the River Euphrates unto the Mountain Antitaurus, where it was reported that his Enemies lay.

This Aladules (as is aforesaid) ruled over the rude and savage Mountain People, inhabiting the great Mountains Taurus and Antitaurus, which Mountains as it were linked together one to another, run from the Mountains called Sandrisi, and the Boydices of Cappadocia, with a perpetual rising, through many large Provinces and Countries unto the great Mountain Armenus, and uttermost bounds of Cilicia. The People of this Country were by Nature fierce and warlike, more famous for nothing than for the want of all things, who as men dwelling in the rough and bare Country, could little or nothing profit by Husbandry; yet in such places as would bear any pasture, they had their breed of Horses and Camels, and did with all diligence use grafting; but the greatest part of their living consisted in hunting and stealing. These are supposed to have had their beginning from the Galatians, Cappadocians, Armenians, and the old Inhabitants of Affa the less, which by long and continual Wars in former ages, and especially the lamentable irruption of the Syrians, were enforced to forsake their Cities and Dwellings, and for safeguard of their lives to fly into those rough and desolate Mountains. These distressed People searching every Hill and every Dale, and following the opportunity of the Mountains and Fountains, but especially the mildest temperature of the Air, and favourable aspect of the Sun, built in many places poor Country Villages, and afterwards divers fair Towns; where in process of time they growing to better estate, raised up some amongst them, which overlooking the rest, ambitiously took upon them the name of Kings, desiring to be had in regard, and to be feared of their Neighbours, although they commanded but over rough Woods and ragged Rocks. Near unto the Confines of Aladules Kingdom is the City Orpha, which many suppose to have been the famous City Edessa, because that as yet there remaineth certain Monuments of Baldwin in Latine Letters; who after his Brother Godfrey was possessed of Jerusalem, is reported to have taken Edessa, and there reigned. Not far from thence is also the ancient City Amida, which at this day is called Carimide, joyning upon Mesopotamia; which Country lying between the two great Rivers Euphrates and Tigris, is now called Diarrhache. The chief City of Aladules Kingdom was Maras, so called as may be thought of the fair River Maras running through it out of the Mountain Celme, taking the name of Maras overcome by Apollo, and made famous by the Verses of many learned Poets. But Aladules, after he saw that Selymus with his Army was entered into the Frontiers of his Kingdom, and drawing near unto him, brought down all his Horsemen, in number about fifteen thousand, and his Footmen, into a fair large Valley; commanding his Footmen, whereof he had great force, to keep the Mountains on the right hand and the left; where having the high rocky Mountains and strait passages much for his advantage, he determined in that place which he had long before chosen and fortified, to expect the coming of his Enemies. Selymus considering the disadvantage of the place, although he perceived the Victory could not without great loss of his men be obtained; and before proceeding that his Enemies would never have willingly been drawn to Battle; yet made no doubt to adventure his Fortune, presuming upon the multitude and strength of his Army. Wherefore he commanded Sinan, Balla the Eunuch (whom he had made General of the European Horsemen instead of Clamassum before slain) with a figure Battal to charge the Enemy first of front, as forasmuch as length, nor to use any Wings; and he himself with his Janizaries and Affian Horsemen followed after in the Rearward. Neither were the Soldiers of Aladules unmindful of themselves or of their King, who valiantly fought in the head of the Battal, but having spent their Arrows, did courageously receive the furious assault of the Turks; and standing close to them, still keeping the advantage of the ground, did with little force repulse them; that the old beaten Soldiers of the Turks, seemed little or nothing to prevail either with their Multitude or Valor; for the Turks by reason of the strangeness of the place, could not incline them on either side, and were befide grievously wounded by Aladules Footmen, who standing upon the sides of the Hills with their Darts and Arrows from above, overwhelmed the Turks in the Valley. When Selymus saw that Aladules, contrary to his expectation made good his resistance, and valiantly withstood his Forces; he drew certain Companies of Harquebusers out of his own Squadrons, and sent them to relieve their Fellows; and at the same instant commanded the Janizaries for all the danger to mount the Hill. Then the Mountain People terrified with the strangeness of the Shot, and not able to abide the force thereof, by and by turned their backs, and by known ways fled into their fire haunts, in the Mountains and Woods fast by; yet the greatest slaughter kill amongst these Footmen, who when they saw the Horsemen put to flight, and the Janizaries coming up the Hills against them, did with much difficulty, by steep and broken ways clamber up the high Mountains; as oftentimes it falleth out, that both the strength of mens legs and other their wonted forces fail them most, when surprized and overcome with sudden fear, they desire to run and fly fastest. The Turks having them in chase had the killing of them until the going down of the Sun. The Horsemen with the King, upon their swift Horses, well acquainted with those Rocks and rough Ways, with little loss retired themselves into the further and stronger places of the Mountains.

Aladules after this discomfort, finding himself in all things far inferior to his Enemy, thought it best by protracting the War, to weary him out; wherefore as the Turks pursued him, and burnt the poor Country Cottages standing in their way, he filled them from Mountain to Mountain, never offering Battel or shewing himself, but in places of great disadvantage; and therefore Selymus hearing left in that barren rough and unknown Country, he should either want Victual, or by some other means be entrapped, if he should fill with his whole Army follow after his strong Enemies, upon the seventh day left off to pursue them any further. And encamping himself in the most convenient place of that Country, sent Sinan back with his light Horsemen, who carrying with them certain day Victuals, should still at the heels follow the Enemy, and with all speed and policy possible hunt after the King himself. Selymus in the mean time curiously inquiring of the Country Captives after the strength of Aladules, and what means he had to maintain the War; found, that he had taken with him his best men both Horse and Foot; and had commanded the Country People to forsake the Villages, of purpose to leave all desolate to the Enemy; and having thus fired and treacherously upon a certain strong Rock (whither he had before conveyed great store of Provision) was resolved not to give Battle unto his Enemies, until he had drawn them into the impregnable Straits of the Mountains, where their huge multitude should little avail them, but to increase their own loss. Another cause he had also (as they said) for that he feared to be betrayed by Ali Beg his Kinsman, General of his Horsemen; who first fled in the late Battle; whose unfaithfulness and hatred might seem to proceed of a just ground, for that Aladules had in former time treacherously murdered his Father, upon a jealous suspicion of his aspiring to the Kingdom.

Selymus understanding all this, caused the Captives to have their Irons struck off, and instead of their Gyves lading them with Gifts and Promises, sent them to Ali Beg with secret Letters and Rewards, to persuade him in to fit a time to revenge his Fathers death; which thing if he would perform by some notable exploit upon Aladules, he should both purchase unto himself great credit with Selymus, and also the Kingdom. These homely Messengers according as was given them in charge, having imparted the matter to Sinan Bassa, within few days had so wrought, that Ali Beg (whom the desire of a Kingdom together with his Revenge, did prick forward to seek revenge) was easily drawn to joyn hands with Selymus. And when he could no other way hurt Aladules, who mistrusting all things, warily looked unto himself, he found the means to go over to Sinan Bassa, carrying after him a great part of Aladules his best Horsemen; by whose means the rest also which remained being with Rewards corrupted, one Company after another came at last all over unto the Bassa. Aladules circumvented with this unexpected Treachery, which never before thought it possible that his Men should all so suddenly have forsaken him and revolted to the Turks, was now glad to repose all his hope in secret flight. But Sinan Bassa and Ali Beg, hardly pursuing him as he fled through the Mountains, hiding himself in Rocks and the thick Woods, at last drew him out of a Cave, being betrayed by the Country Peasants. Aladules being brought to Selymus, was within a few days after put to death, and his head in great derision afterwards carried about through all Asia the less; and afterwards by way of barbarous ostentation, sent by Selymus to the Senate of Venice, as a loathsome testimony of his Victory. Aladules thus dead, Selymus reduced all his Kingdom to the form of a Province, which he divided into three parts, and his head in great derision afterwards carried about to every part a Sanzack; yet so, that Ali Beg should be chief over the rest, with such Sovereignty, as that he wanted nothing of a King but the name only. And for the better Government of all things in that new gained Kingdom, he left Sinan Bassa there all the rest of that Summer with commandments, that after he had for all things in good order, he should winter at Iconium; and he himself with a small Train returned to Constantinople, for he had heard, that whilst he was busied in his Wars against Hyfmael and Aladules in Armenia, that the Hungarians had made divers incursions into Servia, and spoiled that Country. Wherefore for fear of losing Saman-dria (which standing near to Danubius, for the convenient situation thereof is reputed the Bulwark of Servia and Thracia) he sent Tomfies Bassa then Governor of Bosna with eight thousand Horsemen, who passing the River Savus entered into Croatia as far as Cattinum; and at the same time transported another Army over Danubius into Hungary, to the intent that the Hungarians at one instant beset with double danger, should be enforced to fear their own State; and with all to these unto the World, of what Strength and Power the Ottoman Emperors were. Deeming it to concern much, both for the present and the time to come, to the daunting of the Christians; if he should by his happy Attempts make it known, that he could at once easily and readily maintain so many and so puissant Armies, and wage so great Wars in divers parts of the World, and so far distant one from another.

In the end of the year, when he had thus with double invasion repressed the Hungarians, he spent the Winter following at Hadienaple and Constantinople, in making of greater preparation for War than ever he had before from the beginning of his Reign. For he was advertised, that the great Monarchs of the North his Neighbours, namely Maximilian the Emperor, Uladihu King of Hungary, and Sigismund King of Polonia, with the Princes of Germany, had combined themselves together to make War upon him. But after he had considered his sure Intelligences (whom he had with great charge sent into all parts of Europe, diligently to observe what was done in the Courts of those great Princes) that all the great meetings of the Christian Princes proved nothing but glorious Words and sumptuous Banquets; he being rid of that vain fear (God for apace) turned himself and all those his wonderful preparations again toward the East, to the great quiet of Christendom in general.

Yet left happily in the absence of himself and of his Armies, the Christian Princes might take occasion to invade his Dominions, he strengthened the Frontiers of his Empire with most strong Garrisons; and left his Son Selmas (who afterward proved the scourge of Christendom) at Hadienaple with a strong power, and Pyrrhus Bassa his Tutor (a man of great Wisdom and Government) at Constantinople. This great Bassa was of Cilicia, a native Turk born, which was a thing accounted strange, forasmuch as the great Bassas were always chosen of the Christian blood. After that, he sent Cherfogles (whom of all others he most trusted) with his Army into Bithynia, and made Zafferus an Eunuch, Admiral of his Navy, which he had but a little before built, and with wonderful labor and charge rigged forth. Then staying a few days at Constantinople to see the young Soldiers, but then chosen Initiaries, he departed thence and went to his old Army, lying with Sinan Bassa at Iconium, purposing to have again invaded the Perfian.

When he was come thither, he understood that Campion Gaurus Sultan of Egypt (with a great Army lying in Egypt and Judea) was gone into Syria; giving it out that he would aid the Perfian King his Confederates, and with all Hostility enter into Cilicia, if Selymus should farther proceed to invade Hyfmael the Sophi his Friend and Ally. Selymus perplexed with these News, and fearing that if he should once pass over the River Euphrates, Campion lying to near in readiness, should should forthwith break in at his back into Asia by the Mountain Amannus, and so to endanger that part of his Dominion; staid at Iconium, and sent his Embassadors with great Presents to Campion to pacify him. If it might be. The chief Men in this Embassy were the Captives, a Man of great account amongst the Turks, and of them exceedingly Reverenced for the opinion they had of his great knowledge in the Mahometan Superstition, who afterwards wrote the Commentaries of this War; and Tachis a great Captain. The scope of whose Embassy was, to intreat Campion, that he would not hinder or disturb Selymus from making War upon the Perfian King; who had so often, and so forcibly invaded his Dominions in Asia, and by bringing in a new form of Superstition, had corrupted and altered the most certain grounds of the Mahometan Religion. And if they found him resolutely set down and not to be by any conditions removed, then with all possible diligence to learn his strength and farther designs, so far as by any means they could, and with all speed to make their return.

But Campion now far spent with age, and living in the height of worldly Bliss, although he knew it firmer for him at those years to give himself to ease and quietness, than to thrust himself into Wars and other Princes quarrels; yet thought this Expedition to be for many causes both good and necessary. First, he deadly hated the Man for his inhuman Cruelty, and therefore could never be persuaded to renew the League with him which he had in former time made with his Father Bajazet; besides that, he desired to abate and repress his audacious insolence, grown already by his prosperous Success beyond the bounds of reason; for Selymus having taken Tauris, overthrown the Perfians, and slain Aladules, began now to seem terrible to all the Princes that bordered upon him, and there were many which said he was another Alexander, who whilst other Princes far still as Men asleep, did in the mean time Plot in his victorious mind, the Monarchy of the whole World. But above all things, the fear of the losing of Syria, and consequently the loss of all his Kingdom (the quickest motive for stirring up of the suspicious minds of the greatest Princes) most intorted Campion to take in hand this War; so as much as the goodly Kingdoms of Egypt, Judea, and Syria, oppressed with the intolerable Government of the Proud Mamalukes, and therefore less faithful to the Egyptian Kings, were in danger to revolt to the Turks, if the Perfians should by any mischance or fortune of War be of the Turks vanquished. For which cause Campion in the beginning of this War, solicited by the Perfian Embassadors, had made a firm League and confederation with Hyfmael, and also moved by the misery of the woful young Prince Adalim the Son of Achometes, was in mind perfwaded, that the cruel Turkish Tyrant might by his and the Perfian Kings Forces, easily be thrust out of his Empire in Asia and Europe. For Adalim, who after the death of Achometes his Father, fled to Campion the Sultan of Egypt (as is before declared) had lived three years as a forlorn and distressed Prince in the Egyptian Court; and by all means he could devise incited the Mamalukes to revenge the injuries and cruelty of his Uncle Selymus. The eldest Son also of the late King Aladules, a goodly young Prince, having at once lost his Father, his Kingdom, and whatsoever he had else, was in good time fled to the Egyptian King, and had to fill the minds of all Men with the indignation and detestation of Selymus his exceeding cruelty, that the Princes of the Mamalukes of their own accord came to Campion, humbly beseeching him to take upon him to justify a War; and if by reason of his great years he should think himself unable to endure the travel thereof, it would then please him yet to give them leave of themselves to take the matter in hand, for the repressing of the insolency of that great and wicked Tyrant.

These Mamalukes far excelled the Turks, not only in strength of Body, skilful riding, and goodly armor, but also in courage and wealth. So that, that they had not forgotten with what small power they had under the leading of Cain-beis their great Sultan, overturned the Turks great Armies in Cilicia, first at Adana, and afterward at Tarjus, where they took Prisoners, Meliss Palaologus the great Bassa, and Cherfogles, Bajazet his Son-in-Law; by which Victory they grew into such a proud and vain conceit of themselves, as if they had been the only Souldiers of the World, able of themselves to vanquish and overcome whatever they should fit upon. These so valiant Souldiers, were for the most part of the poor People, taken in ancient time Getae, Zinchi, and Basfarnae, born near unto the Euxine Sea and the Fens of Maeotis, especially on that side where the River Corax falleth into the Euxine Sea; which Country at that later time called Circassia, of the People called Circassians unto Colchis. These miserable and wretched People, the Valachians, Podolians, Polonians, Roxolani, and Tartars, dwelling by Taurica (pulled from their Mothers Breasts, or by other violent means surprised) were sold to Merchants; who culling out the best for strength of Body, or aptness of Wit, conveyed them by Sea to Alexandria, from whence they were continually sent to the great Sultan of Egypt; and by his appointment were at Gaire (after the old manner of that People) delivered to Masters of fence and such other Teachers, who usually instructed them, being shut up in their Schools, in all manner of feats of Activity; where after they were become able to bend a strong Bow, and taught cunningly to Shoot, Leap, Run, Vault, Ride, and skilfully to use all manner of Weapons, they were then taken into pay, and received into the number of the Kings Horsemen or Mamalukes; and such of them as proved cowardly or unapt, were made slaves unto the rest. So that they being all honour, credit, and preferment, laid up in martial prowess, did with all diligence and courage employ themselves to military Affairs, and therein so well profited, that oftentimes they which at the first were bare and base slaves, of the meanness of the Mamalukes by many degrees of service rose at length to the highest degrees of Honour. All these Mamalukes were the Children of Christian Parents, from the time of their Captivity instructed in the Mahometan Superstition; for no Man born of a Mahometan Father, or of a Jew, could be admitted into the number of the Mamaluke Horsemen; which was so frantically observed, that the honour of a Mamaluke Horseman never descended unto the Sons of the Mamalukes; yet might they by Law inherit their Fathers Lands, Possessions, and Goods; by which reason the Sons of the Sultans themselves never succeeded their Fathers in the Kingdom. Hereby also it came to pass, that many Christians of loose life, or condemned for their notorious offences, flying thither, and abjuring the Christian Religion, and suffering themselves to be Circumcised, being Men meet for the Wars, grew by degrees to great Honour; as did Tangarisbards the Son of a Spanish Mariner, Mountain Taurus; breaketh again violently forth into Meopotamia; but turning himself upon the right hand; purposed to pass the Mountain Taurus; and breaking suddenly into Comagena to come upon the Sultan before he were well aware of his coming. Wherefore calling unto him his trusty Janizaries, with the other Soldiers of the Court, he openly declared unto them his countenance declared unto them what he had resolved to do with the reasons of the alteration of his former determination; perswading them, that the Victory would easily be achieved, if they as courageous Soldiers would with all colerity (before the Mamalukes could perceive they were returned) get to the top of the Mountains, and recover those difficult passages; not fearing the vain Names and Titles of the Mamalukes. For Selymus (said he) the strength of those Horsemen is long since decayed and gone; the old Mamalukes, who in the time of Caitibes were of some fame and reputation, are all dead. You shall in Battle meet but with a sort of gallant Horsebreviers rather than Soldiers; which can cunningly manage their Horses in sport, to the pleasure of the Beholders, but know not how to encounter the Enemy, or to induce to be wounded, who as Carpet-Knights, effeminate with long paces, and corrupted with ease and delicacy of their great Cities, never saw their Foes intrenched, or armed Enemies, neither have heard the sound of a Trumpet, but at Plays or Shows. Wherefore you are to make but small account of them, being furnished with no store of Ordnance or strength of Footmen. But as the reverend Interpreters of our Sacred Laws and Religion, having orderly performed all their observances, do divine unto us all happiness; so you as Men full of hope, set forward cheerfully unto my offered Victory over your ground Enemies. For God no doubt favoureth the quarter of Men justly provoked, and offered means of Victory to such as take up just and necessary arms. To overcome the Enemy, and to enjoy Victory indeed, which consisteth in the courage and valour of them which deem nothing better or more honourable than to spend their lives for the honour of their Prince and Country. Here the Janizaries shaking their Weapons, forthwith cried out with cheerful voice, That he should lead and conduct them whithersoever he would; saying, That they were ready as courageous Men, to overcome all the difficulties of those hard passages, and patiently to endure all the labours and dangers incident to that War.

Selymus, by the mountain People having found out the easiest passages, resolved to pass over the Mountain with his Army in three places; and so appointing three great Companies of the common Soldiers, and Country People, for the opening of the three passages; he commanded the rough and uneven Ways to be made plain and smooth, for the transporting of his Ordnance, and the broken passages to be cast even, that so his Baggage and Carriages might the better pass; and the more to encourage his Soldiers to take pains, he promised present reward to all such as in transporting of his Ordnance, should take any extraordinary pain. Whereby it came to pass, that the same being of the smaller sort bearing Bullets of no great weight, was in short time by the cheerful labour of his Soldiers, drawn over those great Hills and Dales; so that in five days all his Army with his Baggage and Carriages were got over the Mountain Taurus, and came into the Plains of Comagena. For that Mountain where it taketh the name of Amnus, which is almost in the middle where the River Euphrates parteth the Mountain Taurus, and the Bay Umus, is neither exceeding high, or yet impassable; for as it cometh nearer the Sea, it is not so rough as elsewhere, but is in many places inhabited and tilld by the Mountain Cilicians, a fierce kind of People accustomed to labour and toil, who are now called Caramanians, which is to say, the Inhabitants of the black Mountains; for that the burnt Rocks of the Mountain seemed afaroff to be black.

Alis-Beg which betrayed Adalutels, whom Selymus had a little before sent foras far as the Army was come down into the Frontiers of the Enemies Country, with a strong power of his light Horsemen, speedily overran all that Country which is at the foot of Amnus and Taurus; thereby to understand of the Country People and such as they could take Prisoners, where Campion lay with his Army; and also by keeping the passages, what might possibly be done, that Selymus his coming might not be known to the Enemy.

But Campion, who with no less vanity than pride had fondly flattered himself, only by the authority and greatness of his name to have terrified Selymus; and overruled him at his pleasure; could not be perswaded that he was come over the Mountain Amnus, until certain news was brought him, that he was encompassed with a most puissant Army within two days march of him. With which unexpected news being fore troubled, and in the midst of that danger to seek Council, as one which began rightly to consider of his own strength, and the strength of his Enemy; began then to doubt what were best for him to do; and in great perplexity sometime hoped well; and by and by as a Man half discouraged and dismayed. And now become exceeding careful both of his honour and himself, he began to doubt, whether it were better for him to give place to so great a danger, and shunning Battle to retire with his Army into places of more safety; or else courageously to abide the coming of his Enemies, and to hazard the Fortune of a Battle, although it were upon great disadvantage; forasmuch as he reputed it far more honourable, after the example of his Predecessors from whom he had received that great Kingdom (both gotten and kept by martial Prowess) to die with honour in the Field, than by shameful and unwonted Flight, either to blemish their military Glory continued above the space of 300 years, or for love of a small remainder of life, being now 77 years old, to seem willing to reserve unto an obloquy and shame his last days, deprived of all honour and reputation.

There were amongst his Chieftains many, which preferred wholesome Council before that which was in few more glorious; but above all others, Jambard Syrnamed Gazelles (sometimes the follower of great Caitibes) a valiant Man of great Honour, for his long experience in martial Affairs, and at that time Governour of Apamia. He, as he was of opinion, That to fight with the Turks Army, consisting for most part of expert Soldiers, which to small a power, were a thing of desperate danger; so was he also, that it were good speedily to retire, and to chuse the City of Damajoe, as the fittest place for those Wars; forasmuch as the Turks Army could make no haft after them, by reason of their Footmen and Carriages, so that they might at ease and with safety retire; and there calling together all the Mamalukes which were in Garrison in Judea and Egypt, and entreating the Arabians their Neighbors, to prostrate the War until Winter, when as they might easily distress the Enemy for want of Victual. And that it was not to be feared that Alleppe, if it were furnished but with a reasonable Garrison, could by and by be taken, taken of the Enemy, who had but small Field-Pieces not fit for battery. Beside that, in short time Adalut would come from the Perlians out of Meopotamia; yea and Hysnald himself hearing of the Turks expedition into Syria, was like enough to break into Alisa the less; neither would the Christians refuse to furnish them with great Artillery from the Islands of the Rhodes and Cyprus against that common Enemy, if they were thereto in time requested. All which things being laid together, he said, the Sultan might afterward upon even hand go into the Field, if he should think it so much to content his honour, to give his Enemies battle. But forasmuch as the greatest Wars, which at the first had most violent and most furious motions, by the politic Enemies delay, did most commonly in time grow calm, he should not therefore make too much haft to adventure the fortune of Battle; for that the errors of War, which many times chanced through the oversight or rashness of the Chieftains, might well of good men be lamented and detested, but hardly or never recovered or amended.

Gazelles his grave and considerate Speech had much moved both the Sultan and others; yet the cheerfulness of the Soldiers, and foolish hardness of the Mamalukes did so fill Campion's Ears, that he could not hearken to so good and wholesome Council; for as soon as they heard certainty of the coming of the Turks, they began to leap and dance, and to rejoice among themselves, that the time was come wherein they might make proof of their Valor, and win to themselves Honour. For now (as they said) was come that time they had long wished for, wherein they would by notable slaughter of their Enemies, advance the Honour and Majesty of Campion their Sultan far above the fame of Caitibes; and some even of the chief men about Campion, upon flattery and vain ostentation, alledging how honourably and with what small labour they had before overthrown the Turks great Army at Taurus; perswading him that the victory would easily and without any great danger be gotten. But especially Cayerebus Governor of Alleppe and of the Province of Comagena (who after his War ended, was in reward of his soul Treason, by Selymus unworthily preferred to the greatest Honour of Egypt) extolling with glorious words the Faithfulness, Courage, and Valor of the Mamalukes, and exultating the Power and Strength of the Enemy, forced his Wits to the uttermost to overthrow the wholesome Council of Gazelles.

For this Cayerebus for all his fair face bore a grudge in his heart against Campion, because he had some years before poisoned his Brother, whom he had in jealousy, being a man next to himself of greater Power, Wealth, and Authority amongst the Mamalukes, and wish of an aspiring mind. Whereupon Cayerebus afterwards thinking it good to look to himself, and doubting the like practice to be intended against himself; being, as the manner of that Kingdom was, summoned to a Parliament at Caire, leigned himself sick, and would not come; so that Campion was not a little offended, yet for a time he thought it best to dissemble the matter, and to wait some fitter opportunity for the taking away of that proud man, so formidable of his duty, and bearing himself against his Sovereignty, as if he had been an absolute King in his own Province; this he thought might covertly be brought to pass, if he should upon the occasion of the present War (as then it fell out) or else under the color of going in person himself to the River Euphrates, come to Alleppe, for it was the manner of the ancient Egyptian Sultans, not to account themselves worthy of the name of a Sultan or great General, before they had, as Cayerebus had of late done, encamped their Army upon the side of the River Euphrates at the City Byrle (which standing upon the Bank of the River, retaineth at this day both the old Name and Fame) and there with tolerable Pomp had in the sight of the Army forced their Horses into the River to drink; giving to understand by that ceremony, the greatness of their Empire, and that they were ready by force of Arms to prove, that all those Countries were theirs, which lay along the River Euphrates, from the Mountain Taurus unto the Deserts of Arabia. But the consideration of this War letted that he did not at his first coming press him, because he deemed it to stand belt with his present Affairs; and not yet knowing the purpose of Selymus, to expect the motions of the Turks and Perlians, and to defer the execution of his Wrath against Cayerebus, until the end of the War; for fear lest the other Mamalukes, dismayed with the hair-raughtness of the sudden fall, should either revolt from him, or else raise some Mutiny or Rebellion in that populous City. For Cayerebus had by his Courtesy and Bounty many strong Companies in the Army fast bound unto him; and beside that, was of greatest Credit and Authority with them of Alleppe, having in his keeping a strong Citadel, built upon the rising of a Hill in the middle of the City, which he kept with a strong and sure Garrison.

But whilst Campion doth thus slowly and considerately pursue his destruction, many of the Sultans secret Friends, in him more officious than faithful, secretly advised Cayerebus to beware of the Sultan, and by some good means in time to provide for his own safety. He understanding of the danger, and thinking all delay deadly, sent secret Messengers unto Selymus, discovering unto him the cause of his grief, and promising as occasion should serve to come over unto him, and to deliver into his power the Castle with the heart of the Citizens, and all the strength of his own Horsemen; thereby to provide for his own safety, to revenge his Brothers death, and to further his Victory against Campion; and for performance of promises on both sides, required secret Advantages to be given. By the same Messengers he also advertised him, what Strength the Sultan was of, perswading him in any case to make haft to give Battle before he had gathered any greater Power. Selymus nothing doubted to consent to all that the Traitor thus requested, promising of himself far greater things than ever he had required; assuring himself of the Victory, if his Enemy should lose so much of his Strength by the revolt of so great a Commander.

Campion enforced by the general consent of his Soldiers, and the violence of his inevitable Destiny then at hand, rejecting the good and faithful Council of Gazelles, at such time as Selymus was reported to be at hand, resolved according to the Counsel of the Traitor Cayerebus, to dare him Battle. He lay conveniently encamped upon the River Singa, almost ten miles from the City, in such sort as that his Soldiers might use the benefit of the River, and removed from the Houses and Pleasures of the City, might yet nevertheless be easily relieved with the store and plenty thereof.

The Mamalukes were scarce in number twelve thousand, but every one of them, according as he was of greater Place or Calling, so had he attending upon him more Servants, well furnished, with Horse and Armor. A goodly and invincible Army, if the Barrel might have been tried by true Valor. The Mamalukes wearing their Beards long and rough, with grave and stern Countenance, having strong and able Bodies, used such cunning in all their Fights and Barrels, that after they had given the first charge with their Lances, they would by and by with wonderful activity try their bows and Arrows, casting their Targets behind them; and forthwith the Horsemen Mace, or crooked Scimeter, as the manner of the Barrel or Place required. Their Horses were strong and courageous, in making and swift, much like unto the Spanish Jennets; and that which is of many hardly believed, so docile, that at certain signs or speeches of the Rider, they would with their Teeth reach him up from the ground a Lance, an Arrow, or such like thing; and as if they had known the Enemy, run upon him with open mouth, and lash at him with their heels, and had by Nature and Custom learned, not to be afraid of any thing. These courageous Horses were commonly furnished with silver Bridles, gilt Trappings, rich Saddles, their Necks and Breasts armed with Plates of Iron; The Horseman himself was commonly content with a Coat of Mail or a Breast-Plate of Iron. The chief and wealthiest of them used Head-pieces, the rest a linnen covering of the Head, curiously folded into many wreaths, wherewith they thought themselves safe enough against any handy strokes; the Common Soldiers used thrum'd Caps, but so thick that no Sword could pierce them.

The order
of Campion his
Tent.

Campion of all his Army made four Battels; The first was committed to Cayerbeus, because it was in his own Province, where the Barrel was to be fought. The second was led by Selymus, who for his wonderful Activity was of them called Baham, which in their Language signifieth a Tumbler, or one that throweth Feats of Activity; he was Governor of Damascus, a man of singular Faith and Valor. These two great Commanders were appointed at once to charge both the Wings of the Turks Army. After them followed Gazelles with the third Barrel, to second either the one or the other of the two foremost, as need should require. Campion himself led the fourth, all glittering in gilt Armor, behind the rest almost a mile and an half. The last was left for the defence of the Camp.

The order
of Selymus his
Tent.

But Selymus according to his wonted manner fo ordered his Barrel, that his Afian Horsemen were in the right Wing, his European Horsemen in the left, his Janizaries and Artillery in the main Barrel, before whom in the middle between the two Wings he placed his most valiant and gallant Pensioners, amongst whom, contrary to his wonted custom, he chose to serve that day.

Cayerbeus as soon as he was come near the Enemy, in token of his brave Courage, gave a hot charge upon the European Horsemen; and by and by, as if he would have compassed in that Wing, wheeled a great way about behind them, where charging upon a great Company of Scullions, Drudges, and other base People that followed the Camp, with an infinite number of Camels and Carriages, he made there a great stir with little slaughter, that as a valiant and cunning Traitor he might in the self same time falsify the expectation of his Valor and of his Treason together. In the other Wing, the Governor of Damascus, to enter upon the open side of the Enemy, forbearing to charge him afront, and turning about his Troops on the left hand, entered overthwart their Ranks; where the Mamma-lukes fought with such fury, that having made great Slaughter of the Afian Horsemen, they brake in amongst them, as if it had been a raging Flood, bearing all down before them, until they came to the Enemies in the midst of that Wing; neither could Musapha the Beglerbeg (who was by Birth a Hungarian, and Selymus's Brother in law) neither the Imbrabor-Baffa (or Master of the House) though they did what they might to withstand him, after the first were overthrow, flay the rest, but that they would needs turn their backs and flee. So Selymus as a valiant Conqueror having cut in two pieces the right Wing of the Enemies barrel, and thrusting in betwixt the batel of the Footmen and the backs of the Pensioners, brought a great terror and fear upon the whole main Barrel. The matter was now brought to extrem danger; for Selymus by the breaking in of Sybeus was almost cut off from his Footmen, in whom he had reposed his greatest confidence. And now the Janizaries were hardly charged by Gazelles, who following the Fortune of Sybeus, had set upon the head of the Enemies Barrel. The Afian Horsemen also being put to the worse, and cut in pieces, found no means how to restore again their disorder'd Barrel.

In this extremity Sinan Baffa in good time came in with his Horsemen; by his coming, for that he had been but lightly charged by Cayerbeus the Traitor, and had brought with him many fresh Troops of Horsemen, the fury of the Mamalukes was repressed, the Turks again encouraged, and the Victory shortly after wrung out of the Mamalukes hands; the great Artillery being by the commandment of Selymus at the same time discharged amongst them, by the terrible thunder whereof, the Mamalukes Horses somewhat troubled, could not so well as before be ruled; neither could the men themselves, although they were of wonderful Courage, much prevail, being on every side oppressed with the multitude of their Enemies. Yet in that distress being nothing dismayed, although they were by Cayerbeus and their good fortune forsaken, they were not to seek either of courage or direction; but setting themselves close together, they brake through the midst of their Enemies, with great slaughter of the European Horsemen, and hurt of the Pensioners; and so with speed fled towards the Camp and City. After whom followed Sinan Baffa with the readiest and freshest Troops of his Horsemen; for Selymus (who that day in the extremest heat, for his wonderful pains, courage, and direction seemed undoubtedly greater than himself) riding up and down, called earnestly upon his Soldiers to urge the Victory, and with all speed to pursue their flying Enemies.

Campion had now (in his Destiny fo leading him) set forward, of purpose to come to the relief of his men sent before; or if the Turks should be overcome, to be partaker of the Victory; when upon the way he understood by them, that fled. That Cayerbeus was revolted, his Army overthrow, and the terror so great, as that the flight of his Soldiers was not now possibly to be staid; beside that, to augment the fear, it was reported, That the multitude of his Enemies and Force of their Artillery was so great, that they were not then to be encountered. With which heavy News, the proud old man, who in the perpetual course of his good Fortune had never tasted of evil hap, was ready for the ground, and of mind to have sunk down to the earth. And forthwith his own men, and the Enemy pursuing them, coming upon him, who in their headlong course without regard overthrow whomsoever they met, every man making thir for self, felt, without respect of others harms; he being a corpulent man of great years, and besides the heaviness of his Armor, troubled also with a Rupture, overcome with heat and grief of mind, fainted in that great press, and fo falling down, was without regard trodden to death, after he had with great Majesty governed the Kingdoms of Egypt, Judea, and Syria many years. The valiant Tetrarchs of Damascus and Tripolis, whilst others fled for life, either to the Camp or to the City of  Aleppo, labouring in the hindmost of their flying Troops to repulse the force of their pursuing Enemies, were both fighting honourably slain. Selymus erecting a few Tents in the same Field wherein the Barrel was fought, and keeping most part of his Army in Arms, slept not all that night, but stood fast as a man not yet assured of his Victory or good fortune; fearing lest men of so great Valor as were the Mamalukes, should in the covert of the night return and set upon him in his Camp; for he knew right well, that they were overcome and put to flight, rather by the Treachery of Cayerbeus and fury of his great Order, than by the Valor of his Soldiers. But Gazelles and the other Mamalukes, after they certainly understood of the death of Campion, having given their Horses a short bait, departed in half from Aleppo to Damascus. The next day Selymus removing with his Army, took the rich Tents of his Enemies full of all princely things, which he gave unto his Soldiers for a Prey; and marching from thence to Aleppo, had the City peaceably delivered unto him by Cayerbeus, where he favourably took the Citizens into his protection; and the more to win their hearts, granted unto them greater Privileges than they had in former time enjoyed.

In this Barrel were slain not above a thousand Mamalukes, but of their Saracens and followers a great number; more being slain in the Flight than in the Fight, when as their Horses fainting for heat, and dying under them for thirst, many of them were enforced to betake themselves to their feet, and so were easily slain of every base Horseman. For a great number of goodly Horses died there, which being foggy fat, and delicately brought up in cold Stables, could not endure the vehemency of the heat, and that unacquainted travel; for that day all things were burnt with the scorching heat of the Sun.

This famous Barrel was fought the seventeenth of August, in the year of our Lord 1516, the very same day (which is strange to tell) whereon but two years before, he had obtained the Victory against Hyfmael the great Sophi in the Chaldaran Fields. Selymus lost in this Barrel three thousand Horsemen; whereby it may easily be gathered, That he had there received a notable overthrow of his Horsemen, if Sinan Baffa in the left Wing (which by the Treason of Cayerbeus was packed with small loss) had also happened upon his Sybeus, as the other General did.

The dead body of Campion found two days after, without any wound appearing thereupon, was by the commandment of Selymus laid forth in open place for all men to behold; that such as believed him yet to live, and to be gone to repair his Army at Cairo, might be out of all hope of his return; and others that were already revolted, might thereby be the more confirmed, as now out of all fear of him. Not long after, when the dead Body began to putrify and grow noisome, and to convince the fame of his escape, had lien open to the view of all men by the space of three days, it was without any funeral Pomp or Solemnity, simply buried in the most ancient Temple of Aleppo. Of the rising and fall of this great man, Janus Vitalis hath written this Elogium or Epitaph.

Thou peevish Dame, more fuddain than The thunder Clap from high,
Rejects the fuits of greedy Wights,
Which to thee call and cry,
And lavishly confumes thy self,
And whatso else thou halt.
O thou such crave nothing of thee,
Nor wilt not to be grac't.
As Campion Gaurus seeking nought, Nec craving ought of thee;
Against his Will by Soldiers rage,
Was rais'd from safe degree.
And foaring up above the Clouds,
Made King of Egypt Land,
Received amongst the highest Stars,
Did there in glory stand.
But forthwith falling thence, oppress
With Rebels, War, and Age;
Became the scorn of thine overthrow
Most fierce and sickle rage.
And fo with life, together lost
A World of Wealth also;
Which with his stately Kingdom great,
He greatest did forgo.

Selymus having received the City of Aleppo into his Obedience, sent Toussif Baffa before him with a great part of his light Horsemen, to pursue his flying Enemies to Damascus, whither he himself in few days after came also with the rest of his Army, when he understood that his Enemies were departed thence and fled to Cairo. They of Damascus, thinking it not to stand with their good to flay the courts of his Victory, and with their lives to hazard the great Wealth of that rich City; without delay presently opened unto him the Gates at his coming. By whose example other Cities along the Sea-Coast moved, especially Tripolis, Barytus, Sydon, and Ptolemais, sending their Embassadors, and receiving in the Turks Garrisons, yielded themselves in like manner.

Not long after, Selymus held a great Council in his Camp, which then lay under the Walls of Damascus; for he would not bring his Soldiers into the City for troubling the quiet and populous state thereof, together with the great Trade of Merchandise, which at that time was with wonderful security kept there by Merchants of divers Countries, coming from far, even from the remotest parts of the World. And in the Camp such was the military discipline of that most brave Commander, that the Soldiers (knowing the Victory to give them no whit the more liberty) suffered the fruitful Orchards and Gardens of the Citizens, in the most plentiful time of Autumn, to rest in safety untouched, without any keeper. By which severe and frugal government he so politically provided against all wants, that his Camp was in all parts furnished with plenty of all things necessary, and that at prices reasonable. There taking unto him men skillful in the Laws and Customs of the Country, and calling before him the Embassadors of all the Cities of the Country, he heard and decided the greatest controversies of the Syrians, appointed Governors over the Provinces and Cities, took view of the Tributes and Customs, and abrogated many Customs and Tributes due unto the old Sultans, which seemed either unreasonable or grievous to the People; thereby to gain the fame of a just and bountiful Conqueror.

When he had thus set all things in order in Syria, and sufficiently rested and refreshed his Army; and especially his Horses which with long and continual travel were grown maise and lean; he of nothing more delicious than of the Conquest of Egypt, and the utter subversion of the Kingdoms of the Mamelukes Government; sent before Sinan Bassa into Judea with fifteen thousand Horsemen, and a strong Regiment of Harquebussiers selected out of the Janizaries and other Soldiers, to try the passage of that Country, and to open the way for him to Gaza, which was thought would be unto him very troublesome, by reason of the wild Arabians roaming upon and down that Country. The City of Gaza standeth near the Sea towards Egypt, not far from the fandy Deserts, whereby men with much difficulty and dangerous travel pass out of Syria, and so to Cairo.

In the mean time, the Mamelukes who under the conduct of Gazelles were come to Cairo, with all the rest of their order which were thither assembled from all parts of the Kingdom, entering into Council together (as it often falls out in time of danger and distress) without all contention or dissent, Tamembius (of the Turks called Tamambur) a Circassian Father, to be the King. He was then the great Diademe, and by his Office next in honour and power unto the Sultan, whose Prowess and Policy was such, that he only in the opinion of all the Mamelukes was thought able and sufficient to stay and uphold the afflicted and declining State of the Kingdom. He by their general consent and good liking promoted to the State of the great Sultan, thinking (as truth was) his own Majesty, and the remainder of the Mamelukes hopes, to be wholly reposed in Arms, and the fortune of Batel began with great carelessness and singular industry to provide Arms, Weapons, and Horses from all places; he also caused great force of Ordnance to be cast, and mustered great Companies of such of his Slaves as seemed meet for the War; beside that, he entertained for Pay, many of the Moors and Arabians his Neighbours. He also had great hired, rare men skillful of the Countries to go through the Deserts of the Palmyras into Adipatania, and so to Hijmal the Persian King with Letters, earnestly requesting him to invade the Turks Dominions in Asia the left, or with all speed to break into Comagena, being by the departure of the Enemy left bare and destitute of sufficient Garrisons; and farther to advertise him, that Selymus who then lay in the borders of Judea, might easily be inclosed with their two Armies, and so be annihilated, or for want of Victuals distressed; and the rather, for that there was no Fleet of the Turks upon that coastable from Sea to relieve their Army by Land, or yet to transport them thence in case they should by chance of War be distressed, and so think to return. In which doing, he should both relieve the Egyptian Sultan, and confederate, for his sake brought into great danger; and also without any great trouble or peril notably revenge himself of so many shameful injuries as he had before received from that most capital Enemy. Whilst Tamembius doth these things, Sinan Bassa the forerunner of Selymus, having easily repulsed divers companies of the Arabians, who in manner of Thieves and Robbers lay upon the passages, had now opened the way, and was come to Gaza; where the Citizens, although they were in heart faithful unto the Mamelukes, yet for that to thrust their Gates against the Bassa, and so stand upon their guard without a sufficient Garrison, seemed a matter both perilous and unreasonable, forthwith yielded their City upon reasonable composition; and with the plenty thereof relieved the Turks Bassa, giving him great (but dissembled) thanks, that by his means and the good fortune of Selymus, they were delivered from the cruel bondage of the Mamelukes; promising for the remembrance of so great a benefit, for ever to remain his faithful Servants. Sinan commending their ready good-will, required of them all such things as he wanted, or had occasion to use; which they seemed willingly to deliver; and so lodged his Army near unto the Walls of the City, within the defence of the Gardens, purposing in that place to expect the coming of Selymus.

In the mean time (as he was a man of great experience, and most skillful in Martial Affairs) he fought by all means to get knowledge of that Desert, and unpeopled Country, not inhabited for lack of Water; and especially of the nature of the great Sands whereby Selymus was with his Army to pass; he also won by rewards the Inhabitants of the Country thereabout, by large offers, to procure unto him the favour of the Chieftains and Leaders of the Arabians, near unto those places; and also to spy what the Mamelukes did at Cairo, and wherein they reposed their chief confidence, and forthwith to give him knowledge thereof.

On the other side, the Citizens of Gaza, at heart Enemies unto the Turks, as daily feeling the grievances of the present Army, advertised Tamembius of the coming of Sinan Bassa; and that this order of the Turkish Army might easily be oppressed before the coming of Selymus; if at strong power of Mamelukes were sent either under the conduct of skillful Leaders; promising that if the Mamelukes would at an appointed time upon the fuddin in the night let upon the sleepy Turks, they would at the same instant fill out of the City upon their Walls, and so by Fire and Sword do what harm they could for the overthrow of the Enemy.

Of this device, Tamembius and the Mamelukes liked well, and to without delay sent Gazelles fifteen thousand chosen Horsemen, and a great number of the Arabians, to perform the exploit upon Sinan; for Gazelles in that his wicked and ambitious heart being by Campsin and others rejected (who had been straitway desirous of Batel), had rashly cast cast themselves and the whole State into so great calamity) and afterwards in the greatest danger of the Batel having performed all the parts of such credit, he with Men held a great opinion both of his valour and direction.

But he was scarcely well for forth, when advertisement was given unto Sinan by his Syrian intelligencers, that the Mamelukes with the Arabians were coming through the fandy Deserts, upon the sudden to oppress him; and that they would be with him before two days were expired, forasmuch as they had for forward upon the Spur, without any Carriages or Baggage to let them. Which overture in good time given, as it was the safeguard of Sinan's Army, so was it of great import and moment, for the obtaining of the full Conquest of Egypt afterwards. But Sinan Bassa, although he knew not of the Treachery of them of Gaza, yet as a Man of prudent and subtil Wit, suspecting that such a thing might happen; because he would not at once have to do with a double Enemy, resolved to go and meet the Mamelukes upon the way, and to give them Batel. Wherefore with great silence dislodging his Army before twelve and twelve of the Clock in the night, he set forward and marched out of sight of the City about fifteen Miles toward Egypt. There was near unto that place a little low Village, wherein Travellers used commonly to lodge, for the commodiousness of a lively and plentiful Spring which there issued, and by chance both Sinan Bassa had purposed to stay, and Gazelles in like manner had also determined to rest a few hours to refresh his Army, that he might by night, after he had well refreshed his Horses, come unlooked for upon his Enemies at Gaza; when news was brought to both the Generals almost at one instant, by the runners of both the Armies, that the Enemy was at hand.

Gazelles not a little troubled with that unexpected news, for that he perceived himself disappointed of his purpose; and unable to fight with his Enemies in plain Batel, especially his Horses being fore wearied with Travel, was inforced upon the fuddin for the safeguard of himself and his followers, to resolve upon a new resolution; yet nothing discouraged, with cheerful countenance and lively speech exhorted his Soldiers to make themselves ready for Batel, and that which they could not by policy perform to pass, they should now by plain force bring. Sinan on the other side having somewhat sooner set his Men in order of Batel than had Gazelles, forasmuch as he had before at good leisure taken order what he would have done, if it should come to the point of Batel; with constant look and daring perswasions full of hope, encouraged his Soldiers to fight. But the conclusion of all his Speech was, That the Law of play the Men, and not once think of flight, forasmuch as all places about them would be shut up, and become impassible, if they obtained not the Victory; and that above all things they should persuade themselves, that no one of them could that day perish, but such as the immortal God had by the inevitable Law of fatal Destiny, appointed to die; and that which laid hazard valiant Men found life in the midst of their Enemies Weapons, that Cowards by immutable Destiny found death in their latest flight.

The Bassa had placed his Harquebussiers in the Wings of his Batel, which were ranged at a great length in thin Ranks, thereby to use their Pieces at more liberty, and with more ease to inclose the Enemy; in the middle were placed the Horsemen to receive the first charge of the Mamelukes. Gazelles, approaching the Enemy, sent before the Troops of the Arabian light Horsemen to trouble the Wings of his Enemies Batel, and with a square Batel of his Mamelukes charged the middle Batel of the Turks. The Batel was a great while most terrible, and the Victory doubtful; for although the Turks in number far exceeded, yet were they not able to endure the armed and courageous Mamelukes, but were glad to give ground; and quite disordered by the breaking in of the Mamelukes, as Men discouraged, began to look about them which way they might fly; when by the commandment of Sinan the Harquebussiers, who with the first Volley of their shot had repulsed the Arabians, wheeling about, enclosed all the Enemies Batel. By which means both Men and Horses were a far off slain, with the multitude of the deadly thro; where true Valour helped not them, so on every side inclosed. For where any Troop of the Mamelukes pressed forward upon the Turks, they quickly retired, and in all places of the Batel as much as they could thinned to encounter their Enemies with their Horsemen, labouring only to gaul them with shot. Gazelles seeing his Horses spent with extreme weariness, and that he was not to expect any further help from his Arabians beginning now to fall from him, his Arabians being, that many of his most valiant Soldiers were either slain or wounded, and having also himself received a great wound in his Neck, he with the rest of his Army made way through the midst of his Enemies, and having lost divers of his Ensigns, fled back again to Cairo through the fandy Deserts whereby he came. In this Batel was slain the Governor of Alexandria, and Orcheman Governor of Cairo (both Men of great account among the Mamelukes) and beside them a great number of Arabians, with a thousand or more of the Mameluke Horsemen. Neither got Sinan a joyful or unbloody Victory, having lost above two thousand of his best Horsemen, and amongst them certain Commanders, Men of great mark.

The Turks weary of this Batel, which had endured from noon till night, and many of their Horses fainting under them, were notable to pursue their Enemies, and therefore encamped themselves in the same place where the Batel was fought, near unto the Fountain. The day following they at leisure gathered the spoil, and cutting off the Heads of their Enemies, which were easily known by their long and rough Beards, fastened them up upon the Date Trees growing thereby, as well in witness of their worthy labour, as by that strange and horrible spectacle to feed the eyes of their fierce Emperor, who was shortly after to pass that way, and so to manifest unto him the Victory of that day.

In the mean time they of Gaza upon the rising of the Sun, perceiving the Turks Camp left empty, as Men not able longer to dissemble their covert Treachery; and vainly supposing that Sinan Bassa upon some knowledge of the coming of the Mamelukes, had for fear retired back into places of more safety, suddenly set upon such as were left in the Camp, which were for most part sick and weak Men (yet in number many) whom they most cruelly flew; and presently after set upon two thousand of the Turks Horsemen, sent from Selymus to Sinan, which by chance were come thither the same day, enquiring with great carelessness what was an invincible courage) presently entered into his wonted and deep devices, and calling to him his chief Commanders, quickly told them what he would have done. Now in this short moment of time he was to do many things at once: the signal was to be given for the Soldiers to mount their Horses, and to make themselves ready, the order of his Camp was to be changed, his Battel to be ordered, his Soldiers as the encouraged, and all his great Ordnances, as the case required, quite the contrary way to be turned; all which things, as they could but hardly and troublefomely by one Commander be directed, so were they hastily and disorderly at once done by many. But above all other things, the great concern of people for turning and removing the great Artillery, most troubled the well ordering of the rest; for many of them were huge Iron pieces of great weight, made fast in Stocks of wood, with Rings and iron Clamps, after the old and rude manner of ship Ordnance, which for their exceeding and ponderous weight, could not be out of their places removed, but by the strength of many Horses, and the great labour of Men, with leavers and rouls put under them; and such as were mounted upon Carriages when they were drawn through all parts of the Camp, with the great clamour of the disordered and halcy People, some drawing, some thrusting forward the same, with their tumultuous fire and doings, wonderfully troubled the other Soldiers as they were mounting to Horse and repairing toward their Ensigns. But two things marvellously helped these difficulties, the Soldiers cheerfulness, and constancy, which was such as passeth credit; for they did not upon any apprehension of fear fail either in hope or courage, as oftentimes it happeneth in suddain accidents, wherein even the old approved Soldiers do many times fail of their wonted valour. And although they were twice overcome in Battel, yet still they were of greater spirit and confidence, as Men delitute neither of courage or skill, but only of fortune.

Wherefore Tomomheius having with much ado ordered this Battel, and his Soldiers with great cheerfulness, desiring the signal to be given, commanded all the multitude of his Arabians to compass in the wings of the Enemies Battel behind, and so to skirmish with them; that so (if it were possible) the Turks Horsemen might with the danger of the doubtful fight with such an uncertain Enemy, be disordered before he set forward to charge them with his Troops; and wihal commanded his great Ordnance (which was now turned upon the Enemy) to be presently discharged. So did the Turks likewise, discharging at once from a convenient distance both their greater and smaller Ordnance; and speedily recharging them, brought them within an Arrow shot; so that for a good space they lay beating the one the other on both sides with their great Artillery only in which manner of fight the Egyptian Cananiers were almost all slain, and many of their Field-pieces broken by force of the Enemies shot. For Selymus had in his Camp many excellent and skilful Cananiers, whom he had with great entertainment allured out of Italy and Germany; and especially of those refuse Jews, which by the zeal of King Ferdinand being driven out of Spain, afterwards to the shame of the Christians, dispersed those rare and deadly devices through the East. The chief of these Cananiers was one Jacobus a Regio Lepidis, a cunning Engineer, who had many times overcome by the Turks rewards, abjuring the Christian Religion, revolted unto the Mahometan superstition.

But after that the Mamalukes had brought the matter to Battel on both sides, they gave out a most hideous and dreadful cry, and with exceeding fury assailed the Turks in three places; for Selymus still keeping his wonted order, approached his Enemies with his Battel in form of an half Moon. Mulapha Bassa had the leading of the Asian Horsemen in the right wing; and Bassa of the Europeans in the left; he himself stood in the main Battel with the Squadron of his trusty Janizaries, and great store of Artillery; but Sinan the Eunuch Bassa, General of the Field, led after him a great number of most valiant Horsemen, drawn out of every Troop, to be ready against all the uncertain events that might happen in the Battel, unto whom he joyined five hundred Harquebusers, Janizaries, Men of wonderful courage and activity, selected out of Selymus his own Squadron, to relieve such part of the Army as should chance to be most pressed by the Enemy.

So almost at one time, whilst Tomomheius stood in the main Battel against Selymus, and the Wings of the Mamalukes with equal Battel encountered the Wings of the Turks, and the Arabians also valiantly charging them in the rearward as they had in charge, four sharp Battels were at once made in divers places. It is reported by some that were present in that Battel, that what for the clamor and cry of Soldiers, what for the noise of Drums and Trumpets and such like Instruments of War, what for the thundering of Ordnance, clattering of Armor, and rising of the Dust, all Mens minds were so confounded and abashed, that running on headlong Men furious and desperate, where neither their Speeches could be heard, their Tokens known, their Ensigns seen, or Captains understood, mistaking one another in that hurly burly, they flew many of their Friends in stead of their Enemies; for never Battels met together with greater hatred, neither did ever two great Kings with less care of their persons and safety more resolutely or desperately make shew of their strength and courage; for both of them with like danger both of themselves and of their Armies, seeing plainly that they had put both their Lives and Kingdoms to the hazard of a Battel, promised unto themselves no other hope of safety, but what they should obtain by Victory. Gazelles desirous both of honor and of revenge, to requite the European Horsemen with like laughter as he had before received from them not far from Casra, with wonderful fury assailed Sinan Bassa, and at the first encounter brake his first Ranks, and overthrow certain of his Guidons; at which time the Arabians pressing courageously in at their backs, enforced those victorious Troops, which in all Battels had hitherto carried away the prize (the very flower of Thracia, Theflonia, Epirus, Macedonia, and Græcia) to flee and show their backs, which never Enemy had before that time seen. At which time Sinan Bassa carefully attending every accident, came speedily in with his most valiant Troops of fresh Men, upon the side of the Enemy, and reformed against the Battel, now declining and foully disordered. But whilst Sinan, who in this his last worthy labour had interrupted the manifest Victory of Gazelles, was with an invincible courage valiantly fighting in the head of the Battel, he was by the coming in of the courageous Biden with his Mamalukes, overthrown and slain.

His most valiant Followers also labouring to refuse and carry away his dead Body, were by Gazelles unfolding his Troops (that standing thin, they might at more liberty use their Swords,

Swords, in which manner of fight the Mamalukes far excelled the Turks for most part slain, and the rest put to flight; and that chosen Company of five hundred of the most valiant Janizaries, now delitute of their Horsemen, when they had most courageously done what was possible for Men to do, being compassed round with the Mamalukes Horsemen, were all in a trice cut in pieces and trodden under foot. Thus refteth this Eunuch Bassa in the Bed of Fame, who living, had the leading of this most warlike Emperor Selymus his greatest Armies in his most dangerous Wars.

Mulapha in the other Wing of the Turks Battel coming so courageously with his Asian Horsemen, did force press the right Wing of the Egyptians (whereof Helymus the Diadare, and Giapal, two valiant Captains, had the leading) who but a little before had received great harm by the great Ordnance which was discharged out of the midst of Selymus his Battel overthwart the Field; which Mulapha perceiving, and desiring to blot out the old infamy he had before received, did fiercely press upon them, so disordered, and with his whole Troops overthrow their broken Ranks; and glittering in his bright Armor, with a loud voice encouraged his Asian Soldiers, exhorting them that day with valiant prowess or honourable death, to recover their ancient Honour of late lost in the Fields of Aleppo.

At the same time also Tomomheius breaking through the middle Battel of the Turks Horsemen, was entered into the Squadron of the Footmen, with his crooked Scimeter giving many a deadly Wound, himself being a valiant big made Man, and of great strength. The Arabians had also in a ring inclosed the uttermost parts of the Turks Army, and in many places enforced them to turn their Battel upon them, being fore charged with a doubtful fight both before and behind; when Selymus set forward with his Battel of Footmen, and his Squadron of Janizaries, his last and most assured refuge in that his hard distress, whose invincible force, neither the courageous barbed Horses nor their victorious Riders were able to abide; for part of them with their Harquebusers, and the rest with their Pikes, had so strongly set the front of their Battel, that nothing was able to stand whereforever that firm Battel, linked together as if it had been but one whole entire body, stayed. Yet was this cruel Battel continued with divers Troops on both sides, from four a Clock until the going down of the Sun; neither was there any part of their Armies, which had not with divers success and change of fortune, endured the fury of that Battel; for both the victors and the vanquished being iraged with an implacable hatred one against another, fought desperately as Men prodigal of their lives; the Mamalukes disdaining to have the Victory wrung out of their Hands by them whom they had in so many places discomfited; and the Turks taking it in no less scorn, that they, whom but of late they had overcome and vanquished in two great Battels, should now the third time make so strong resistance. So that on both sides their fainting hands and bodies both wearied and weakened with Wounds, supported only with anger and obstinacy of mind, seemed yet sufficient to have maintained that bloody Battel until the next day, the darkness of the night now coming on, had not made an end of that days slaughter.

Tomomheius undoubtedly vanquished, and fearing to be utterly overthrown, first caused a retreat to be founded, that his Mamalukes which were indeed not able to withstand the Janizaries, might not seem to be put to flight, but rather as Men commanded, to retire. Which he thought to concern much both for the encouraging of his Soldiers, and for the keeping of his own credit and estimation with his Subjects; for now the self same fortune which had deceived his first hopes, feared unto him (as it fared with them in distress, still hoping for better) to promise him more prosperous success, if he were not discouraged; but relieving such remainders of his Forces as were left, he should again courageously renew the War.

The Battel thus broken off by the approach of the night, the Turks as Victors enjoying the Sun, and great Artillery of their Enemies, pursued the Mamalukes until midnight, who held on their way to Casra in manner as if they had fled. This great Battel was fought upon a Thursday, the 24 day of January, in the year 1579. The Diadare was taken in the flight mortally Wounded, and with him the valiant Captain Biden, having in the Battel one of his Legs broken in the Knee with a Faulchion shot, wherewith manded them both the next day to be slain, either for that their Wounds were supposed to be incurable, or else for that it was his pleasure, with the death of those two honourable Personages to appease the angry Ghost of Sinan Bassa, whose death he wondrously lamented.

The Turks although they still prevailed, yet were their Army greatly impaired even in their prosperous success and fortunate Battels; the fourth part of their Army was consumed with Sickness and the Sweat, and that days labour had tyred a great number of their Horses, before the long journey they had before endured. For which cause Selymus was enforced to slack somewhat of his accustomed haste; for as yet he had no experience of the disposition of the Egyptians which dwelt at Casra; neither could he understand by any certain report, where Tomomheius layed, or upon what resolution he rested. Which things not thoroughly known, he thought it not good to commit himself and his Army unto that most populous and famous City; but staying four days at the Village of Altheares and Rhodania, carefully provided for his Wounded Soldiers, and caused the Bodies of such as were slain to be buried; but the dead Carcasses of his Enemies he left to the Birds of the Air, and Beasts of the Field. And afterward removing his Camp thence, that he might more commodiously way his came to the Plains between the old Casra and Belack.

In the mean while Tomomheius, nothing discouraged with so many mishaps, gathering together the Mamalukes from all places, encamped his Army commodiously between the new City of Casra and the River Nilar; he also Ardent eight thousand Ethiopian Slaves (which kind of Men he had never before used, for the remembrance of their old Rebellion,) beside that, he opening the old Armory, put Arms into the Hands of the Mamalukes Sons, and Moors, (his Vassals) into the Hands of the Jews and Arabians also; and courageously prepared for a greater and more mortal War than before. But forasmuch as there were many difficulties in the manning thereof, having almost lost all his great Artillery, with many of his most valiant Horsemen slain in the former Battels, and in his troubled mind did foat the doubtful hopes of his last device, (which cruce necessity wrung from him) that forasmuch as he had by many force nothing prevailed in open Field, he would now altogether use policy; as he which of late having unfortunately made proof of his strength, his forces yet all whole, thought it not good again to adventure the fortune of a Battle, neither was he in hope if he should do so, to be able with his final power and desperate supplies to protract the War until the heat of Summer, as he desired. Wherefore he resolved by night to assail the Turks Camp, and if possibly he could, to fit it on Fire. For which his device he seemed to have two reasons; whereof the one consisted in the speedy execution, that he might desperately attempt to do some notable exploit in the night, before the Enemy should perceive the weakness of his power, which was not great, and scambled upon the fuddain; as also before he himself should grow into contempt with the natural Egyptians; who desiring nothing more, than to cast off the servile Yoke of the Mamalukes Government, with wavering minds expected but some fit occasion to Rebel. The other was, That by the benefit of the night he might avoid the danger of the great Ordinance; which in fuddain accidents, and especially in the darkness of the night, forth to little or no purpose; in which kind of strength he had before to his great loss learned, that his Enemies were too good for him. But these his reasonable policies, when all things were in readiness to have put the flame in execution, were in like manner as the first overthrown by the Treason of such as secretly revolted from him to the Enemy.

For Selymus understanding the whole Plot by certain Mamalukes (which having the Kings evil fortune in contempt, as it commonly falleth out with Men in misery, daily forsook him) commanded his Army to be always in readiness, and making great Fires in divers parts of his Camp, kept most careful and vigilant Watch. By which his diligence it came fitly to pass, that the night following, Tommebius approaching his Camp, was repulsed with no small loss of his first Troops which unadvisedly were gone on too far; and had no doubt that night thereby received his last overthrow, but that he wisely minding the unwonted light of the Fires shining in all parts of the Camp, in time called back his halting Troops, which were themselves with more haste than good speed marching into the very mouth of the Turks great Artillery, bent of purpose upon them.

Tommebius dissipated of his purpose, by persuasion of his Chieftains retired to Caire; for the Mamalukes still put to the works in plain Field, thought it best to proceed in another manner; perswading him, with the whole strength of his Army to Man all the convenient places of that great City, otherwise exposed to the Enemies pleasure, and to keep the Turks from entering. For they as Men brought to this extremity, that they must now fight for their Dwellings, Wives, and Children; thought it more honourable, and better agreeing with their ancient glory, to do so in their fight, and in the entrance of their Houses, than elsewhere further off. Wherefore the Mamalukes coming home to Caire, furnished all their Families and flat Roofs of their Houses, with all manner of Weapons; every one of them now humbly requesting the Egyptians their Neighbours, to take Arms against the Turks their ancient and mortal Enemies, and not to suffer themselves to be cowardly slain, their Goods spoiled, and their Wives and Children carried away into most miserable Captivity; forasmuch as the mercilefs and greedy Enemy, if he should once get the Victory, would no whit fear them, although they should as neutrals stand looking on, and help neither party; for Victory (as they said) always fall of infolent pride, would know no Friend but such as with resolute hand did their utmost effort in time of danger for the obtaining thereof.

There were many of the wealthiest of the Egyptians, who as they thought the change of the State would be hurtful to their Trades and Wealth, so were they ready in all they could to help the Mamalukes their old Lords; so on the other side there were many of the middle sort of the Citizens, and a far greater multitude of the basest sort of the vulgar People, who having little or nothing to lose, lived in hope now to make a gain of other Mens Losses; and withal, remembering what misery and slavery they had endured about the space of three hundred years, under the proud Government of the Mamalukes, kept themselves close in their Houses, expecting the last event of Wars; and secretly rejoicing in their Hearts, that the time was come (God so) appointing wherein their outrageous and cruel Matters should be justly and worthily punished for their oppression and hard dealing; and that which gladdened them the more, was, That the revenge should be taken by the hazard of other Mens lives, with which withed spectacle they well hoped shortly to fill their desirous Eyes.

Tommebius with much labour and greater care, fortified all the Gates and Entrances of the City, appointed unto every Street a particular Captain, in every publick place encouraged the People, omitting nothing that could possibly be done or devised; and that which in so great a calamity and danger was of all other things the hardest, with cheerful countenance and undaunted courage made shew of greatst hope. The Mamalukes also, beside the necessity (which in cases of extremity is power to encourage and make desperate a faint hearted Coward) provoked with emulation, strove amongst themselves, who should best perform all the duties of worthy Captains and Soldiers; for every one of them according to his conceit and device, caused great Ditches or great Timber-logs to be cast overthwart the Streets; some in covert Trenches fit up sharp Stakes, whereupon the Enemy falling unawares, might be engaged; other some according to their force, furnished the windows and fronts of their Houses in the greatest and most open Streets, with Harquebuses; all which things with many more, were done with such celerity, that none of the best and most honourable of the Mamalukes refused to handle a Spade or Mattock, or to put his hand to any other base labour; so that nothing could be sooner devised, but it was forthwith performed.

This great and ancient City of Caire were not compassed with any Walls, yet were there divers Gates and Entrances which led into it; whereof one broad frait Street came directly from the East Gate unto the Castle and middle of the City; the rest were so narrow and crooked, that by them no great Artillery could possibly be brought, or Soldiers enter without great danger. Into this place especially had Tommebius conveyed his chiefest strength; for that he knew his Enemies must of necessity come in that way for the largeness of the Streets; the other parts of the City he kept with less Garrisons. But the innermost part where the Castle stood, was kept with a very great and strong Garrison of most valiant Soldiers; that whithersoever the clamor of the Enemy or danger of the Battle should call,

they might speedily from thence come with relief. For why, that City of all others the greatest, could not with so small power as Tommebius then had, be in every place and entrance sufficiently defended; for within the circuit of Alemphis (now called Caire) are contained, three great Cities, which joyned one to another with stragling Bridges, make one City; whereof the greatest and most populous, is at this day called New Caire. It lieth in length six miles, alongst the River Nilus, from which it is equally distant a mile; the breadth thereof, exceedeth not a mile and a quarter. In the midst thereof is a Castle standing upon a little rising ground, somewhat higher than the rest of the City; more notable for the beauty and greatness thereof, than for the manner of the fortification; for in it were many princely Gardens, a fair Street with many large Galleries, divers fair Tilt yards and Courts, with stately Chambers opening every way; the utter part thereof was garnished round about with Towers, Fortresses, and beautiful Battlements, from whence all parts of the City, the River Nilus running by, and the high Pyramids, were most pleasantly to be seen. Not far from this princely Palace, is a Lake made by the hand of man, the Water wherein derived from the River Nilus, is on every side inclosed with most stately Buildings; and is a place of wonderful pleasure, when as a man standing at a Window may take both Fish and Fowl, whereof there is far greater and finer than this, in form of a Triangle, in the uttermost part of this new City of Caire toward Balach; it is filled at the rising of Nilus by a great Sluce made of Stone with Iron Floodgates, and being joyned to the great River by a broad Channel, is able to bear small Boats and Barges; wherein Gentlemen for their divertisement used to place themselves both by day and night in courting their Mistresses. The Houses were all of stately build, and all about the Lake, with Porches garnished with open Galleries, and paved with smooth Marble even to the brim of the Lake; there the Citizens in their more prosperous times used to row up and down in Boats, and with pleasant Musick to delight the listening Ears of the hearers. On the East side of this Lake stood a most sumptuous and stately Palace, the late work of Queen Dulide Wife of the great Sultan Cyberinus, for manner of the Building and inward beauty far exceeding the other proud Buildings of this pleasant place; for the Walls glittered with red Marble, and partering of divers colors; yea all the House was paved with checker and tessellated work; the Windows and Gates were made of Alabaster, white Marble, and much other spotted Marble; the Posts and Wickets of massy Ivory, checkered with glittering black Ebony; so curiously wrought in winding knots, as might easier say than satisfy the Eyes of the wondering Beholders; neither was the Furniture in it inferior to the significance of the Building, but such as might fitly answer both a Princes state, and a Womans quaint desire. All which things shortly after Selymus (having obtained the Victory) carried to Constantinople; not sparing the very Walls, but plucking them down, so to take out the curious Stones whole. Beside the goodly Buildings about the Lake, in every place of New Caire were to be seen the fair Houses of the chief Mamalukes, more commended for their commodiousness, than for the manner of their Building. The rest of the Buildings of the City was but low, replenished with the common sort of base People. There are yet extant in divers places of the City, three Churches of the Christians; whereof one is holden in greater reverence than the rest, for the fame of a low Vault in the ground; where it is reported the Virgin Mary flying the fury of Herod, to have repelled herself with her Child Christ Jesus the Saviour of the World; another dedicated to the Virgin Barbara; and the third to St. George, which amongst those Nations are of great fame. Unto the City of New Caire, the City of Bulach is joyned almost with continual Buildings. It is of an high and stately Building, lying close unto the River Nilus, and was in Summer time frequented by the Mamalukes and other Noblemen, that they might at their pleasure from their high places behold the inundation of that famous River. There land all the Ships which come up the River; yet the great meeting of the Merchants is at New Caire. On the other side of the River over against Bulach, are many Cottages made of Hurdles and Leaves of Date Trees, the Dwellings of poor Fishermen and Watermen. A little above Bulach is Old Caire, which is also joyned unto the new City with continual Buildings; yet distant from it about two miles and an half, and standeth also built by the River in an Island, notable for the pleasantness of the Gardens and Banqueting Houses therein; in it is an ancient Temple, famous for the love of King Phorbus Daughter and the danger of Moses (a most ancient History, yet every where there still fresh in memory.) But most part of the Buildings of Old Caire, are now grown into Gardens and rude Ruins. It is supposed by many probable Conjectures, that there sometime stood the ancient City of Alemphis. Upon the Bank of the River, the late Sultan Carnifin built a sumptuous Tower, overtopping the Castle in New Caire, to convey Water thither out of Nilus; which being by many Wheels and ingenious devices forced into the top thereof, and there received into great Cisterns, was from thence by Pipes of Stone and Lead, conveyed into all places of the Kings great Palace at New Caire. About five miles distant from Old Caire on Affrick side stand the Pyramids, Monuments of the barbarous Egyptian Kings vanity; whose proud Names and Titles time hath worn out of those huge and wonderful Buildings, of purpose made for the vain extermizing of their Fame and endless Wealth; so that of them it may now well be said,

Interitus saxis nominibusque veni.*

What wonder we that men do dy? the stately Tombs do wear;
The very Stones confume to nought, with Titles they did bear.

Within them are the Sepulchers of the old Egyptian Kings, divided into Chapels, garnished with Stone of great price curiously wrought. Yet are those places of a loathsome smell, and for darkness thereof, dreadful to behold; for as men go down to come into them by a narrow way, almost swarved up with Rubbish, their lights are oftentimes put out; with the damp of the Earth and swarms of Remise flying about their Ears. Some having got to the tops of them, report, that the Watch Tower of Alexandria, at the mouth of the River Nilus where it falleth into the Sea; is from thence well to be seen; and that for the great height of them, a man cannot shoot an Arrow so high as the middle of the lower Tower whereon the Spire standeth.

Bounty. Not long after, when as the Moors and wild Arabians, with certain Mamelukes that were fled to the City of Achafia, made incursions into the Country about Caire, and oftentimes did cut off the Turks which were any thing far from the City to seek abroad for forage, he sent Gegefa with part of his Army to repress them; who having quickly won and sackt Achafia, and slain most part of those adventurers, to his own great praise, and the wonderful contentation of Selymus, honourably returned in less time than was expected.

In the mean time, Tomombeius in the Country of Segessa (which is on the other side of Nilus towards Cyrenacia) miserably befel with so many mischiefs, began to make head again. There were come unto him a strong Company of Mamelukes from Alexandria, which he had by Letters sent for out of the Garrison of that City, and many others had followed him in his flight from Caire. And there were not wanting many great men amongst the Arabians and Moors (the Inhabitants of that Country) which promised him their help and furtherance. Besides that, many of the Egyptians, whose Houses and Families were become a Prey and Booty unto the insolent Turks, promised him, That if he would by night come to Caire, they would raise such a tumult in the City, as should easily work the confusion of the Turks; forasmuch as they all having endured most horrible Indignities and Villanies, could no longer abide those most insolent men to rage and reign over them. They sent him word also, that the Turks huge Army was now brought to a considerable number, most part of them being slain in the battle at Caire, and the rest being for the greatest part brought to extrem weaknes with wounds and sickness. For which causes, as Tomombeius his Forces increased daily, so hope also, which never failed the poor vanquished and distressed King, began now also to revive in his invincible heart, above the condition of his miserable estate. So that fawning fortune, which even then most cruelly and despitely went about utterly to supplant him (Of all other distressed Princes, most miserable) seemed but then first to change her frowning countenance, and to promise unto him more happy and prosperous success.

Whilst Tomombeius was making this preparation, one Albuchomar, an Egyptian, for Authority and Wealth the greatest man by far in all the Country of Segessa, whether it were to avert the misery of the present War out of his Country; or by the pleasure of his revolt to gain the good liking of Selymus, upon whom all things seemed to fawn, came and certified him both of Tomombeius his Strength, and of the new practices of the Citizens of Caire. Whereupon Selymus caused frong watch and ward to be kept in all places of that great City; and such Citizens as he suspected to favour Tomombeius, he shut up into the Castle; which being before abandoned by Tomombeius, was then together with the City in his possession; and placed all along the River, Boats furnished with Men and Artillery, to keep and defend the farther Bank of Nilus, and to impeach Tomombeius his passage over. Yet considering with himself, with how great danger he had so many times fought with those desperate Enemies, and what a difficulty it would be to intercept Tomombeius, (prosecuting the War in those vast and unknown Countries, and still preparing greater Forces, without whom he could nothing afford himself of all his former Victories) to prove if he might be won by Clemency and Bounty, he resolved to send Embassadors unto him, to persuade him to lay down Arms, and after so many overthrows, at length to acknowledge the fortune of the Victor; and withal to promise him upon the faith of a Prince, That if he would come in and submit himself, he should of the Countess and Bounty of the Conqueror, upon conditions reasonable repeffs that his late Kingdom; which he should never be able by force to regain. But if he would needs desperately proceed to make head again, forgetting his offered grace, together with his own disability, he should afterward when the matter was again tried by Batel, by his own just desert never more find the hands of his angry Enemy, any regard of his Princely State or Dignity.

For Selymus seeing himself by the counsels of his Victories drawn into a far Country, and not without cause fearing with so small a power as he had left, to be oppressed in that great and populous a City, even with the very multitude, men of so doubtful Faith; thought it better by some honourable composition to assure himself of some great part of that he had won, than by going on to thrust himself with his Army into new dangers, with the hazard of all. Besides that, he was certainly adverted, That the Mamelukes before fled into divers Countries, were in every place levying new supplies of Horsemen; and that the Fleet which went into the Arabian Gulf against the Portugals, was daily expected at the Port of Suezia, wherein were three thousand Mamelukes under the leading of Amprafes and Roy Salomon, two expert Captains, with great force of good Brass Ordnance; by which good helps, Tomombeius stood in fair possibility to recover his former losses, and to return again to Caire, whither he was by his secret Friends most earnestly invited. But above all things, the care he had of the Persians most induced him to think of Peace; for fear that if the Baffa whom he had left at the Mountain Taurus, should not be able to withstand the Forces of the Persian King, he should be excluded out of Asia the lesser, and Syria also, before his Fleet could from Constantinople arrive with new supplies of Men and Victuals at Alexandria.

Wherefore he sent certain of the most reverend Selymus his Embassadors (being the most honourable Egyptians, Embassadors to Tomombeius; who passing over Nilus, into the Country Segessa, were without further hearing, with more than barbarous cruelty slain by certain Mamelukes which thence upon them thinking, thought to gratify Tomombeius as yet not knowing of any such matter, and to manifest their affection towards him, as also that they were not desirous of any peace with the Turks.

This proud and insolent fact utterly brake Selymus his patience, and shortly after made an end of that mortal War, together with the honour of the Mamelukes. For he being a man of an hot and cruel nature, even when he was nothing as moved, could by no means brook that his Enemies, so often vanquished and put to flight, should to lightly reject his offers unto them as the case stood, both honourable and profitable; and that worse was, violate his Embassadors against the Law of Nations, most religiously kept even amongst the most barbarous and savage People. Wherefore provoked by so great an injury, he carefully provided for all things necessary for his expedition into Segessa against Tomombeius. And because it stood not with his honour, as he took it, nor with the good of the present service, to pass the River by Boats, he gathering together all the small Vessels and Lighters he could possibly, made thereof a large and strong Bridge over Nilus.

The cause moving Selymus to send Embassadors to Tomombeius

Selymus, and of the Bridge he had made; fearing also the revolt of the Country People, whom he probably suspected to be alienated from him, by the revolt of Albuchomar, a man of so great Power and Authority amongst them; determined once again to prove the fortune of batel, which had so often deceived his expectation. For he justly measuring of his own strength, and finding himself in all things inferior to his mighty Enemy, well saw that he was neither able to protract the War, neither in open field to abide his coming with all his Forces; and to fly further into the Deserts, was, as he deemed it, nothing else but to make shipwreck of that small remainder that was left of his Honour and Credit. Wherefore by the advice of his best Captains (which was the last endeavour both of himself and of the Mamelukes) he departed betime out of the Province of Segessa with four thousand Mamelukes, and twice as many more of the Arabian People, travelled day and night without intermission to come to the River Nilus. By that desperate attempt to deceive the Turks, suspecting no such thing from their vanquished and weak Enemy; as also by celerity to prevent the fame of his coming; hoping so by his sudden and unexpected approach to overthrow that part of the Turks Army which should first pass the River, before they could possibly be relieved from the other side. Neither was he deceived in the computation of the time, which he having before exacted, with the manner of his travel, fell out to fifty, that he came to the place he desired, even at such time as the Asian Horsemen were come over the Bridge, as he had before guessed. The Harbengers and Pages of Selymus his Chamber, which were gone something further than the rest, to make choice of the most commodious place for the erecting of the Emperors Pavilion; by the rising of the dust first perceived the coming of the Enemy; and Musapha the great Baffa, verified thereof, suddenly raised an Alarm; which so unexpected a matter brought a great fear both on them which were already past over, and also on them that were on the further side of the River.

Tomombeius presently affailing his Enemies, as yet but putting themselves in order, and repairing to their Ensigns, at the first onset flew such as made resistance, and the rest he dismissed and put to flight. Neither was Musapha, that great Commander (although he did what possibly he could, by his own example to have encouraged them) able either by his own invincible courage or other perswasion, after his first ranks were overthrown, to repair his disordered Batel, or to stay the flight of his men; for in that so hot and sudden a skirmish all was full of tumult, laughter, doubtfulness and fear; and all amongst the Bank of the River, both above and beneath the Bridge, were to be seen fearful Companies of the Turks, ruthfully looking upon the River, and crying unto their Fellows on the other side for help. Many forced by the furious Enemy, took the River and there perished; others striving at the end of the Bridge, to return that way, and overborn by their Fellows or others continually fensed from the further side, or else amazed with fear, fell into the River, and were there drowned; the Bridge was so broad that four or five men abreast might easily pass over at once, and so great numbers of them in short space be conveyed over. But when the great Ordnance (the Turks chief strength) was also to be transported, fewer Troops of Horsemen were sent over, than the greatness of the present danger, or suddenness of the chance required. Neither did their great

Artillery as then stand them in any stead, for that it could neither so speedily be conveyed over, nor without great hurt be discharged from the higher Bank to the further, by reason of their own men standing between them and the Enemy.

In the mean time Selymus, who in the beginning of the skirmish came down to the Rivers side, filled a great number of Boats and other small Vessels with his Janizaries with their Harquebuses, and withal halted his Horsemen over the Bridge to relieve their Fellows distressed on the further side; in which Boats the nimble Watermen used such diligence in landing of some, and presently in fetching over of others, that in short time they had transported divers Bands of those most ready and valiant Soldiers; whose coming wonderfully comforted the Asian Souldiers, even now at the last call, and ready to have given over, Cameghis also, the Tartar Kings Son and Selymus his Brother in Law, encouraging his Horsemen to take the River, with loss of some few of his men recovered the further side, to the great admiration of the beholders; which in that Nation was not so much to be marvelled at, as they which by Troops with their Horses had oftentimes swam over the great Rivers Taurus and Volga, no less dangerous than was the River Nilus.

Tomombeius at the same time, for that he saw speedy Victory to consist in one thing especially, leaving his Troops together, strained himself with might and main to have gained the head of the Bridge, that by pushing away some few of the great Boats, he might thus in his Enemies already come over; and by cutting the Cables whereby the Boats were fastened to the bank, all the Bridge with the Turks upon it, might be born away with the force and violence of that great River; whereupon rose a most cruel and deadly Fight; for the resolute Mamelukes in the front of their batel fought valiantly; and Musapha well considering the danger, had drawn to that place both his Ensigns and his best Souldiers; so that there was fought such a fight, as a matter of so great consequence required: the Mamelukes plainly seeing, that if they could obtain the place, they should shortly after with little ado, overthrow all the former Victories of their Enemies. And the Turks no less ignorant, that except they kept the Bridge whole, they were all but lost men that were already come over; and that the rest of the Army, together with their Emperor so far from home, and in the midst of his Enemies, must of necessity shortly after run the same fortune. But Musapha well relieved by the Janizaries and the European Horsemen, which were now come over in great number, not only received his Enemies charge, but pressing upon them, gained ground, and by little and little enforced them to retire. This is that Musapha the Hungarian, and Bajazet his Son in Law, which for his own glory and perpetual fame, built that notable, lately, and sumptuous Stone Bridge (of the Spoils of this Victory) over the River Syrus, which at this day men passing over into Tracia, wonder at, as at a work befitting the greatness of the Roman Empire.

Tomombeius, to give a time of breathing to his Mamelukes, who, their Horses for weariness now fainting under them, were not able longer to shew their wonted Courage; and desirous by them again to prove the uttermost fortune of the batel, exhorted the Moors and Arabians a while to charge the Enemy, which thing they after the manner of their Fight valiantly performed; and shortly after the Mamelukes having a little refreshed themselves and their Horses, came in breath and renewed the batel; with such fury, that that Selymus doubting the Victory (although he was by his most faithful Counsellors persuaded to the contrary) yet doubted not to adventure the Bridge, and in person himself to go and relieve his distressed Souldiers; who by his coming in, encouraged, and in the fight of their Emperor desiring every man for his part by some notable service to deliver both credit and preferment, repressed the fury of the Enemy; who in short time after, by the coming on of certain fresh Companies of Janizaries, were notably repulsed, and so at length put to flight; whom the Horsemen which were not in the battle, pursued all the Fields over. At length also the Tartarians (who carried away with the force of the stream, were somewhat long before they could recover the farther Bank and come to their Enemies) were now come in also, and with their swift Horses following the chase, augmented the slaughter. But Selymus above all things desirous of Tomombeius, presently commanded Musapha the great Basha, Gazelles and Cayserbeus, with certain fresh Troops of light Horsemen, to pursue him at the heels, and if it were possible not to suffer him to escape; for so long as he lived, he could not assure himself of any thing he had yet gotten. These vigilant Captains not unmindful of their charge, following fast after him, overtook him the next day at the sluice of a great deep Fen, where he had a little rested himself and his Followers, being then about to cut off a wooden Bridge, so to have hindered the Enemies pursuit. Some of his Followers being there slain, and some taken, he was again enforced to fly. The third day when he had almost lost all his men, and was come with some few into the Territory of the Sassanian Prince, these great Captains still eagerly pursuing him, and denouncing upon the poor Country People which dwell in Villages thereabout, all Extremities and Tortures, if they did not with most diligent watch and ward to keep the passages of those Marshes, as that he should not possibly escape; he was so beset on every side, that for safeguard of his life he was glad to hide himself all alone in a foul deep Marsh; where shortly after he the poor Sultan was by the diligent search of the Country Peasants found out, hidden among the Flags and Bulrushes, standing in the water up to the shoulders, who delivered him miserably bound unto the Turks. Shortly after he was by certain Captains and other of his chief Friends taken in that Flight, was brought to Caire. Selymus before resolved to put him to death, and the rather for the injury done to his Embassies, would not suffer him to come into his presence; but commanded him to be tortured, so to have caused him to have revealed the great Treasures of Campsin his Predecessor, which were thought to have been by him hidden; in which most horrible and exquisite Torments it is reported, that he with great constancy and stern countenance uttered nothing but certain deep sighs and groans, overcoming with patience the Tyranny of the proud Conqueror; who after that, commanded him in bafe and ragged Apparel, with his hands bound behind him, as a Thief or Murderer condemned to die, to be set upon a foul lean Camel, and so to be carried in derision through all the public and notable places of the City; that the Egyptians might see him, whom they but a little before had adored for their King, by change of Fortune cast into extreme misery, by most shameful death to end both his life and Empire together, when they had thus despitely led him as it were in triumph, and brought him to the chief Gate of the City called Bab elah, they there openly strangled him with a Rope; and that he might be the better seen, and become more contemptible to all that passed that way, they hanged him up by the neck upon an Iron Hook in an Arch of the same Gate, and so left him to the worlds wonder. Palaricus propounding him as a mirror both of the better and worse fortune, for all men to look upon, aptly describeth both his happiness and misery in these few Verses following:

Non fuit in toto, Rex aequo Oriente beatus;
Nec magis in toto Rex Oriente miserr.
Quam dolor Egypti, olim Tomombeius, auro
Ingeni, aequo armis, et ditione potens.
Capit ab hoste fero, miserum simul aequo beatum,
Exemplo potius est, quam fides cohibere?
Quid rides temere? quid fies? vis te cohibere?
Es natum postea te meminisse hominem?
Et natum postea te meminisse hominem?
Et natum postea te meminisse hominem?
Cingebat, fulgore, et ditione caput.
Mi quondam manabat pretiosa monilia collum,
Nunc frastuili vili refocile fume gulam.

In English thus:

In all the East a King more blest was no where to be found,
Nor in the East one more accursed liv'd not upon the ground.
Than Tomombeius, Egypt grief, sometime for force of gold,
Of power great for Martial Force, and Kingdom he did hold.
But taken by his cruel Foe, may good example be both to the happy and distressed, of mans uncertainty.
Why dost thou fondly laugh? Why dost thou vainly cry?
Canst thou from henceforth stay thy self, and think th'art born to die?
My Garments were the Royal Robes, I wore the Crown of Gold,
With richest Stems most richly set, most glorious to behold:
My neck adorn'd with richest Gems which I did sometimes wear.
But now trust up in shameful Rope, behold me hanging here.

This misery befel Tomombeius the thirteenth of the Egyptians in the year 1517, upon the Monday in Easter Week. There were many which fled tears to behold that for cruel and lamentable a spectacle, who by his foul and lamentable and pitiful lamentation seemed to detest that foul and unworthy death of their late Sultan; notwithstanding that the Janizaries reproved them therefore, and threatened them with death, who like giddy brain'd Fools (as they termed them) were to the slavery of the Mamelukes, joyfully and thankfully accepted not of their deliverance; for the Egyptians were as yet uncertain of their Estate, and therefore as men in suspense (not without cause) stood in doubt what should become of themselves; fearing lest the Turks, a warlike Nation, and a terror to all the Princes of Europe and Asia, nothing more courteous than the Mamelukes, should with no less infidelity rage and tyrannize over them, under their warlike and cruel Emperor. Besides that, the woful sight of Tomombeius hanging in the Gate, the unworthy Korn of Fortune, wonderfully wounded their hearts; for why, it was yet fresh in their remembrance, that he with the good liking of all men, and general favour of the Nobility, with good fame rose up all the degrees of Honour both in Field and Court, unto the height of Regal Dignity; and therefore grieved the more to see him him by inevitable Destiny cast down headlong, so shamefully to end his Life and Empire together. A notable spectacle undoubtedly among the rarest examples of worldly fragility, both to the happy and unfortunate; the one, not to be too proud, or too much to flatter themselves in their greatest bliss; and the other, to learn thereby with patience to endure the heavy and unworthy changes and chances of this wretched and miserable world. And so much the more did Tomombeius for hanging, move men to compassion, for that the Majesty of his tall and strong body, and reverend countenance, with his long and hoary Beard, well agreed with his imperial Dignity and Marital disposition. The same fortune with Tomombeius ran also divers of the Princes of the Mamelukes, with some others of the common sort also.

Tomombeius thus taken out of the way, and all the Mamelukes almost slain, and no power of the Enemy to be heard of in all Egypt to renew the War: Selymus dividing his Forces, sent them forth with his Captains, to take in the Countries and Provinces of Egypt lying further off. They of Alexandria after the battle of Caire having thrust out the Garrison, and easily surprised the Castle of Pharus (which the weak defendants chose rather upon hope of promise reward to deliver, than with doubtful event to defend) yielded themselves many days before unto the Turks. Damascus also, called in ancient time Polydamus, opened their Gates, and submitted themselves to the Victors. There was no City betwixt the River of Nilus and the Borders of Judea and Arabia, which yielded not to the obedience of Selymus. The Kings also of Africk bordering upon Cyrenia, Tributaries or Confederates of the Egyptian Sultans, sent their Embassadors with Presents to Selymus.

There remained now none but the wild Arabians (a People never to be tamed) and especially they of Africk, who having lost many of their Friends and Kinsmen in aiding Tomombeius, would not (as it was thought) submit themselves unto the Turkish obedience. This wandering king of People, living for most part by Theft, had filled the Countries from Lybia, where it runneth by the Palmyrens, with all the inner parts of Egypt and Africk unto the Atlantic Sea, with huge multitudes of men; and being divided into many Companies under divers Leaders, have no certain dwelling places, but live an hard and frugal kind of life in Tents and Waggon, after the manner of the Tartars; their greatest Wealth is a good serviceable Horse, with a Lance or a bundle of Darts: they were always at discord and at variance amongst themselves, by reason whereof they could never agree for the expelling of the Mamelukes, who otherwise had not been able to have stood against them, if they should have joined their Forces together. So that the late Egyptian Sultans seemed to hold their State and Empire among so populous a Nation, rather by their discord than their own strength; whose Selymus having now by fit means, upon his Faith before given, allured many of their Chieftains and greatest Commanders to Caire, honourably both entertained and rewarded them. By whose example others moved, came also in dayly; and having received their rewards, gave the Oath of their Allegiance to Selymus. Others which could by no fair promises or words be won, being cunningly intercepted by other Captains, and delivered to Selymus, endured the pains of their vain obstinacy and malice. The other remote Nations toward Aethiopia, as they had in former time rather acknowledge the friendship than the command of the Egyptian Sultans, so now induced with the fame of the Victory, easily joined in like amity with the Turk.

About the same time, Selymus sent certain Troops of Horsemen to Suezia, a Port of the Red Sea (of old called Arifina) about three days journey from Caire; in which Port Campsin the great Sultan (a little before the coming of the Turks) had with infinite charge and four years travel built a strong Fleet against the Portugals, who by their Conquests in India had taken away all the rich trade of the Indian Merchandise into the Gulf of Arabia, to the great hindrance of the Egyptian Kings Customs; over which Fleet (a little before the beginning of the Turkish Wars) Campsin had appointed one Amirafes and Ras Salomon Generals, with a strong power of Mamelukes and great force of Ordnance against the Portugals. These valiant Captains having yet done nothing in the service they were appointed unto, as they lay at Gidda (the Port of the famous City of Meccha, wherein is the Temple of their great Prophet Mahomet) understanding of the death of Campsin, and of the coming of Selymus into Egypt, fell at variance among themselves: one of them being willing to continue his obedience towards the new Sultan, and the other no less desirous to follow the good fortune of the Victor. Whereupon a mutiny arising among the Souldiers, Amirafes, who favoured Tomombeius, was informed to fly to Meccha. But shortly after, all hostility except he were forthwith delivered, he was apprehended by them of Meccha, fearing to have Gidda their Port spoiled, and so sent back again to the Fleet. Ras Salomon, that he might be Admiral alone, his Associate being taken out of the way, and by some notable fact to inflame himself into the favour of the Conqueror, caused Amirafes in the night to be cast over-board; and leaving them to the obedience of Selymus, in few days sailing came back again to Arifina, where leaving the Fleet, he came directly himself to Selymus at Caire, of whom he was graciously received. After that, all the Princes which were before Tributaries or Confederates to the late Sultans of Egypt, even to the Confines of David, the most mighty King of Ethiopia (whom some call Prestier John) without delay entered into the like subjection or consideration with the Turks.

Egypt, with all the Provinces thereunto belonging, thus brought into subjection, Selymus about the beginning of July, sailed down the River of Nilus to Alexandria (Coring-Ogli, a famous Pyrat of Halicanus, sitting at the helm of his Gally) of this there to take view of his Fleet but late come from Constantinople with new supplies both of Men and Victuals, sent from Pyrhus Basha and his Son Selymus, which after he had well surveyed, and diligently viewed the Walls of the City, and of the Castle of Pharus, he returned again to Caire. In the mean time, the Mamelukes in durance at Alexandria, were by his commandment murdered every Mothers Son, in the entrance of the Prison. At which time also above five hundred Families of the noblest and richest of the Egyptians were commanded to remove from Caire to Constantinople, and a great number of Women and Children, of the race of the Mamelukes, were transported thither also in Ships hired for that purpose. Into this Fleet besides the Kings Treasure and Riches, he conveyed all the public and private Ornaments of that most rich and famous City; with such a covetous and greedy desire of Spoil, that the very Marble Stones, commanded either for the excellency of the workmanship, or beauty of the Stone, were violently rent out of the main Walls, to his great reproach and infamy. Lying at Caire, he with great pleasure beheld the rifting of the River

Nilus.

The Mamelukes put to flight.

Tomombeius taken and brought to Selymus.

Selymus cunningly reduces the Arabians to his obedience.

Of this there to take view of his Fleet but late come from Constantinople with new supplies both of Men and Victuals, sent from Pyrhus Basha and his Son Selymus, which after he had well surveyed, and diligently viewed the Walls of the City, and of the Castle of Pharus, he returned again to Cairo.

Nilus, which had then overflowed the Country next unto it; and that with such a desire, that he most curiously enquired of the old Country men the measure and nature to the River; for by the diversity of the rising thereof (which they by certain marks and measures well find out) they prognosticate sometime abundant plenty, sometime extreme dearth, and sometime reasonable store, when as the violent River moderately or furiously breaking out, sometime fo downeth the greatest part of the Country, that all the Seed season it lyeth under water, and at another time floweth so sparingly, that in many places it leaves the Dull, that the Egyptians then assure an undoubted dearth; so that the Egyptians then assure themselves of Plenty, when as Nilus keeping a mean, pleasantly rises neither to the highest or lowest marks of his inundation.

The Mameluke Kingdom, together with the name of the Mamelukes, thus overthrowen, and the Conquest of Egypt so happily achieved, Selymus resolved to make his return into Syria; and the rather, for that it was reported, That Elymas the Persian King was coming with his Army into Mesopotamia, and so like enough to break into Comania. Wherefore having as he thought good, disposed of all things, he left a strong Garrison of his best Soldiers in Caire, and appointed Cayberbe that notable Traitor, his Deputy and great Commander over all that great and new gotten Kingdom of Egypt, now converted into the form of a Province, as it remained at this day. Which honourable pretence he unworthily bestowed, exceedingly both grieved and troubled Jonsius the great Basha, before enflamed with the hope and just desire thereof; for now that Sinan Basha was dead, he puffed up with the estimation of his own worth and valour, and proud of the Wound he had of late received in the presence of Selymus at the entering of Caire, and to the uttermost of his power, suffering no man to grow more in Credit and Esteem than himself the only man now left, to whom of all others, that especial and honourable charge should in the judgment of Selymus and of the whole Army of right be committed. Neither wanted he the general good liking of the Men of War, for immediately after he was recovered of his wound, when he in the most magnificent House of the Diadare at Caire (which he in the Victory had rather than himself usurped, than by the gift of Selymus obtained) daily took princely Cheer for all comers (no small means to gain the love of the common Soldiers) and gave frankly to them all: to some Horses, to some beautiful Slaves; to some Money, Plate, Jewels, rich Garments, fair Armour, and such like: he won unto himself such Favour and Credit, that whenever he should (as the manner was) go to the Castle unto the Emperor, he was brought thither with a great and goodly train of his Favorites and Followers, as the man in all mens Judgment designed to the government of that great and rich Kingdom. All which things highly offended the mind of Selymus, who as he was apt to suspect, and cruel where he feared, so did he also (in secret) envy great Vertues, accompanied with too much honour and power.

Jonsius seeing Cayberbe the Traitor thus unworthily promoted, overcome with grief and indignation (who as a man of a proud and haughty mind, took it as done to his own disgrace) yet colouring his inward discontentment by counterfeiting himself sick, for certain days came not abroad; nevertheless still more and more tormented both with the injury (as he took it) done to himself, and the unworthy preferment of the Traitor, he could not so well contain himself, but that in his choler some words fell from him, whereby his discontentment was perceived. It happened that Cayberbe coming of courtesy to visit him, and in the heat of the day familiarly calling for drink (which was Water and Sugar, after the manner of the Egyptians) immediately after he had drunk, felt such grievous and unwanted gripings and tormentings in his Stomach and Belly, that many supposed him to have been poisoned by the Basha; yet was he by the power and vertue of a more sovereign and effectual remedy preserved. Which report, whether it was true or no, was uncertain; but certain it is, that it sank further into the mind of Selymus, than any man would have thought. He had now also a little before heard, that many of those rich Egyptian Families, which he had before commanded to be removed to Constantinople, had for great sums of Money obtained of Jonsius, (who had the whole ordering of that matter) that they might quietly and in safety remain still in their own Country. Of which his covert dealing, great probability was alleged by such as repined at his honour, and secretly accused him. That those Princelike and excessive charges and expences, which he was not able possibly to maintain of his ordinary Pension were royally supported with the embelished Spoil and Revenues of that new gotten Kingdom. Which malicious suggestions, as they tended to the lighting up of his Credit, so also another crime (whether it were of fraudulent dealing or negligence, or other further respect, is uncertain) coming in the neck of the other, wrought his utter disgrace, and final confusion; for Selymus after the manner of great Princes (who more severely to punish the former offences, notably despoiling their present anger, expect but the occasion of some new crime) with vigilant Eye waiting upon his words and deeds, prosecuted him with a mortal and deadly hatred, with a full purpose to destroy him.

A few days before it was certainly reported that Selymus would again return into Syria, the Soldiers appeared to be left in Garrison at Caire, alleging the great distance of the place, and the greater dangers they were to expect, with the labors by them already endured, requested of the Bounty of their most fortunate Emperor, that they might have their Wages augmented. Which thing Selymus (never spare hand to his Men of War) readily granted, commanding Jonsius the stately Basha, that the sum they required, might be added to their accustomed Wages, and so entered into his accounts for the Wars. But he carried headlong with discontentment, made neither the Treasurers nor Paymasters acquainted with any such matter as Selymus had before commanded; of purpose, that the Garrison Soldiers, despoiled of their greater Wages promised them by the Emperor, might even at the first begin to hate and condemn Cayberbe, as Author of so great an injury; that so the state of Caire, and of that new gotten Kingdom, disquieted by the mutiny of the Garrison Soldiers, Selymus enforced to change his former purpose, should instead of that strange Governor (hated of the Egyptians for his late Treason, and not beloved of the Garrison Soldiers, because he was to them a Stranger) of the necessity find some of their own Bashes, a Turk, for the better stay and assurance of that wavering and mighty Province. But all these things (as commonly wicked purposes have their foul events) fell out in fine far otherwise than he had in his troubled mind before conceived. For Selymus being departed out of Egypt, and now on his way almost as far as Jerusalem, the Garrison Soldiers at Caire, the day-day being now come, and receiving no more but their old accustomed wages, moved with that evil dealing (as contrary to the Emperors promise and their general expectation) began with more fury and rage than ever Jonsius had before imagined, openly and insolently to insult and threaten the Treasurer and Paymasters, and with open mouth to rail upon Cayberbe their Governor. With which so insolent and opprobrious Speeches, he affronted (as one not yet acquainted with the fashions of the Turkish Garri-sons) together with the Paymasters, in best manner they could excuse themselves unto the Soldiers, requesting them not to think so hardly of them who were altogether innocent in the matter, and with patience to understand the truth of the cause; wherein if they should on their part find any fraudulent or evil dealing, they craved no favour, either refused any punishment. Thus Cayberbe and the Paymasters seeking by all means to avoid both the suspicion and the present danger; and the mutinous Soldiers no less halting to find out by whom they were so abused, and to be thereof revenged, it was at last with much ado agreed, That trusty Messengers should forthwith be sent to Selymus, who was not yet gone out of Judea, to understand of him the truth of the matter.

These speedy Messengers having with wonder-ful celerity dispatched their journey, overtook Selymus with his Army a little from Larissa in Judea; and admitted to his presence, openly declared unto him both the complaints of the Soldiers, and the carelessness of Cayberbe and the Paymasters to excuse the matter, together with the danger they were in, with all the other accidents whatsoever which had happened since the time of his departure from Caire. Which complaint so incensed the mind of Selymus with new passions of anger and choler, being already fore alienated with former displeasures, that he without further delay commanded Jonsius Basha to be brought before him to answer the matter; who although he were inwardly stricken with the guilt of his own conscience, and surprised with a deadly fear, which appeared in his colour as pale as Ashes, feeling in the angry face and countenance of his Sovereign the most certain tokens of his heavy displeasure; yet as he was a man of great Spirit, answered boldly, That he had forbidden the Soldiers Wages to be augmented, contrary to his Majesties command, not upon any evil meaning to have inverted that money to his own use, neither thereby to have drawn any man of purpose into disgrace, as was by some his malicious Enemies suggested; but upon great reason, thereby to provide for his Majesties Colours wonderfully emptied with those late Wars; beside that, the constant report of new troubles like to arise out of Perfia, gave good occasion for him to spare unnecessary charges: Whereas on the other side, as he said, the Garrison Soldiers were already enriched with the plentiful Spoils of Egypt, and in a most goodly City possessed the sumptuous Houses and Lands of the Mamelukes, feeding upon the Goods of the Egyptians, and had already received both greater Pay and more bountiful Rewards from him, than ever any Soldiers had from any his Predecessors the Osman Kings; in which case, if they were not past all modesty, they might well enough take it in good part, if they were something restrained in their unreasonable requests. He alleged moreover, that great Princes which retain their Soldiers in reasonable Pay in time of Peace and War, ought sometime for Warlike Discipline, to require of them a moderation of their desires, lest whilst they all strive with greediness for their private gain, there want

Many afterwards in the common Treasury to maintain a greater and more necessary charge, Wars still rising upon Wars; feeling that no Commander, were he never so valiant, or fortunate, ever did any great matter in Wars, if he wanted Coin, the most proper Instrument and very Sinews of War, answering unto his other most beloved parts and sufficiency. But as he was yet thus speaking, Selymus full of wrath and indignation interrupted him; for if he should have suffered him in longer discourses to have recounted his former deeds and worthy service done as well in the time of his Father Bajazet, as of late even in his own preference, he was like enough to have had of them that were able to do much with him, intercessors for him; and so without further delay, caused him even there in his own presence to be executed; saying moreover, that others which would arrogantly presume to prescribe unto their Sovereigns what they had to do, should ever after by the example of that most insolent Servant, be admonished of their duty and condition. It is reported, that the Soldiers in despite of Selymus wonderfully lamented the unworthy death of this so worthy a man; for he befide his notable and rare valor, so many times to his great honour in sundry Battels approved, had by the celerity of his Grecian Wit, Comeliness of Personage, Military Eloquence, and gallant manner of living, so won the love and favour of all men, that there was few or none in all the Army which did not acknowledge himself some way indebted and beholden unto him; and did therefore condemn the Emperors Cruelty. They then began to tell how Mustapha surnamed Calogier, a man of wonderful Credit and Authority both with Bajazet and himself, was in the heat of his fury slain without hearing; and that in like manner of rage, old Chondemur, a man of greatest honour and integrity of life, and of all the Emperors, who came out of the great Emperor Machmet Nusur, the most skillful had been for his grave and wholefome Counsel only, without cause murdered; neither was then Bostang his Son in Law forgotten; neither Cherkegier (the one most honourable for the great place he held in Court and the Marriage of Bajazet's Daughter, and the other a man of no less mark being his great Admiral, and bearing himself high upon his infinite Wealth, but more upon his Wife one of the Daughters of Selymus) both which two Noble Gentlemen about two years before had their heads struck off, no man well knowing wherefore; and their dead Bodies cast out at the Court Gate, to the terror of the beholders, as a miserable spectacle of their own misery and the Emperors Cruelty. Yea the remembrance of his old tyranny (renewed as it were with this late outrage) preferred a fresh untimely death to the Emperor Bajazet, so that all mens eyes the reverend old Emperor Bajazet, his Father, with his two Brethren, Achmet and Cocurtus, by right both called unto the Empire before himself; with many other young Princes of the Blood, of great hope and expectation, who as all men knew, perished through the unnatural and execrable Cruelty of this most merciless man. So that men generally did both fear him and hate him. Forasmuch as he without all fear of God or regard of worldly fame, accounted no practice wicked, or device detestable, that might serve the better establishing of his Kingdom; and had set down in his mind, (long before corrupted with Ambition and Tyranny) That it was far better for the assurance of his estate, to be feared of all than beloved of many; and therefore spared no mans life, of whom he had but the least suspicion. Howbeit that the severity by him used against this so great a man and so gracious with the People, may in some sort be excused, as justly moved thereunto by the over-pressing and malicious dealing of the proud Bassa under-hand, contrary to the charge given him by his Lord, to the peril of those his great but late Conquests both in Egypt and Syria.

This great Bassa, whilst he yet lived and flourished in the Court, in nothing so much offended the minds of the People (who generally both loved and honoured him) as by the Cruelty by him shewed upon the person of the fair Lady Manto his but beloved Wife. Who being a Greek born, and adorned with all the good gifts of Nature, whereunto her lovely conditions were also answerable, was by Zehalia her first Husband (a man of great honour) carried with him into the Wars, as his greatest Treasure and chief delight. But he slain, and she by misfortune falling into the hands of the Turks (her Enemies) remained so prisoner with them for a time; until that this great Bassa Jemul shortly after (seeing her amongst the other Captives there taken, so far to exceed the rest as doth the Sun the lesser Stars) surprised with her incomparable beauty, became of her amorous; and in too curious viewing of the captive Lady, was by her himself taken Prisoner. Where finding her outward perfections graced with no less inward virtues, and her honourable mind answerable to her rare feature, took her unto his Wife, and so she was far above all the rest of his Wives and Concubines; and the again in all dutiful loyalty seeking to please him, for a space lived in all worldly felicity and bliss, not much inferior unto one of the great Sultans. But long lasteth not the Summer Fruit of wanton Love, blasted most time in the blossom and rotten before it be well gathered; for in short time the Bassa more amorous of her Person, than secure in her Virtues, and too easily seduced by sensual men, still fearing lest that which so much pleased himself, gave no less contentment to others also; began to have her in distrust, although he saw no great cause, why, more than his own conceit, nor grounded upon her evil demeanor, but upon the excess of his own liking. Which mad humor (hardly to be over purged) of it self still more and more in him increasing, he became so forward and imperious, that nothing could fly or do could now so please or content him, but that he still thought some one or other, although he wist not who, to be therein partakers with him. So fearful was the jealous man of his own conceits. Yet could he not chafe but love those great perfections; whereat he could not enough wonder, although he found no contentment therein, commenting still both himself and her whom he so dearly loved with his own passionate distrust; until at length, the fair Lady grieved to see her self thus without cause to be suspected, and wearied with the insolent pride of her peevish Husband, together with his imperious commands, determined secretly to depart from him, and so to return again into her own Country. Which her purpose she discovered unto one of her Eunuchs, to whom she had also delivered certain Letters to be by him conveyed unto such of her Friends, as whose help she was to use in her intended flight; which Letters the false Eunuch opened, and for the more manifesting of the matter delivered them unto the Bassa his Master. Who therewith enraged, and calling her unto him, forthwith in his fury, with a Dagger stab'd her to the Heart and flew her; so together with the death of his Love, having cured his tormenting jealousy.

But leaving this great Bassa with fair Manto unto their rest, his course thus run, to return again unto Selymus; who now come into Syria, was by Letters from the Humber-Bassas, or Masters of his Horse (whom he had left upon the Frontiers of his Kingdom to attend the motions of the Persians) advertised, That the Persian preparations which had raised such a hot rumor of Wars in the beginning of Winter, was grown cold in the heat of Summer; and that he had been in all the time of his abode in those quarters, none but certain stragling Companies, making these as if some greater power had been coming, which had many times made suddain roads into the Country, with whom he had sundry times prosperously encountered; and it was generally reported by such Prisoners as he had taken, and by his own Espials also, that Hysmal, troubled with the Hyrcanians and Tartars, had converted the greatest part of his Forces against those Nations; so the Winter now drawing fast on, and deep Snows already fallen upon the Mountain Taurus, he could not though he would that year look into Asia the less, or Syria. There were that reported, that the Tartars which dwell between the two Rivers, Tanais and Volga, were by Selymus his procurement, and money, set at work to keep Hysmal busied, by invading the Iberians and Albanians, which were under his protection; which thing he wrought by the means of Mahomet his Father in Law, the Bosporan King who being of the same Language and Nation, he had easily induced the needy Captains of the Tartars his Friends and Confederates, to take up Arms against their Neighbours.

Many men marvelled that Hysmal the Persian King neglected to fair an opportunity, whereby he might (as most men thought) have thrust Selymus quite out of Asia and Syria, whilst he thus busied in Egypt, yet he durst not have destroyed him, that up with all his power, especially at such times as the Egyptian Sultans Cassim and Tomonibus made so great resistance. But they which could better judge of the matter, saw that Hysmal was not of so great Power and Strength abroad, as at home; for his Army for most part consisted of Gentlemen, or such as were by custom bound to serve him in his defensive Wars, voluntary men, and such as served without Pay. These as they were the most valiant Foremen of the East, so did they with singular Valour worthily defend the Kingdom of Perse, and also as occasion required, make War with their near Neighbours; but if any longer expedition were to be taken in hand, that they could by no means away withal, accounting it a grievous thing to depart from their Wives, unto whom they are so addicted that oftentimes they carry them with them into the Wars; and being a true and kind People, are not able without Wages to draw after them according to their accustomed manner, so many Carriages and Horses as might serve both for their necessary and wanton uses. With which difficulty, the great King Uzun-Cassim, Hysmal his Grandfather by the Mothers side, was much troubled in his Wars against Mahomet the Great; but was now much harder for Selymus to do, for that he having obtained his Grandfathers Kingdom by the meek good Will of the People, easing them forthwith of their heavy impositions, always thought the love of his Subjects (which is easily gotten with Bounty and Justice) the surest riches of his Kingdom; and that to command only over the Bodies and Goods of his People, their Hearts altogether exalted by much heavy and grievous exactions, seemed not the part of a gracious and natural Prince, but of an outrageous and momentary Tyrant. Where-and most detestable practices stept up into his Fathers faith, had after the manner of the Ottoman Kings repaid his greatest and most affixed strength in a servile and mercenary kind of men, whom he might for pay as his own Creatures, at his pleasure draw far from home, and as he best liked lead them from place to place, and Country to Country, for the enlarging of his Empire, and eternizing of his Name; and therefore according to the quality of his People, deemed true and ready power to consist only in money, and the feverity of his own command; whereby he had learned with most happy success, in short time to obscure all the Victories of the former Ottoman Kings, with the greatness of his own.

All the Winter following, Selymus busied with his Army in Syria spending the time in visiting the Ports and Cities of that Province, and setting of things in order, for the better assurance thereof. But upon the approach of the Spring, when he certainly understood, that by the procurement of Leo the Tenth, then Bishop of Rome, the Christian Princes were entered into consultation to make War upon him, and that supplications with great solemnity were made for that purpose, and honourable Embassadors sent into all Provinces to stir up the greatest Kings of Christendom against him, he (leaving Gazelus his Lieutenant in Syria) by great journeys returned to Constantinople; from thence as at hand to behold the devices and motions of Christian Princes his Enemies. In the mean time, fearing no alteration to arise in the Provinces of Syria and Egypt, forasmuch as he well saw, that Cerberus and Gazelus his Lieutenants, being at deadly hatred betwixt themselves (as well for old grudges, as for the late Treason of Cerberus, the great cause of the ruin of the Manalukes Kingdom) would never agree in one against him, but rather with a certain emulation strive betwixt themselves with diligence, faithfulness, and moderation, who should deserve best in well governing the Provinces by him committed to their charge, as indeed they did during the short time of his Reign.

Selymus being arrived at Constantinople, and purposing from thenceforth to turn all his Forces upon the Christians, caused wonderful preparation to be made for his Wars, but especially at Sea; whereby it was thought, that he would have either attempted the strong Island of the Rhodes (a great moat in his Eye) or else some part of Italy. But as he was hatching this mischief, or some other of no less importance, and in the mean time delighted himself with visiting the Cities of Grecia and Thrace, and sojourned himself in the pleasant Country about Hadrianople, he was suddenly attacked with the Hand of God, and stricken in the Reins of his Back with a Cancer; which melancholy and devouring malady concerning all cure, did by little and little so eat and corrupt his body, as that he before so much honoured, became now loathsome and odious both to himself and others.

As he lay thus languishing, his incurable disease still increasing, leaning his head in the lap of Pyrribus the Bassa, whom of all others he most loved, laid, O Pyrribus, I see I must shortly die without remedy. Whereupon the great Bassa took occasion to discourse with him of many matters; and amongst others, that it would please him to give order for the well bestowing of the great Wealth taken from the Persian Merchants in divers places of his Empire; persuading him to bestow the same upon some notable Hospital for relief of the poor. To whom Selymus replied, Wouldst thou Pyrribus, that I should bestow others mens goods wrongfully taken from them, upon works of Charity and Devotion, for mine own vain glory and praise? assuredly I will never do it; nay, rather see they be again restored unto the right owners. Which was forthwith done accordingly; to the great shame of many Christians, who minding nothing less than restitution, but making ex rapina bolocaustum out of a World of evil gotten goods call on some small fragments, to build some poor Hospital, or mend some blind way; a poor testimony of their hot Charity.

Selymus lying thus sick to death, and rotting above the ground in his Tent, as he was upon the way going to Hadrianople, sent before Pyrribus and Acemeter, two of his greatest Bassas, to provide for the solemnizing of the great Feast, which the Turks call Bairam (and is as it were their Easter) purposing to come after himself at leisure, as his weak Body would give him leave; and kept with him only Ferbats, the third of his greatest Bassas and Privy Counsellors. But such was the fury of his foul disease, continually attainting him with intolerable pains, that shortly after the departure of the other two Bassas, he breathed out his cruel Ghost, in the Month of September, in the year 1520, near unto the City Cebirli, in the self same place where he had sometime most unnaturally afflicted his aged Father Bajazet, with purpose to have slain him, had not the fortune of the old Emperor in a great battle prevailed both against his Force and the Treason of his own People. Thus intending the mischief he could not perform, cut off by a loathsome and untimely death, he to the great joy of all Christians ended his days, when he had lived fix and forty years, and thereof reigned eight; which time of his Reign was nothing else but a most horrible and dreadful time of Bloodshed. His dead Body was afterwards solemnly by his Son Solyman buried in a new Temple at Constantinople, which he to the imitation of his Father and Grandfather, had for that purpose before built. Upon his Tomb is engraven in the Greek, Turkish, and Slavonian Tongues, this short Epitaph:

Hic maximus adham Selymus, qui orbem domui. Non bella relinquo, sed pergo inquirere: Non ulla me fortuna potuit evertere: Licet effa jacent, animus quiescit.

In English thus:

Lo here I lie great Selymus, which held the World in fear:
The World I leave, but not the Wars, which I seek, though not here.
No Fortunes force, or Victors hand, could take from me the Spoils:
And though my Bones lie buried here, my Ghost seeks bloody broils.

He used commonly to say, That nothing was sweeter than to reign without fear or suspicion of his Kindred. A little before his death, he commended his Son Solyman to Pyrribus Bassa, frantically charging him, that after his death he should leave the Persians, and turn his Forces altogether upon the Christians. And the more to incense him to the effusion of Blood, he left him the lively counterfeit of himself hanging at his bed side, with sundry bloody Precepts breathing forth his cruel and unmerciful disposition.

Agmen in adversum Marte favente jacet.
Sed refugit sævis caput obesse periculis
Dum gravia imparido, prælia corde subit:

Et votis nunquam fata favere suis.

The Inscription of the Table.

Sultan Selymus Othoman King of Kings, Lord of Lords, Prince of all Princes, the Son and Nephew of God.

On the right hand of the Table were written Greek Verses to this sense.

*T*he Prince that safely seeks to reign, and hold his State in quiet rest,

Must never suffer troubled care to harbour in his Princely Breast.
Nor think it sin to spill the blood of his most near and dearest Kin, Not of his Brother, so thereby assured safety he may win.
Law, Faith, Devotion, and such like, to break them all he must not spare, Nor conscience make of any thing, to rid him
from aspiring care.
This is the way and only mean that may protect a Princes State,
And see him safe without all fear, whilst none
may live whom he doth hate.

On the left hand of the Table was written in the Sclavonian Tongue.

Of him that seeks to work thy wo, deserve not to be counted kind:
But take him for thy mortal Foe, and plague him with revenging mind.
The rotten limb, is cut away for fear of doing further harm:
The gentle Prince doth bear still sway, if no abuse can make him warn.
Forbearance makes men more offend, and to presume of further grace,
It doth but strength to Rebels lend, to thrust their Sovereign out of place.

At the lower end of the same Table was written in Turkish Verse.

What Prince in person darest not in open Field to meet his Foe,
And there with unapplauded heart, his deadly darts himself to throw:
But hides his head for fear of harm, and thuns
the danger of the Field, When Martial minds with courage bold withstand their Foes with spear and shield;
Let him well know, how that in vain he beareth
Arms but for a show,
And that the honour of the Field will never such a Coward know.
Ne let him hope to gain the Spoil by any Wars
he takes in hand,
That feareth with courageous mind his Enemies
Forces to withstand.

The LIFE of
SOLYMAN,
THE FOURTH and most MAGNIFICENT
Emperor of the Turks.

THE death of Selymus was with all carelessness concealed by Ferbates the only Baffa then present, for fear lest the Janizaries and Souldiers of the Court getting knowledge thereof, should after their wonted manner in the time of the vacancy of the Empire, spoil the Merchants and Strangers in places where they lay in Garrison, and especially in the Imperial City; and not so contented, after their accustomed insolvency prescribe unto the greatest Baffaes at their pleasure. For preventing whereof, Ferbates dispatched a trusty Messenger with Letters in Post to Solyman the only Son of Selymus, then lying at Adnegras; certifying him of the death of his Father; and that he should deserve well of his peaceable Subjects by halting his coming to Constantinople, whilst all things were yet in good order, in time to repress with his presence the feared disordered proceedings of his Men of War.

Solyman hardly perceived that his Father was dead.

Solyman having to his great content perceived the Baffaes Letters, as one desirous enough of the Enlarging the cruel disposition of his Father (who upon a meer jealous conceit of his aspiring mind, and for certain words by him let fall in dislike of his Fathers extrem dealing, had practised most unnaturally to have taken him away by Poison; which danger he escaped only by the carelessness of his Mother, who misdoubting the worst, caused the Poisoned rich Shirt sent to him from his Father, to be first worn by one of his Chamber, whereof he in short time after died) and also that the Letters were signed only by Ferbates, and the news not seconded from any of the other Baffaes; fearing some hidden and secret Plot of his Father tending to his destruction, durst not adventure to remove from his charge, but returned the Messenger as one to whom he gave little or no credit. Ten days thus spent, and the death of Selymus nothing as yet suspected; Ferbates undersanding by his Messenger the weariness of Solyman, and that he expected more assured advertisement, sent presently unto the other great Baffaes Pyrhus and Musapha at Hadrianople, that they should without delay repair unto the Court; unto whom at their coming he declared the death of the Emperor. Which after they had seen to be true, they by another secret and speedy Messenger advertised Solyman again thereof, confirming those Letters with all their Hands and Seals; whereby Solyman now assured of his Fathers death, presently put himself upon the way, and by long and painful journeys in few days came to Constantinople, called in ancient time Chrysopolis, over-against Constantinople. Where he was met with the Aga or Captain of the Janizaries, and by him transported in a Gally over that strait passage to Constantinople; where at his landing the Janizaries by the appointment of their Captain were ready to receive him, knowing as yet nothing of the death of Selymus, until that Solyman being now in the midst of them, the Captain with a loud voice said unto them, Behold your Emperor. Whereupon they all with great acclamation cried out, Long live the great Emperor Solyman; which consent of the Men of War, is unto the Turkish Emperors the greatest assurance of their Estate. And so with much Triumph he was by them brought into the Royal Palace, and placed in his Fathers Seat in the year 1520, in which year, also Charles the Fifth was chosen Emperor of Germany. The Janizaries disappointed by the Baffaes of the spoil of the Merchants, especially Christians and Jews, received of the bounty of Solyman a great Large, and in the beginning of his Reign had their accustomed Wages somewhat augmented also, to their wonderment contentment.

Solyman was about twenty eight years old when he began to Reign, and was at the first supposed to have been of a mild and peaceable disposition; so that the Princes to whom the Name of Selymus was before dreadful, were now in hope that a quiet Lamb was come in place of a raging Lion. But in short time they found themselves in their expectation far deceived; and especially the Christian Princes bordering upon him, unto whom he became a far more dangerous Enemy than was his Father before him; converting his Forces most part of his long Reign upon them, which Selymus had almost altogether employed against the Kings of Persia, and Egypt, the greatest Printes of the Mahometan Superstition.

Caizet
of Syria rebelled against Solyman.

The first that felt his heavy Hand was Gazelles Governour of Syria; who presently upon the death of Solyman, thinking himself now discharged of the Oath of Obedience which he had given to Solyman, but not to his Successors; and earnestly desiring to restore again the Kingdom of the Mamelukes lately overthrown, gathered together the remainder of the dispersed Mamelukes, which speedily resorted unto him out of all parts of Asia and Africa; and alluring with rewards the Leaders of the wild Arabians, with great numbers of the Country People of Syria, discontented with the Turkish Government, entered into open Rebellion, and by force of Arms drove the Turks Garrison out of Birbia, Tripoli, and into his own possession. Solyman, taking them into his own possession. And the better to effect that he had taken in hand, he sent Embassadors to Caire unto Cayrebeis, who had of Solyman received the Government of Egypt, the unworthy reward of his horrible Treason; perswading him by any means to take revenge of the injury and wrong before done to the Mamelukes, and by killing of the Turks Garrisons to make himself Sultan of Egypt, and restore again the Kingdom of the Mamelukes, offering him therein the uttermost of his devotion and service. But Cayrebeis, either not trusting Gazelles his old Enemy, or ashamed by new Treason to augment his former dishonor, or else (which was most like) misdoubting his own strength in performance of so great an enterprise; after he had attentively heard what the Embassadors had to say, cautioned them presently in his own fight to be put to death as Traitors, and with all speed certified Solyman thereof, who without delay sent Ferhates Bassa with a strong Army into Syria. Which thing Gazelles hearing, and having in his power most of the Cities of Syria, retired himself, with all his Army into the strong City of Damasco; whither at length, Ferhates the great Bassa by long march came also. Gazelles resolved to try the fortune of the field, and so either by speedy Victory or honourable Death to end the matter, rather than to suffer himself to be shut up within the Walls of the City, upon the coming of the Bassa, valiantly issued forth with all his power, and gave him Battle; which for the space of six hours was most cruelly fought, and many slain on both sides. At length Gazelles being oppressed with the multitude of his Enemies (being eight times more in number) and hardly assisted on either side, was enforced to fight in a Ring, and there performing all the parts of a worthy General and valiant Souldier, honourably died together with his Mamelukes in the midst of his Enemies, leaving unto them a bloody Victory. Gazelles thus slain, the City of Damasco with all the Country of Syria without any more ado yielded again unto the Turks obedience, which the Bassa took in so good part, that he would not suffer his Souldiers to enter into the City, then richly stored with Commodities of all sorts, brought thither by Merchants out of divers parts of the World.

slain.

Syria thus pacified, the Bassa went to Caire in Egypt, and there commending Cayrebeis for his fidelity, confirmed him in his Government; and inveigling against the cruelty of Solyman (so to please the Egyptians) withheld them to hope for all happiness under the peaceable Government of the new Sultan Solyman. And so when he had set all things in order in both the Provinces of Syria and Egypt, returned again to Solyman.

The year following, Solyman by the Council of Pyrrhus Bassa his old Tutor (a mortal Enemy unto the Christians) and by the perswasion of the Janizaries resolved to besiege the strong City of Belgrade, otherwise called Taurunum, situate upon the borders of Hungary, where the River Sava falleth into Danubius. Which City his great Grandfather Mahomet (surnamed the Great; and before him the warlike Amurat) had with all their power, long time before to their great loss and dishonor, vainly attempted. Wherein until that time were relieved the Ensigns, then taken from the Turks, to their no small grief, with other trophies of the glorious Victories of the worthy Captain Honiades, and the great King Matthias Corvinus his Son. Wherefore Solyman lending his Army before, was come as far as Sophia, a City in Servia (the place where the Turks great Lieutenant in Europe is always resident) before that the Hungarians were aware of his coming; for they living at ease all the time that Uladslaus Reigned, and now sleeping in security under the young King Lodovick his Son, a Man of no experience; who contenting himself with the Title of a King, suffered himself to be pillaged and polled by his Nobility and great Clergy-Men (inverting all the wealth of the Land to their own private gain) that he was not able to raise any sufficient power to go against his puissant Enemy; especially his Nobility, in whose hands rested the wealth of his Kingdom, promising him much, but performing indeed nothing. Honiades with his hardy Souldiers, the courage and terror of the Turks, were dead long before he was also Matthias that fortunate Warrior; after whom succeeded others given to all pleasure and ease; to whose example the People fashioning themselves, forgot their wonted Valour, and gave themselves over to sensuality and voluptuous Pleasure; so that Solyman without let, presented his Army before the City of Belgrade, and with battery and undermining in short time became Lord thereof, having lost few of his People in that Siege. How much the loss of that strong City concerned the Christian Common-wealth, the manifold and lamentable miseries which afterwards ensued by the opening of that Gap, not unto the Kingdom of Hungary only, but to all that side of Christendom, did, and yet doth, most manifestly declare. It was won by the Turks the nine and twentieth day of August in the year 1521.

After the taking of the strong City of Belgrade, Solyman returning to Constantinople, brake up his Army and there lay still almost all the year following. During which time, he caused great preparation to be made at Calipolis and other his Ports, for rigging up of a great Fleet; which caused the Italians, Venetians, and them of the Rhodes, to look about them, as Men careful of their Estates, fearing that those Forces would ere long be employed against some or all of them.

About the same time Philippus Villerius a Man of great wisdom and courage, then following the French Court, was in his absence by the Knights of the Rhodes chosen great Matter of that honourable Company; who embarking himself at Marceller, after a long and dangerous journey (being not without the knowledge of Solyman) hardly sailed for at Sea by Corrug-Ogli a famous Pirate of the Turks, whose two Brethren the Knights of the Rhodes had but a little before surprised at Sea and slain, and then held the third in Prison arrived in safety at the Rhodes, where he was with great joy and triumph received.

be directed, consulting with the other Bassas, of divers great experience, which was first to be taken in hand, for the honour of their Emperor and enlarging of his Empire, were of divers opinions concerning the besieging of the Rhodes. Pyrrhus the Bassa of greatest account, dissuaded the taking in hand of that Action, as too full of difficulty and danger; producing for proof thereof the example of the great Emperor Mahomet, Solyman great Grandfather; by whom it was unfortunately attempted, and in fine shamefully abandoned. But Mustapha next in place and reputation to Pyrrhus, extolling the power and fortune of Solyman, said, That the greatness of their Emperor was not to be concluded within the attempts of his predecessors as well appeared by the late taking of Belgrade; from whence first Amurat, and after him, Mahomet, two of the most warlike Princes of the Turks, had with great dishonour been repulsed; and should no doubt with like good fortune prevail against the Rhodes also, being able (if need were) to bring more Men before it than were stones in the Walls thereof. Which he so confidently affirmed, with extenuating the power of the Rhodians, that he seemed to make no doubt of the good success of that War: presumptuously affirming, that upon the first landing of Solyman great Army, they of the Rhodes would without delay yield themselves and their City into his hands.

Amongst others of great experience, whose opinion Solyman was desirous to have, before he would take so great a matter in hand, was the famous Pirate Corrug-Ogli, a Man of a mischievous and cruel Nature, but of great experience in Sea matters. Who presented to Solyman by Mustapha and Ferhates, two of the greatest Bassas, going before him, after due reverence done, and commanded to deliver his opinion, spake unto Solyman, as follows:

Corrug-Ogli the Pirate persuades
Solyman
to besiege
the Rhodes.

The greatness of your desert (most mighty and puissant Emperor) maketh me (being by you so commanded) at this time frankly to speak what I think may be for the glory and honour both of your Majesty and Empire. I daily hear the piteous lamentation of the miserable People of Mitylene, Euboea, Peloponessus, Achaia, Caria, Lycia, and all along the Sea Coast of Syria and Egypt, bewailing the loss of their Countries, the ransacking of their Cities, the taking away of their Cattel and People, with other infinite and incredible Calamities, which they daily suffer of the crossed Rhodian Pirates, no Man withstanding them: Many a time have these wretched People bidden up their Hands to me for help, most instantly requesting me to be a mean for them to your Imperial Majesty, whereby they might be protected from the injury, rapine, and slaughter of these cruel Robbers. Wherefore in their behalf I beseech your sacred Majesty, by the most reverend Name of the holy Prophet Mahomet, and by your own most heroic Disposition, to deliver your afflicted Subjects from these their most cruel Enemies, and at length to set them free from the fury, captivity, and fear, of these Pirates, more grievous unto them than death is self; and consider with you self, that this injury and cruelty tendeth not so much to the hurt of your poor Subjects, and oppressed People in private, as to the dishonour and disgrace of your Imperial Name and Dignity; which if any other Christian King or Prince should offer, your Majesty I know would not suffer unrevenged. And will you then suffer these Robbers, Cut-throats, base People gathered out of all the Corners of Christendom, to waste your Countries, spoil your Cities, murder your People, and trouble all your Seas? For who can pass by Sea to Tripoli, Damasco, Alexandria, Caire, Chalcedon, Lesbos, Chios, nay unto this your Imperial City of

Constantinople, without most certain and manifest danger of these Robbers? What have we heard every Spring this many years, but that the Rhodian had taken some one or other of your Ports, led away your People into most miserable Captivity, and carried away with them the rich spoil of your Countries? And that which is of all other things most dishonourable, this they do under your nose, and in your sight, in the midst and heart of your Empire. Pardon me I beseech your Majesty Emperor, if I too plainly speak what I think: For whatsoever I say, I say it to no other end, but that you should now at length do that which should many years ago have been done. We your most Loyal Subjects may not, nor ought not for the increase of our Mahometan Religion, and for the enlarging of your Empire and Honour, to refuse to adventure our Goods, our Bodies, our Lives, to all hazard and danger without exception. If you likewise be carried with love of Glory and Renown, or ravished with the desire of never dying Fame; in what Wars can you more easily gain the Fame, or better improve your Servants, than in vanquishing and subduing the Rhodes, the reputed Bulwark of Christendom, which only keeps us from their Countries? But some will perhaps say, your Ancestors have in former times unfortunately attempted that City; so did they also Belgrade in Hungary; yet hath your happy Fortune to your immortal Fame, brought the same under your Subjection, being far more strongly fortified than it was in times past; and do you then despair of the Rhodes? Cast off such vain and needless misfancies. The Turkish Empire hath always grown by adventures and honourable attempts: Therefore make haste to besiege it both by Sea and Land, if your Subjects mourning under the heavy burden of the Christian Captivity, built it with their own Hands for the Christians; cannot they now at liberty, desirous of revenge, and fitted with opportunity, with like hands destroy the same? If it please you to vouchsafe but to look into the matter (most dread Sovereign) you shall see that there is a divine occasion by the procurement of our great Prophet Mahomet, presented unto your most Sacred Majesty, now that the Christians of the West are at discord and mortal War amongst themselves. Your Majesty is not ignorant, that in managing of Wars, the opportunity of the time is especially to be followed, and that when occasion serveth, all remedies and delay is to be carefully avoided; the changes of times are most fickle, and if you suffer your good hap now to pass over, you shall perhaps in vain afterwards pursue the same when it is fled and gone.

Solyman by Nature an ambitious young Prince, prick forward thus also by the perswasions of Corrug-Ogli and others, seeking their further credit and preferment by fanning his ambitious humor; but most of all by the intigation of the Bassa Mustapha, resolved to go in person himself against the Rhodes. And first to make some proof of what spirit and courage Villerius the new chosen Great Matter was of, in whose sufficiency the greatest part of the defence of the City was supposed to consist; to him by way of a little cold Friendship, he sent a Messenger with this short Letter thus directed:

Solymán by the grace of God, King of Kings, Lord of Lords, greatest Emperor of Constantinople and Trapezand, most Mighty King of Persia, Arabia, Syria, and Egypt; Lord of Asia and Europe; Prince of Mecca and Aleppo; Ruler of Jerusalem; and Master of the Universal Sea; To the reverend Father, Philipppus Villerius Lilladammus, Great Master of the Rhodes, and Legate of Asia Greeting.

Solymán
I am glad of thy Kingdom and new promotion, which I wish thou mayest long and happily enjoy, for that I hope thou wilt in Honour and Fidelity exceed all things which before thee Ruled in the Rhodes, from whom as my daughter have withdrawn their hand, so I after their example join with thee in amity and friendship. For thou therefore, my Friend, and in my behalf rejoice of my Victory and Triumph also; for this last Summer passing over Danubius with Ensigns displayed, I there expelled the Hungarian King, who I thought would have given me Battle; I took from him by strong hand Belgrade, the strongest City of his Kingdom, with other strong holds thereabouts; and having with Fire and Sword destroyed much People, and carried away many more into Captivity at a triumphant Conqueror, breaking up mine Army, am returned to my Imperial City of Constantinople, from whence Farewell.

The Great Master having read these Letters, and well considered of the same, perceived forthwith Solymán's meaning; and that Peace was offered him in words and show, but War in deed and meaning. Which because he was ready by force to repulse, he rewarded the Turks Messenger, and sent back with him another of his own, a private Person. For the Rhodians did seldom vouchsafe to send any honourable Embassadors to the Turkish Emperors (with whom they for most part lived in Hostility) either the Turks to them. By this Messenger he answered Solymán's Letters with other of like vain, as followeth:

Philipppus Villerius Lilladammus, Great Master of the Rhodes, to the Turk.

The effect of Villerius's Letter to Solymán.
I right well understand your Letters, which your Messenger brought unto me. The friendship you write of is as pleasing to me as displeasing to Cortugus Ogli, your Servant, who went about to have intercepted me upon the Iudann, as I came out of France; but failing of his purpose, stealing by night into the Rhodian Sea, he attempted to have robbed certain Merchant Ships bound from Joppa to Venice; but sending my Fleet out of my Haven, I flaid his fury, constrained the Pyrat to flee, and for half to leave behind him the Prize he had before taken from the Merchants of Crete. Farewell, from the Rhodes.

By this answer Solymán perceived, that he was well met withal in his own fancies, and that he should not so easily carry the Rhodes, as he had before done Belgrade. Yet being fully in himself resolved to try his Fortune therein, he called upon him certain of the chief Commanders of his Wars, to whom he opened his whole determination in this fort:

Although I doubt not, worthy Chieftains, but that you are of the same mind now that you have been always of in the invading of other Nations; yet I have thought it good in matters tending to the common Glory, and good of us all, to use your counsel and advice and counsel. Since the time that my Father left this City, we have made War with divers Nations and People. The Syrians by nature uncontent, and prone to Rebellion, we have by force reduced to their former Obedience. The Sophi, that mighty King, Nephew unto the great King Ulan-Cassians, by his Daughter the Sister of King Jacup, in heart and deed our mortal Enemy, not contented with the Kingdoms of Assyria, Media, Armenia, the greater, Persia and Mesopotamia, we have with our Forces shut up within the compass of his own Dominion. The last year running through Hungary, both on this side and beyond Danubius we took Belgrade the strongest Fortress in that Kingdom. And whatsoever else we attempted, we subdued. Yet for all that (to speak plainly of my self) my mind greater in conceit than my Empire, and the blood of Othoman, findeth no contentment in these Victories. For whatsoever you have yet done, although it be great, yet I deem it all but little, in regard of your words; my desire carrieth me further. This have I always above all things most earnestly desired, to set upon the Rhodes, and utterly to root out all the strength and forces, yea the very name of these Rhodian Soldiers. And have not you also no less than my self desired the Rhodes? How often have I heard you crying out, The Rhodes, The Rhodes? I have expected the time that being discharged of other Wars, I might here employ my whole strength and power. That we so long desired, is now come; there was never greater opportunity of good success offered, a great part of the Walls of the City of the Rhodes now lying even with the ground; we cannot want of time to be repaired, especially in their want of Syn. Beside this, the Garrison in the Castle is but small, and their aid from France far off; which will either come too late when the City is lost, or that which I rather believe, never. For neither will the French King (being at mortal Wars with the German Emperor, and Lords of Italy) suffer his Store-houses to be diminished, or his Ports barred of the necessary defence of his Shipping. Neither do you believe that the Spaniards (disaffected at home with Famine, War, and civil Dissention) will easily come hither out of Sicilia and Campania with supplies of Men and Victual. But you may perhaps think that great danger is to be feared from the Venetian Fleet, and the Isle of Crete, which I assure you is not so; for I know (although I will not now manifest [the cause] how I have prevented that mischief). Wherefore our courageous Soldiers (born of the substance of all Christendom, much more of the Rhodes) with cheerful hearts follow me your Sovereign against these your most perfidious and cruel Enemies. How long I pray you will you suffer that stain and disgrace to stick upon the Othoman Family, and generally upon all the Name of the Turks, which these Rhodians cast upon us the last time they were besieged? Which was so much done by their Valour, as by the unfortunate counsel of my great grandfather by Mahomet, calling home Melchies Palaeologus his General in that War, for one unlucky Alliance. But admit that their Valour gained them Victory, will you therefore always suffer these pyrrhical excursions upon our Main and Islands? The ravaging of Cities and Countries? The carrying away of your Cattel and richest Substance? The captivity and slaughter of your Wives and Children? The slavery of your nearest Friends and Kinsmen? So help me great Mahomet, is shall not so for his I Vow in despite of Christ and John, in short time to set up mine Ensigns with the Moon in the middle of the Market place of Rhodes. Neither do I seek any thing more to my self, more than the honour of the enterprise; the profit I give unto my fellow Soldiers, their Coyn, Plate, Jewels, (which is reported to be great) their Riches and Wealth is all yours, to carry home with you unto your Wives and Children. Wherefore let us now with all our forces and courage set forward to the besieging of the Rhodes.

Solymán's purpose thus made known, and the fame with one accord of all his Captains well liked; Pyrrhus the eldest Bassa and of greatest authority, who at the first diffused the War, standing up in the middle of the rest, said:

I cannot but much admire the great Wisdom and rare Vertues of our young Emperor, who so wisely and advantageously hath declared all deep Counsels of a worthy Chieftain in taking of War in hand. Blessed be Mahomet, thrice and four times Blessed is this Empire, Blessed is our Estate, and Blessed are we with such a Prince, which carrieth with him in his Wars, not only Men and Habilliments of War, but most deep wisdom and policy. Which wholesome manner of proceeding, if we had always before our eyes, and would follow, we should in short time bring under our Subjection not the Rhodes only, but all the Kingdoms of the Christians. Yet hold that which our Emperor hath most carefully and expertly devised, mine age and experience would exhort you, by Gifts, Promises, Rewards, and all other means whatsoever, to corrupt, if it were possible, the very chief and principal Citizens of the Rhodes; thereby to enter into their most secret devices and counsels; which but is many wrought, I will in few words give you to understand. I as a Man indifferent, desirous of peace and quietness, will by Messengers and Letters induce the Great Master to send him some honourable Embassage to our dread Sovereign, which if I can once bring him unto, then let me alone with the rest.

This counsel of the old Fox pleased all the hearers well, but above others the Emperor himself, who gave him in charge with all diligence and speed, to prove what he could do; the other Captains he commanded to prepare the greatest Forces they could, both for Land and Sea service. Which preparation was so great both at Constantinople and others places, that it could not long be kept so secret, but that news thereof was brought to the Rhodes the fourth day of February; which news daily increasing and still confirmed by more certain reports, moved the Great Master for more certain intelligence, sent a Christian of Epidaurus, who could perfectly speak the Turkish Language, as a Spy to Constantinople; who by secret Letters from thence gave him knowledge that the Turks were preparing a great Fleet, and raising a mighty Army, advertising him also of a wonderful proportion of Artillery prepared for Battery; but against whom was not commonly known, some deeming it to be for the Invasion of Italy, some for the Rhodes, others supposing it to be for Cyprus or Corica; which diversity of conjectures, made many (whose conceits averted from themselves the fortune of that War) to be more careless and secure. But whilst every Man was of Opinion, that it was made against any Man rather than himself, certain advertisement was given to the Rhodians from divers places by Letters from their friends and confederates, that the Turks did with extraordinary diligence keep strict Watch and Ward in all their Ports thereabouts along the Sea Coast; otherwise than they were before accustomed; which seemed to prognosticate some farther matter than the defence of their Frontiers. Villerius careful of his charge, as the Mark, where at the Enemy aimed, provided with all possible diligence great store of Victual, Armor, Weapons, Shot, Powder, and whatsoever else necessary for the defence of the City.

The new Walls of the City, and Avergne Forts, by Basilus Engineer, as the Emperor Charles the Fifth (a work begun in the time of Fabritius Carattus the late Grand Master, but not yet finished) was now with all diligent labour set upon, every Man putting his helping hand unto so necessary a Work. Whilst these things were with so great endeavour and labour a doing, a Messenger came from Constantinople, (sent from the old Bassa Pyrrhus) a sharp Witted and cunning Fellow, who with much filled speech in most ample manner doth his Message, by the way, painted forth the great towardsness and courteous nature of the Turkish Emperor Solymán, with the great commendation of Pyrrhus Bassa his Master; delivering from both of them Letters unto the Great Master to this purpose.

Solymán by the Grace of God King of Kings, Lord of Lords, &c. To the reverend Father Philipppus Villerius Lilladammus, Great Master of the Rhodes, and Legate of Asia, Greeting.

I am certainly informed that my Letters are delivered unto thee; which for that thou understandest them aright, I cannot express how much it pleased me. Truly, that I am not contented with the Victory I got at Belgrade; I hope for another, may I assure my self thereof, which I will not hide from thee whom I am always mindful of. Farewell from Constantinople.

Pyrrhus, great Counsellor to the mighty Emperor Solymán, to Philipppus Villerius Lilladammus, Great Master of the Rhodes, and Legate of Asia, Greeting.

YOUR Letters, greater in meaning than Character, I have delivered unto our most mighty Emperor; but the Bearer thereof I would not suffer to come to his Presence, lest he should be too much offended with so base a Messenger. Unto whom from henceforth send Men of worth, commendable for their years and discretion, with whom his Majesty may (if he so please) confer and conclude of matters concerning the common Good; which thing if you shall do, is shall neither repent you of the doing thereof, nor me of my Counsel. The Messenger I send, bringeth Letters unto you also from our great Emperor's, to whose divine Excellency how you are to answer, you are already admonished. Farewell from Constantinople.

These Letters being openly read, drew the minds of the Rhodians diversly. Such as altogether wished for peace, measuring others after their own plain meaning and integrity, commended the Counsel of Pyrrhus, saying, That he being an old Man of great experience, was not so desirous of our quiet, as of the quiet of his Prince and Country; and therefore wished by wisdom to order that which the young Prince fought for by War, fearing the uncertainty of Mans fragility, the common chance of War, the violence of Fortune, which hath oftentimes in a moment with a handful of Men overthrown most mighty Kings with their strong Armies. The perfidious of these men took such effect, that one of the Knights of the Order called Raimund March, a Spaniard, a Noble Gentleman of great Courage, and very eloquent, skilful also in the Turkish Tongue, and then Muster-master, was appointed to have been the Embassador unto the Turkish Emperor. Many there were of a contrary opinion, which suspecting fraud and deceit, said it were good to beware of the Enemies Counsel; asking, to what end this Embassage were? For should we proclaim War (say they) against the most mighty Tyrant, not yet our professed Enemy, who writeth all Peace? Or should we intreat for peace, no War as yet proclaimed; that he which is yet so afraid himself, may now understand that he is of us feared? Besides that, with what security, with what face can our Embassadors go, unrequited of the Turkish Emperor, without his safe conduct through those Countries which we daily burn and spoil? But they thall then Pyrrhus the great Baffles Letters forthwith, his protection, his Credit and Authority shall defend them from all injury and wrong; as though the servant should prescribe Laws to his Master, and such a servant as is most like unto his Master (that is) cruel, false of Faith, a hater of all Christians, but especially of us Rhodians; whom the merciless Tyrant having in his power, with his Navy and Army in readiness, shall with cruel torture enforce to discover unto him our provision, the secrets of our City and Orders. This opinion of the wiser folk, was greatly confirmed by the too much curiosity of the Messenger which was sent, who with all diligence enquired of the State and Situation of the City, of the number and strength of the Order. Wherefore in conclusion he was sent back again accompanied but with one private Souldier to carry the Great Masters Letters unto the Turkish Tyrant; the tenor whereof was thus:

Philippus Villierius Liliadamas, Great Master of the Rhodes, unto the Turk, Greeting

That you are mindful of me grieveth me nothing, and I am also mindful of you. You repeat your Victory in Hungary, whereas not being contented you hope for another; nay you promise and assure your self thereof, before you have attempted the War. Beware you deceive not your self; men's expectations never deceive them more than in Wars. Farewell, from the Rhodes.

The other Letters written to Pyrrhus, were to this effect:

I have advicably considered thy Letters, with the behaviour and disposition of thy Messenger. He dares not tell thee how much I am contented not to follow the flame, whilst my men of War do spoil the Countries and Ports of thy Lord and Master, which I bear withal, by reason of the injuries they have sustained of the Turkish Pirates. But I will call them home, and will send Embassadors unto thy great Lord; so that thou shalt find me safe conduct unto thy Masters; great Seal, for their safe coming and return. Farewell, from the Rhodes.

But these Letters were never delivered unto the great Turk, or the Baffa; for as soon as the Turkish Messenger was come over into the Main, he presently took Horfe, which was there in readiness for him, and posted towards Constantinople with as much speed as he could, leaving the Christian Messenger his Companion behind him; who returning back again to the Rhodes, and telling what he had heard and seen, gave them all great occasion to despair of Peace; whereupon Villierius sent into Orie to hire certain Companies of Cretendian Archers. In the mean time advertisement was given unto the Great Master by Letters from the Island of Naxos, That the Turks were ready to put their Fleet to Sea with the first appearance of the new Moon; which thing they most superstitiously observe in the beginning of all their great actions. The same news was brought also by certain Merchants of the Island of Pashum, who come to the Rhodes with a great Ship laded with Corn from Euboea; under the color of the sale whereof, they (by the commandment of the Turks, to whom they were Tributaries) diligently noted all that was done in the City, shortly to be besieged. The great Master with no less diligence, sent divers of his small Gallies amongst the Islands and amongst the Main, to learn what might be of the Enemies doings. Joannes Lupus one of the Knights of the Order, and Captain of one of these Gallies, meeting with a great Ship of the Turks laded with Corn, took her and brought her home to Rhodes. But Alphonsus Captain of another of the Gallies, lying in harbour in one of the Islands, and suffering his men to truggle too far into the Land, was set upon by a Turkish Pyrat and taken.

About the same time the Turks by their Fires made upon the Main in the night season, gave sign unto the Rhodians, that they were desirous to have some party with them, as their manner was. Whereupon one Moneton a French man, one of the Knights, by commandment of the rest of the Order, was sent with a Gally well appointed to the Main to see what the matter might be; and with him was joynted Jacobus Xeyus a Paymaster for the Gallies, that he might of the inhabitants of the place, and his Friends there dwelling, diligently enquire of all things concerning the intended War; for Xeyus, besides that he was a skilful Sea-man and one that knew the Coast well, had also good experience in Civil Affairs, and was wonderfully beloved and made of by the Turkish Merchants whose Language he had perfectly learned. Drawing near the Shore, he found the Turkish Merchants making merry upon the Main, with their Carous, Games, and such like Merchandise about them as they used to exchange with the Rhodian Merchants for woollen Cloaths; unto these Merchants he gave due salutations, gaging his Faith for their safety, and they likewise to him. But being requested to come ashore to make merry unto one of his familiar and old acquaintance might be sent for, who as they said was not far off; he answered, that he could not go to do, except they would first deliver a Pledge for him a Shipboard. The perfidious Turks laughing as it were at his needless fear, willingly lent their Merchandise and a Pledge aboard the Gallies. Xeyus then going ashore, and embracing the Turkish Merchants which met him; upon a sign given, was forthwith seized on every side and taken Prisoner, and by Pyrrhus Horles conveyed with all speed to Constantinople; where he was with most exquisite torments that could be devised for any man to endure, enforced to confess whatsoever his cruel Enemies could desire. After Xeyus was by cruelty thus lost, then began their provident judgment to be highly commended, which were the occasion, that the Decree made for sending Em-bassadors unto the Turk, was again revoked. The hostage given for Xeyus, being brought to the Rhodes and examined, was found to be a simple Country fellow whom the Turks had of purpose well apparelled to deceive the Rhodians, who frankly and plainly according to his promise, answered to all things that were of him demanded; as that the Turks were making great preparation for Sea, upon the Coasts of Caria and Lycia, and had taken up many Souldiers in the Countries thereabouts to send into the Frontiers of his Dominions towards Syria, for defence of the same against the Persians. All which was true; for Solymán to put the Rhodians out of all suspicion of him, (whom he knew carefully to observe his doings) sent the Souldiers whom he had levied in the Countries nearest to the Rhodes, far away against the Persians, as if he had meant nothing against the Rhodes, and so upon the sudden to set upon them with his Army brought out of Europe, before they were aware. But this his device proved to small purpose; for the Great Master perceiving by many circumstances, but especially by that late calamity of Xeyus that the Rhodes was the place the Turkish Tyrant longed after; and fearing that delay might bring farther danger, caused a cessation from all other business to be proclaimed, until all things necessary for defence of the City were accomplished; Watch and Ward was kept in every Street, the great Artillery planted upon the Walls and Bulwarks, Companies appointed for the defence of every place, the publick Armory of all warlike provision was open, all the Streets were full of Men carrying Weapons, some to one place, some to another. At which time a general Muster was taken by the chief Men of the Order, where were found about five thousand men able to bear Arms, among whom were six hundred Knights of the Order, and five hundred Souldiers of the rest of the City for moor part. Marinerie able Bodies, who in the time of the Siege did great service, encouraged by their Sea Captains; the Island People which repaired into the City, served to little other purpose but to dig and carry Earth unto the Rampiers; and the Citizens (except it were some few of the better sort) were for the most part weak and of small Courage, not able to endure any labour or pains, and yet hardly to be kept in order and government, great speakers, but small doers in these things in deed. The Great Master having carefully provided and ordered all things needful for the defence of the City, and fearing nothing more than the faint Hearts of the Citizens, caused them all to be called together; for encouragement of whom, he spake unto them as followeth:

Villierius his Oratio-
Rhodians.

*Valiant Gentlemen and worthy Citizens, we hear that the Turk our mortal Enemy is coming against us, with a huge Army raised of divers Nations from whose natural cruelty and wonted perjury except we defend our selves by force, we and the self same danger is like to befall me, my Knights, and you all. For we have with common consent and hand grievously spoiled him both by Sea and Land, and you are by booties taken by strong hand out of his Dominions, enriched; and in this day we keep his People in perpetual servitude, and he ours; but he injuriously, and unjustly; For his Ancestors (weary of the dark Den and Caves of the Mountain Caucasus, their natural Dwelling) without Right, Title, or Cause, invaded only with Covetousness, Ambition, and the hatred of our most sacred Religion, have driven the Christians out of Syria; and afterwards oppressed the Greeks in Grecia; where we contented to have de-* stroyed the People, with one simple kind of death (as Barbarism is ever cruel and merciless) they have with most exquisite and horrible Torments butchered many thousands of that Nation. All whom, this wicked proud youth (whose mischief exceedeth his years) an evil Neighbour to all men, not contented with the Dominions of Arabia, Syria, Egypt, the greatest part of Asia, and of many other parts more, (seeketh Tyranny, Murder, Spoil, Perjury, and Hatred against Christ and Christians, far to excel, and foretells himself to the uttermost of his power, to take from us our Islands, and to subdue the Christian Countries; that so at length being Lord of all, and Commander of the World, he may at his pleasure overthrow the Christian Cities; kill the Christians, and utterly root out the Christian name, which is so much detested. For the repelling of which intollerable injury, we have especially chosen this Island of the Rhodes for our dwelling place, because the same seemed more commodious than any other for the amoying of this barbarous Nation. We have done what in us lay, helped by you's; we know by proof your great Valour and Fidelity, which we now have not in any distress. Wherefore I will not use many words to persuade you to continue in your Fidelity and Loyalty, neither lose circumstances to encourage you to play the men; since worthy minds are not with words either encouraged or dismayed. But concerning my self and my Knights of the Order, I will speak a few words. I wish them, with whom (as I hope) the Christian Princes and other my Knights of the West will in good time join their Forces, we may be ready at all times to defend your selves, your Children, your Wives, your Goods, the Adornments of your Ancestors and sacred Temples, dedicated to the service of our God. Which opinion, that it may remain firm and fast in your minds, if nothing else, my Faithfulness in your Wars, my Body not yet altogether spent but able enough to endure pains and travel; the Nobility of these worthy Knights of the Order, their Love towards you, and their Hatred towards your Enemies were sufficient to confirm; but beside this, the strength of this City, which this most Order hath with infinite charges (so notably fortified with Ditches, Walls, Towers and Bulwarks, against all the force and fury of Artillery, is such, as that no City may worthily be compared, much less preferred before the same. It is wonderfully stored with all kind of Weapons and Warlike Provision; we have laid up plenty of Wine, Fleish, and Corn, in vaults, so that neither wet Weather nor Worms can stain the same of Wood and woodwork, but small need to be taken from things necessary for men besieged we have plenty, and able men enough for the defence of the City. All which things promise unto us assured Victory, and such end of the War as we wish for. Besides this, Necessity, which giveth Courage even unto Cowards, will enforce us to fight. Tet standeth on our side true Religion, Faith, Conscience, Devotion, Constancy, the Love of our Country, the Love of our Liberty, the Love of our Parents, Wives, Children, and whatsoever else we hold dear; Whereat they bring with them the proud command of their Captains, Infidelity, Impiety, Unconscience, a wicked desire of your Bondage, of your Blood, and the Blood of your Parents, Wives, and Children. Out of doubt (beloved Citizens) our good God will not suffer so many good virtues to be overcome by their foul vices. Wherefore be you in mind quiet and secure, and trouble not your selves with forbidding fear of your Enemies; only continue in the Fidelity and Loyalty which you have always kept inviolate and unspotted toward this sacred and honorable Fellowship, in most dangerous Wars, and hardy chances of Fortune; and if need shall so require, with courageous hand show your Valour against your Enemies, and make it known unto the Spaniards, French, Italians, Hungarians, and English, that the Rhodians are of power to damn the Turkish Pride; and to avert their Fleets and Armies from Italy, which they have so many years threatened with Fire and Sword, and will no doubt, thither with all speed hasten and come, if (that which my mind abhorreth to speak) they should here prevail. Neither will his ambitious youth, in Courage, Fallshood, and cruelty exceeding Hannibal, imitate him in that, that having overthrown the Romans in the great Battel at Cannas, knew not to use his Victory; but he will presently with more than Caesar's civility, bring forth the Treasures his Father got in Egypt, and with great Fleets and huge Armies invade Apulia, Calabria, and Sicilia: from whence he will forthwith break into France, and afterwards into Spain, and other Christian Countries, raging through them with all kind of cruelty. But I am carried away further than I purposed, and than need is: For your Fidelity and Valour (most worthy Citizens) to endure the Siege, and repulse the Enemy, is such, as needeth not my persuasion; and of greater refection, than that it can be shaken with the dangers incident to men besieged: yet the greater and more fearful miseries of all, which is Hunger and Thirst. I assure you, you shall never feel: which punishing calamities for all that, some People (in Faintness, Courage, and Valor noting comparable to you) have nevertheles: most constantly endured. For they of Petrelum, besieged by the Carthaginians, for want of Victual, thrust their Parents and Children out of the City, the longer to hold out the Siege, and lived themselves with Harder and Leaner food or bruised, and Leaves of Trees, and many other kindly things, by the space of eleven months; and could not be overcome until they wanted strength longer to stand upon the Walls, and to hold their Weapons in their hands. They of Cassilum, besieged by Hannibal, held out until a poor Moule was sold for much Money. You must of necessity keep Watch and Ward in your Stations: if your Houses chance to be beaten down with the Enemies Artillery, you must have patience: for why, they will be repaired again, and it is not a matter of such importance, that we should therefore yield unto our Enemies, in whose Courtesy and Fidelity no assurance is to be reposed. For besides that he is by Nature cruel and unfaithful, he can by no means be gentle and faithful towards us, which have done him so much harm, who only (as he himself saith) have offences to his grief interrupted the course of the Victories of him the Conqueror both of Sea and Land: whom he hath so many times assailed by open force with all his Strength, Wit, and Craft, Deceit and Policy; yet always hitherto in vain. Alas! God still protecting us, whom above all things (most dear Citizens) I wish you to serve and call upon, for except he keep and defend the City, the Watchmen do but watch in vain.

This cheerful Speech wonderfully encouraged the Hearers, especially the Vulgar sort, easily carried away with pleasing Words. But whilst they in their jolly dream of nothing but of Triumph and Victory, the Wiser sort possessed with care, ceased not to do what in them lay, to procure. That the good commonly forewarned, might in fine come to effect. Among other Clement Bishop of the Greeks, a man both for his place and devout manner of living had in great reputation amongst them, laboured earnestly by daily exhortations, to persuade the Greeks his Countrymen in that great and common danger with heart and hand to join with the Latines in defence of the City; for although the Government was altogether in the Great Master and his Knights, yet were Latines, yet the People both of the Island and City were for most part Greeks, who liked not altogether so well of the Latine Government, but that they did many times repine thereat. Howbeit the matter was at that time so ordered by the good perswasion of the Bishop, and good Government of the Great Master, that they all agreed as one man, to spend their lives in defence of the City: and were so far from fear of the coming of the barbarous Enemy, that many of the Vulgar People, in whom appeareth commonly more Fear than Wit, wished rather for his coming than otherwise. But look what they had fondly wished, proved afterward to their coils over true. For within a few nights after the Main, gave sign of partly unto the Rhodians. Whereupon a Gally well appointed, with a long Boat, was presently sent forth to see what the matter was; which drawing near unto the shore, was hailed by a Turk, accompanied with a Troop of Horsemen, desiring the Captain of the Gally to send some on shore, with whom they might more conveniently parley; which thing the Captain refusing; What, said the Turk, art thou afraid of Xayus Fortune? to whom the Captain in threatening manner answered again, Xayus whom you have contrary to your Faith and Oath taken, traveleth me not; neither am I afraid of you, whom I trust not; but if you have any thing to say let me hear it, or else get you further off, otherwise I will speak to you by the mouth of the Canon. Then one of the Turks coming to the Water side; laid down Letters upon a Stone, saying, that in them was contained that they had in charge; which said, he presently set Spurs to his Horse, and departed with the rest of his Company. The Captain sending out his long Boat for these Letters, found them directed in this sort:

Solymán by the grace of God, King of Kings, Lord of Lords, most Mighty Emperor of Constantinople and Trebizand, &c. unto the reverend Father Philippos Villarius Lileadamas, Great Master of the Rhodes, to his Knights, and all his People in general.

The purport of which Letter was as followeth:

THE compassion I have of my distressed Subjects Solymán and the great injury you do me, hath moved me thence to write. Wherefore I command you without delay Letters to yield unto me the Island and City of the Rhodes; willingly and cheerfully granting you leave safely to depart with all your Riches, or to tarry if you please under my Obedience, your Liberty and Religion in no part infringed with any Tribute or imposition. If you be wise, prefer Friendship and Peace before bloody War; for unto them which are by Force subdued, are reserved all extremities which the miserable vanquished use to suffer of the angry Conqueror; for which neither your own Force, nor foreign Aid, nor huge Walls, which will utterly overthrow, shall be able to defend you, save you will. All which shall assuredly be performed, if you shall make choice rather of my Friendship, than of my Force; wherein you shall neither be deceived nor circumvented; I take to witness God the Creator of Heaven and Earth, the four Writers of the Evangelical History, the four Jews thousand Prophets descended from Heaven, and amongst them our highest Prophet Mahomet, the renowned Glorify of my Father and Grandfather, and this my sacred and imperial Head. From our Palace at Constantinople.

When these Letters were openly read in the Council Chamber at the Rhodes, some were of opinion, That it was good to answer the Turkish Tyrant roundly, thereby to give him to understand that they were not afraid of his Threats; otherwise thought it no Wisdom with hard words to provoke to great an Enemy to further displeasure. Thus whilst every man would have framed an answer according to his own disposition, in conclusion it was agreed upon, to give him no answer at all.

The same day these Letters came to the Rhodes, which was the fourteenth day of June, one of the Turks great Commanders at Sea with thirty Gallies, the Forerunners of the Turkish Fleet, arrived at the Island of Cbor, famous in ancient time for the Birth of Hippocrates the great Physician, and the wonderful Picture of Venus left there unruined by Apollo, which for the excellency thereof no man durst afterward take in hand to perfect; which fruitful and pleasant Island was then at the arrival of the Turks part of the Dominion of the Rhodes. The Admiral of this Fleet here landing his Turks, began to burn the Corn which was then almost ripe, with the Country Villages round about. With which injury, Prejames the Governor of the Island (a man of great Courage and Valor) moved, with a chosen Company of Footmen, and certain Troops of Horsemen, suddenly set upon the Turks, in divers places dispersed abroad far into the Country, with such a terrible cry of the Country People, and Instruments of War, that the Turks being therewith amazed, ran away as if they had been mad, and were many of them slain without resistance; and had not the Gallies lain near the Shore, to receive them that were able to flee thither, there had not one of them which landed escaped the hands of the Island People. The Turks having received this loss, left the Island, and put to Sea again.

The Rhodes for fear of the Turks, deliver their Suburbs and places of pleasure without the City.

The Rhodians for the most part now affirmed and out of doubt of the coming of the Turks, by the perswasion of Gabriel Pomerolus Vicemaster, and other men of great experience, plucked down the Suburbs of the City, and laid them even with the ground, their pleasant Orchards also and Gardens near to the City, they utterly destroyed; the Great Master for example sake beginning first with his own, being a place of great delicacy, lying under the Walls near to the French Bulwark; and taking into the City all such things as they thought needful for the induring of the Siege, they utterly destroyed all the rest, were it never so pleasant or commodious, within a mile of the Town, leaving all that space as even to the City, the Enemy at his coming should find nothing near the City whereof to make use. But whilst the pleasures and delights of the Suburbs are thus in defacing, another more heavy and woeful gift presented unto the Eyes of the Citizens, filled the City with greater mourning and penitiveness than did the coming of the Enemy. The miserable multitude of the poor Country People, some bringing Wood, some Corn, some Cattel, some Fowls, and other such necessities as they had out of the Country into the City (for so the Great Master had commanded) after whom followed great numbers of Women and Children weeping, with dishevelled hair, scratching their faces and tearing themselves after the manner of the Country, wringing their Hands, and casting up their Eyes to Heaven, beseeching God with heavy countenance and floods of Tears to defend the noble City of the Rhodes, and themselves from the fury of their Enemies. Provision being packed up into narrow rooms in the Houses of the Citizens, and their Cattel starving for want of Fodder, afterwards corrupted

the Air, whereof infused rotten Agues and the Flux, during the time of the Siege. But after the City was given up, such a Plague and Mortality followed, as destroyed great numbers of the Turks and poor Christians, which knowing not whether to go, chose rather there to die, than to forsake their native Country.

The General of the Turkish Fleet which landed in the Island of Cbor, and was of purpose sent by Solymán to provoke the Rhodians to Battel at Sea; before he with his whole power came to besiege the Island, came daily with twenty Gallies half thof narrow Seas over, betwixt Lycia and the Rhodes, leaving the rest of his Fleet riding at Anchor at the Promontory called Gnidium (not far from the City of Rhodes) ready to aid him as need should require; this manner of bravery he used many days together, hoping thereby to allure the Rhodians out of their Haven to give him Battel; knowing, that if he should therein obtain the Victory, it were at that time little less than the taking of the City, or if he could by cruel fight but weaken the Forces of the Rhodians, he should therein do his Master good service, and greatly further his Victory by diminishing the number of the Defendants. When he had many days without intermission in this proud manner come half Seas over, and sometimes passing further came and lay at the mouth of the Haven, as it were daring them to fight; the Rhodians not without the intolerable infolency of this proud Turk, by their continual impotency caused the Great Master to call a Council, to consider whether they should fight with this Fleet of the Turks or not. The Counsellors by the appointment of the Great Master assembled; the Chancellor, a man of great Authority and Spirit, famous for his noble Acts both at home and abroad, and chief of them which were of opinion this Fleet of the Turks was to be fought withal, said:

So great disgrace was not longer to be suffered, but the chance presently revenged; For (said he) the huge Fleet of cellar his Turks, I do not say at whose force and fight, but at whose very name many men do tremble and quake, finding every year for all that it unto us no great novelty, for as oft as we hear of the like) is as a head to be with the joined unto these pyrrhical Gallies, as Members; and Turk Gallies then will it be most expedient, which will be a most easy thing for us to do, having the better both for strength of shipping and number and valor of men; to give that great head such a blow and wound, by cutting off these limbs, that it shall never after linger and faint for want of strength; or else there is no other Fleet at all prepared against us to follow this, and then this discomfited we shall be at quiet. Which thing in my judgment (though others which fear their own shadows) will be true. For the great Turk is not so fast to come hither, the first time of the year being so far hence, in the latter end of June, to besiege this City, and such a City as is known to be most strong, wanting nothing that is needful, and thoroughly manned with valiant Soldiers, from whence his Ancestors have been with loss and shame repulsed; when as the remainder of the Summer will be spent before he can encompass himself and place his batteries; and Winter time at you know is unfit for every Siege, especially in this Island, wherein they can find no Haven or Harbor to rest in. Wherefore on God his name let us set upon our proud Enemies; and let us not for a few threatening words sent unto us from a fearful youth, upon a sinners and policy left we should follow the tail of his Fleet bound for some other place, fit still like Cowards within our Walls with our bands;

in our bosoms, as men which fear and dread durst not show their heads. Which our Cowardice and want of Courage we forbear call Fabius his policy; But I would to God we were like Fabius, but I fear we shall prove more like Antiochus, the Etolians, the Vitellians, all whose courage consisted in words, vainly hoping to gain the Victory by sitting still and wishing well. But, the help of God is not to be gotten with Women's Prayers and Supplications or these fair-bearded Policies; which Cowards call advised counsel, but Victory is gained by adventuring and exposing our selves to danger and peril.

With these and such like Speeches he moved the multitude, which commonly conceiveth most Courage upon the greatest uncertainties; that they defined that they might fight; saying, that they would walk away with that foul disgrace with the Blood and Slaughter of their Enemies; For why, they wanted not Weapons, Courage, or Hands (as they said) to do it withal.

For all this, the graver sort of the Council (without whose consent the Master might in such cases do nothing) thought it not good in so dangerous a time to adventure any great part of their Forces, which they should afterwards want for the defence of their City. The Turkish General deceived of his expectation, and perceiving that the Rhodians would not be drawn forth to Battle at Sea, withdrew his Fleet twelve miles off, unto a place called Ylancon, where casting anchor and landing his men, he burnt the Corn all thereabouts which was now almost ripe, but forsook of the People as a thing desperate; as for the People themselves, they were all fled, and had retired themselves either into the City of the Rhodes, or else into strong Castles in other places of the Island.

At the same time certain Troops of Horsemen sent forth to have skirmished with the Turks that were burning of the Corn, were by a Messenger sent from the Great Master, commanded to retire; for the provident General fought by all means to relieve his Soldiers for greater dangers which he justly feared in the expected Siege, during which time he shewed himself a most politic Captain and brave Soldier; he would many times by day eat his Meat with his Soldiers, as ones of them, and most part of the night keep Watch himself, walking up and down, resting himself when he was weary upon some Stone or piece of Timber, or other homely feat, as it chanced. In time of Assault he was always more forward and adventurous than the grave Counsellors wished, fearing neither Shot nor Enemy; yet did he always more commend different Counsel grounded upon Reason, than prosperous Actions commended but by their events. And that which a man would wonder at, amongst so many cares in mind of such divers and dangerous chances, he carried always such a Grace and Majesty in his cheerful countenance, as made him to be of the Beholders both revered and loved. All the time he could spare from the necessary Cares of his weighty charge, from Assaults, and the natural refreshing of his Body, he bestowed in Prayer and serving of God; he oftentimes spent the greatest part of the night in the Church alone praying, his Head with prayer, and Gargles by him; so that it was often said, That his devout Prayers and Carefulness would make the City invincible.

The fix and twentieth day of June early in the morning, news was brought into the City from the Watch Tower standing upon St. Stephens Hill about a mile from the City. That a huge Fleet was defcried at Sea, making thither-

wards all along the Western Coast of Lycia. This bad news much troubled the City, which it was not of most men unexpected; all places was filled with tumult and hurly burly, every man measured the greatness of the danger by the measure of his own fear, and such a pitiful cry was in every place as is usual in Cities presently to be besieged. Hereupon publick Prayers were made through all the City, and every man with great Devotion besought the God of Heaven, That as it was his pleasure that the Rhodians should at that time be the Champions of the Christian Religion, so he would give them Strength and Victory against their Enemies, and to turn the calamities of War upon the Enemies of his Name. Their Devotion ended, the Gates of the City were shut up, and People from all places ran unto the Walls, great Flocks of Women, Children, and aged men not able to stand without a Staff, going forth of their Houses to gaze upon the dreadful Fleet (wherein was above two hundred Sails as is reported) filled the Streets, the tops of the high Towers and Houses. The foremost of the Fleet was the Admiral of Calipolis, to whom Solyman had committed the charge of all his Navy, and to assault the City by Sea; and the Rear-Admiral was Cara Mahometes an arch Pyrat, who was afterwards slain with a great Shot out of the City. The Vice-Admiral in the middle of the Fleet with a great Squadron of Gallies, having a fair Westerly wind, struck full directly before the mouth of the Haven (which was on both sides defended with two strong Towers well furnished with great Artillery) and began to row toward the City, whereupon an Alarm was raised, the Trumpets sounded, and many hastened unto the Bulwark which defended the left side of the Haven, which the Enemy seemed to direct his course unto; and was indeed more subject to danger than the other. But the Turk seeing himself in danger to be sunk with shot from the Bulwark, was glad to get himself farther off unto the rest of the Fleet; the Rhodians from the Walls with loud cries scornfully deriding him for his foolish attempt. This great Fleet in exceeding bravery and triumph passing by the City in sight of the Rhodians (standing upon the Walls with Ensigns displayed) did not more terrify them, than they were themselves terrified to behold the strength of the City, and the cheerfulness of the Defendants. But passing on, they came to the Promontory which the Inhabitants call As, about three miles distant from the City, Eastward. Which small Harb' being not able to receive so great a Fleet, many of the Gallies were enforced to ride it out at Sea, where they were by Shot out of the City oftentimes endangered and enforced to get them further off. Whilst the Enemy was there landing his great Ordnance and other Instruments of War prepared for the Siege, chusing a place for his Camp, transporting his Land Soldiers from the Main into the Island, viewing the strength and situation of the City, and in what place he might with most ease assault the same; the Rhodians in the mean time were not idle, but sunk divers deep foundations in many places of the City near unto the Walls, to discover the Enemies Mines, and to sink their Bulwarks with great Rampiers, and in which work every man put too his helping hand without respect of Age or Calling. The Grand Master of about that time sent Lodovicus Andrugus one of his Knights of the Order, into Spain to Charles the Emperor; and Gioudius Duvenvillius another of the Order also, to Rome to the Cardinal and Italian Knights of the Order; and from thence into France unto the French King with Letters; craving craving the aid of these Christian Princes, for relief of the City, by Sea and Land besieged. But in vain, for they carried away with the endless grudge one against another, respecting only their own States, returned the Embassadors with good words, but no relief.

At this time Prigians Governor of Chios (of whom we have before spoken) a man comparable with any of the Captains of that age, an excellent Soldier both by Sea and Land, valiant and thereto fortunate, of an invincible Courage, brought up in the Wars from his Childhood; when he had by the space of two or three days hid himself in the Rocks at Sea, for fear of the Turks great Fleet, came by night in a small Pin of Watch; at whose coming the Rhodians wondered with joy, for the Soldiers rejoiced greater rejoiced in no man, than in him; and if any great exploit were to be done, him the Master trusted above any other; he always in Arms during the Siege, encouraged the Soldiers, searched the Watch, surveyed the Bulwarks, repaired the Breaches, and such labors as others accounted weary, he cheerfully endured, as if they had been but his pleasure and recreations. At the same time also, Gabriel Martinigues of Brinsia a most skillful Engineer, came to the Rhodes out of Creta; by whose industry and cunning, fifty five Mines which the Turks with infinite labor and charge made by reason of the firing of the Water, and hardness of the Rocks) during the Siege, were all by countermines disappointed and defeated.

The City of the Rhodes is situate on a plain ground, on every side to be besieged, only Northward it is defended with a goodly Haven, from whence it lyeth open all westward; besides it and the Hills round about it lieth a stony plain ground not very broad, but of a greater length; these Hills are full of Springs, and Orchards planted with Olives, Fig-Trees, Vines, and such other Fruits as such dry and sandy ground will bear. But what by Nature wanted, was by the Hand and industry of man supplied; for it was compassed about with a most strong double Wall, and deep Trenches, threatening the Enemy with thirteen stately Towers; and fire against all Assaults, with five mighty Bulwarks, with divers goodly fair Gates; and that which was the greatest defence of all, within the City was always kept a most exact and frate form of Warlike Discipline. The defence of the whole City was thus proportioned; from the French Tower (which with the greatest and height thereof seemed to mate the sky) flood the Frenchmen with the French Lutes in their Ensigns, under their Commander James Abbiner, a Noble Knight of the Order; from thence to St. Georges Gate lay the stout Germans, with the Eagle in their Ensigns; in the third station were placed the French Arquebuziers, with the Spaniards, for that the Ditches in that place were more deep nor broad as elsewhere; in the fifth place lay the English Garrison, over whom the Grand Master himself commanded; after them succeeded they of Narbonne; and last of all the Italians, in Valour not inferior to any of the rest, under the leading of Ferris Balinus and Gregorius Morgatun. In every one of these stations were so brave and valiant Knights of the Order, whose names (worthy of eternal memory) for brevity we pass over, all men of themselves sufficient to have taken upon them the whole charge.

The Enemy was not bolder without the City in placing his battery, but traitorous minds were as bafe within to have betrayed the same. A Turkish Woman, Slave to one of the rich Citizens, had conspired with certain of her Complices, at such time as the Turks should give Assault unto the Town, at one instant to set on fire the Houses wherein they dwelt in divers places of the City; that the Defendants drawn from the time might the more easily enter. But this Treason was in good time revealed, and the offenders worthily executed.

The Turks had not as yet placed their battery, when as they took a certain Hill, whereupon stood the Church dedicated to Cyprus and Damianus, directly over against the English Station; from thence (as it seemed, rather for exercising of their Soldiers than for any great harm they could do for so far off) they began with small battering Pieces to shoot into the City; and afterwards they began to dig Mines, and to cast up Trenches; for the performance of town; and that which for the filling up of the Town Ditches, they had brought with them fifty thousand Pioneers, men better acquainted with Country labour and keeping of Carrel, than with Wars, which being enforced unto their labour day and night, sometime with Stripes and sometime with death, did with incredible celerity bring that to pass, which was before thought impossible. They cut ways through the most hard stony Rocks, raising the Plains as high as Mountains, with Earth brought two miles off, and laying the Mountains even with the Plains, so yet they never wrought in safety, but were miserably run in funder with the great Ordnance out of the Town; and that which most of all troubled them, the Rhodians falling out upon those over-laboured People, having neither courage nor skill to defend themselves, but trusting only to their heels, few great numbers of them, and not of them only, but of others also appointed for their defence, whom the Rhodians (taking courage of their fear) fiercely pursued and slew down right. And when many others sitting out of the Camp in great companies, thought to have relieved their fellows, the great Ordnance being of no use placed to no advantage, so thrust from the Walls among the thickest of them, that the ground lay covered with the bodies and Weapons of the dead Turks, with which manner of Fight, after the Rhodians had twice or thrice troubled the City, the Turks for their safety wrought most upon their Mounds by night, keeping most strong watch for the defence of their Pioneers, which for more assurance they doubled in the day time, and bent their Artillery against the places which the Rhodians used to fallily out at; which did not so much keep them in, as the fear of weakening themselves by often sallies, knowing that one man was unto them a greater loss, than unto the Enemy an hundred. Amongst others which in the beginning of this great Siege forced the utmost of their devices to the destruction of the Turks, were certain Mariners, who having the Turkish Language perfectly, by leave of the Grand Master (disguising themselves in the habit of Turks) departed by night out of the Haven in a small Boat, loaded with Apples, Plums, Pears, Melons, Grapes, and other such Fruits as the time of the year afforded; and in the darkness came along the Coast, unto that part of the Island wherunto the passage was out of the Main. There as if they had been Turks come from the Main, they landed their commodities, which the Turkish Soldiers bought greedily. When they had thus sold their Fruits, and in selling thereof diligently noted the speech and talk of the Soldiers concerning the Siege, and were now ready ready to depart, certain Turks which greatly disliked the hard beginning of this Siege, seeing themselves if they did but stir, in danger to be set off with shot out of the Town, earnestly requested the Mariners to take them with them into the Main; and to do so, at the first the Mariners dissembling, refused, as a thing dangerous; and besides that, their Boat was too little to receive so many as would willingly have gone with them. Yet with much ado, they suffered themselves to be intreated to take in seven or eight, such a number as they could well master; who in hope of passing over into the Main, were (contrary to their expectation) brought Prisoners to the Rhodes, where they were by Preziosi brought up to the top of the highest Tower of St. John Church, from whence they might see all about the Country, and well describe all the manner of the Turks Camp, which they simply discovered unto the Captain, and whatsoever else they were demanded, and amongst other things confessed, that the Souldiers were greatly discontented with the Siege, having in the beginning thereof lost so many men, and that they were ready to rise in mutiny against their Captains, and would hardly by them be commanded out of their Trenches and Cabbins, saying, that all they did was but lost labour, and that they should find it another piece of work to win the Rhodes, than they did at Belgrade; wherefore if they were wise, they should in time depart before they had received further harm both from the Enemy, and for want of necessities, wherewith the Souldiers began already to be pinched. All which was then supposed to have been spoken by the Captives to please him in whose power they now were; yet it appeared afterwards to be all true. For the Bassa considering the troubled state of the Camp, and the general discontentment of the Souldiers, whom he was at that time gladder to please than to punish, wrote unto Solyman at Constantinople. That if he would the Siege should go forward, he should no longer delay come in person himself to the Camp, so that the Souldiers without regard of shame were ready to rise in mutiny and to abandon the Siege, being to be commanded by their Captains.

Solyman comes into the Camp.

In the mean time when Solyman prepareth himself to set forward, the Turkish Captains understood by certain Fugitives (whereof in all Wars some are to be found) that the Usc. Steppe of St. John Church served them of the Town for a Watch Tower; for which cause, and for despite of the Cross standing upon the top thereof, they laboured nothing more, than with continual shot to beat down that Tower, which whilst they were doing with great diligence, Solyman himself came into the Camp the eight and twentieth day of August in the Afternoon; where finding in his Army all the signs of cowardice and fear that could be spoken of or devised, and nothing done according to the command of such as he had appointed for that charge, but all things out of order, he took more grief to see that great disorder, than he did pleasure and good hope of two hundred thousand Souldiers which were in his Army. Yet for all that he was inwardly chafed with the heat of youth and indignation, against his own People as well as the Rhodians, but modest himself towards his own rage and the offence of his Souldiers, and calling them together, caused them to be dismissed, not leaving among them so much as a Sword; and compassing them in with fifteen thousand Harquebussiers whom he had brought with him well appointed, he step up into his Royal Seat, there set on high for that purpose; where sitting down, he paused a good while without any word speaking, as if he had conferred with himself whether he should only punish the Authors of the Mutiny, or else with the punishment of many to revenge to foul a Sedition, little differing from open Rebellion. But following of himself the milder resolution, he thought it sufficient to correct the multitude and common sort of Souldiers with sharp and bitter words; and after general silence made, brake out into this choleric Speech.

Slaves (quoth he) for I cannot find in my heart to call you Souldiers, What kind of men are you now become, are you Turks? Men and women overcome? Verily I see the Bodies, Countenances, Attires, and Habits of my Souldiers; but the Deeds, Speeches, Counsels, and Devices of cowardly and vile Traitors. Alas how hath my opinion deceived me? that Turkish Force and Courage is gone, the Valour and Strength both of Bodies and Minds, wherewith the Arabians, Persians, Syrians, Egyptians, Syrians, Hungarians, Bulgarians, Epirots, Macedonians, and Thracians were subdued, is left, forgetting your Country, your Oath, the Command of your Captains, your Obedience, and all other Warlike Discipline; you have against the Majesty of my Empire refused to fight, like Cowards beaten your selves to flight, for vain fear of death and danger, now bemoaning men of War, if any man should at home have named the Rhodes in your Feasts, among your pots, in your assemblies and great meetings, you could then with your Tongues brag to pull it down, you had much ado to hold your Hands here, when I would make proof of your force and courage, it is nothing. But you thought perhaps, that the Rhodians so few in the few days before their Gates, would grant way yield themselves and their City into your Power? Let all men cease so to say or think, and believe me that know the truth, This base and infamous Den (which you see) is full of most cruel Beasts, whose madness you shall never tame, without much labour and bloodshed: Yet shall you tame them? for why, nothing is so wild but at length it may be tamed; which except I bring to pass, I am fully resolved and have vowed unto my self, Either here to die, or spend my days: And if ever I do or say otherwise, let this my Head, my Fleet, mine Army, and Empire, be for ever accursed and unfortunate.

And so without further Speech, desiring rather to be accounted of his Souldiers gentler than before, he pardoned them all their former offences, and brought them all again to his obedience. This mutiny so appeased, all things were afterwards done with better success, and greater care both of the Souldiers and Commanders. First, they planted in divers places twelve great Bombards, wherewith they threw up Stones of huge weight into the Air, which falling down into the City, might break down the Houses, and whatsoever else they lighted upon; with the fall of one of these, the Great Master was like to have been slain. Howbeit this proved a device of more terror than danger, for with two hundred such Shot were but ten men slain; which thing amongst others, Apella a traitorous Fugitive declared unto the Enemy, with whom he had intelligence, as he himself confessed being taken upon suspicion and examined; for which his Treason he was justly executed.

The force of the Battery was more feared, the Turks wherein the Turks had planted forty great Pieces Battery of Battery, and amongst them twelve Basilisks (so aptly named of the Serpent Basilisk, who as Pliny writeth, killeth Man or Beast with his sight) with these Pieces the Turks battered the Walls

Walls continually; but lying somewhat far off, did no great harm.

At the same time also Solyman caused battery to be laid against the Tower of St. Nicholas, standing upon a narrow piece of ground pointing far into the Sea, defending the Haven upon the right hand, where sometime stood the great Callosa of the Sun, accounted the greatest amongst the seven Wonders of the World. Which Castle was both strongly and sumptuously built at the charge of the Dukes of Burgundy, as appeared by their Arms there engraven in many places in Marble. This Tower was valiantly defended by Guido a Frenchman, who had the charge thereof, with two hundred Souldiers, amongst whom were thirty Knights of the order.

The Turks Artillery planted against the Tower, was by the skillfulness of the Christian Cannoniers in short time dismounted with Shot from the Tower, and many of the Gunners slain; so that they were glad to surcease any more to batter the Tower by day, but lying still all the day they began to batter the same by night, where in they prevailed no more than they had before in the day time; For the Defendants were daily observing such places as were likely for the Enemy to place his Battery in, did so aptly place their Ordnance against the same, and to so good purpose that the Turks swore, their doings were by some means discovered unto the Enemies. So when they had in vain bestowed five hundred great Shot, and made a small breach which they durst not once attempt to enter, they shamefully abandoned that place also.

All this while Pyrrius was busie in working of Mines to undermine the City, two and thirty of which Mines the Defendants frustrated with Countermine, in which kind of work many were lost on both sides; yet for all the carefulness of the Christians, the English Bulwark, was undermined by the Enemy, and upon the fourth of September part thereof blown up, with such violence, that unto them in the City it seemed at the first to be a general Earthquake; and therewith divers English were there overwhelmed. The Turks attempting presently to enter, were by the Grand Master and his Followers with great slaughter repulsed.

But Musapha the Bassa coming on with fresh Supplies, and crying out of the cowardice of them which retired, renewed the Assault; where for a while was fought a most sharp and cruel Fight, the Leaders cheerfully encouraging the Souldiers, and they likewise doing what was possible for men to do. All mens ears were filled with the chundering of the Shot, noise of Trumpets and Drums, and crying of Men. And unto the Turks it seemed that over their heads it rained deadly Shot, Stones, and Fire; for the Townsmen and Women mingled with the Souldiers, cast down upon the Turks, Fire, Stones, Timber, and whatsoever else came to hand; so that they were unable longer to endure the courage and force of the Christians, turned their backs and ran away by heaps, not expecting any sign of Retreat, every man seeking to save one; among whom as they fled, the great Ordnance shot off from the Walls made wonderful slaughter. At the Assault of the Turks were slain (as some write) almost two thousand, and among them the Master of the Turks Ordnance, a man whom Solyman greatly loved; which Victory the Christians gained not without some loss; for besides some few others that were slain, fifty Knights of the Order (men worthy of Eternal Memory) there ended their days also.

The fifth day after (which was the ninth day of September) Solyman by the perfavours of Adapha the great Bassa, commanded a fresh Assault to be given to the English Bulwark, which was then the first. Seven English of the Turks were broken in by the ruins of the Bulwark, and had enforced the Defendants, oppressed with number to give ground, when the Grand Master coming in with the Ensign of the Order, guarded with a Company of most valiant Knights, drove them again by force, and made good the place. Musapha seeing his men retire, courageously restored the Battery by bringing in new supply, and other Captains with Threats, Scrookes, and terror of Death, enforced the Souldiers (who had before turned their Backs) now again to fight. So that there began a more cruel Fight than had before been from the beginning of the Siege; which was unto the Christians more dangerous, for that they were overwhelmed with the multitude of the Turkish Shot. But in that extremity no man regarded either danger or life, only this they remembered, That those were their barbarous Enemies, whom they must either victoriously overcome, or die therefore; with which fury the Assault was continued by the space of three hours, until at length Adapha with his Turks discouraged, with the loss of two thousand of their Fellows, and of three great Noblemen, whom Solyman especially favoured, and forebore by the Spaniards out of their Flankers, were enforced to retire. Few of the Christians in respect of so many Enemies were slain, yet had the Ensign of the Order been there lost, Justinus mus Cloys the Ensign Bearer having both his Eyes shot out, had not Americus Rajulius an Avenger, and one of the Knights of the Order, with incredible courage rescued the same.

After this second Assault, falling out so unluckily unto the Turks, Musapha the great Bassa began to grow in contentment, and Pyrrius to keep his credit by doing something, with continual battery of seventeen great Pieces, did batter the Mount near unto the Italian Bulwark. At which time also Cassius Governor of Eubynia, another of the Turks great Commanders, laboured by undermining to have overthrown the French Bulwark; so glad they were to attempt any thing to content their impatient great Lord and Master. But the endeavours of Cassius was by Countermine through the careful diligence of Gabriel Chierus, having charge of those works, frustrated; and Pyrrius in the other place after he had by hot Assault slain them which were appointed for the defence thereof, and gained the Mount, and brought a great fear upon the City, was again with great loss shamefully repulsed, and by the commandment of Solyman caused to retire. At this Assault the Governor of Eubynia, Solyman his Lieutenant General, a man of great honour (if any of the Turks Slaves are to be accounted) was slain, for whose death Solyman was exceeding pensive and heavy.

Musapha the Bassa finding himself in disgrace with Solyman for the two unfortunate Assaults by him given at the English Station, determined if it were possible by a third to recover his lost credit; and for his better success therein, agreed with Admetus another great Commander, at which Assault he was to assault the Spanish Bulwark the same time to assault the Rhodians having with a Mine suddenly blown up a great part of the Wall of the Spanish Station, in the thick of the Dust and Smoke, presently ended his men, who by the ruins of the Wall recovered the top of the Rampiers. Adapha the Bassa, so that same instant hardly charged the English, so that in both places was made a hard and doubtful Fight. Mulapha, desiring nothing rather than with better success to reclaim his former dishonour, did what he might to encourage the Soldiers, calling upon them by name, and spurring them in remembrance of their former Victories. The Rhodians on the other side mindful of their former honour, with the greatness of the present danger valiantly repulsed the Enemy, and forced him with shame to retire. In this Assault many Englishmen were slain, and Praxinos also fore hurt, having before slain many of the Turks. Mulapha beside the loss of his men, had also two of his Ensigns taken by Christopher Vanderick, Commandador of the German Knights. Achimeter having won the top of the Walls, had there set up the Turkish Ensigns; but by the valiantness of the Defendants, and by means of certain fine Pieces of Ordnance, by Martinus upon placed in the Houses before the new made Breach, by force of Shot out of the Flankers on both sides of the Breach, whereof none fell in vain, he was again enforced to forsake the Walls and to retire.

The three and twentieth day of September, the Turkish Captains hoping by means of a Mine which they had made against the Avenge Bulwark, to enter and win the City, approaching the Walls with great Multitudes of Soldiers, ready to have entered upon the blowing up of the Mine, which being met with a counter mine out of the City, wrought not such effect as by them expected; so that having received some harm, standing in a place of great disadvantage, and done nothing they returned again into the Camp. Yet all the expert Captains probably conjecturing that the Wall might be inwardly shaken by the Mine, though it were not by them outwardly perceived, called that part of the Wall to be most violently battered all the rest of day and night following; and by the fury of their Artillery, made a fair and large Breach. All that night was heard in the Turks Camp an unweary clattering of Weapons, and of men running too and fro, as if there had been some great matter a doing; which the Rhodians conjectured (as the truth was) to be a sign of some great Assault to be shortly made.

Solyman resolving the next day with all his Force to assault the new made Breach, after he had by himself in a melancholy mood walked up and down in his Tent a great part of the night, sent for the chief Commanders of his Army, to whom he declared his mind as followeth:

Your Valour and Wisdom (worthy Capitans) needs not my exhortation, yet the desperate madness of our Enemies maketh me to speak unto you these few words. Who whilst they yet do, as from the beginning, as men without reason desperately defend their City rent with our Artillery, (shaken with our Mines, their Churches and Houses beaten down about their Ears, wearied and worn out with Slaughter, Labour, and Wounds, which must needs befall men so oftentimes assaulted, they worthily seem unto our Soldiers men of invincible Force and Courage; which opinion to have removed, much concerneth the happy and wished success of our Assault. Wherefore I would have you with effectual persuasion and beautiful promises to hearten on our Men to the winning of this City. Beside this, you shall open unto them my purpose and intent, and that they should not think that they are brought hither to besiege one City; but that in taking this City, they shall win the most noble make a way unto all the Dominions of the Christians. Here be the King's Men, Allies, and Friends of all the Kings, Princes and Potentates of Christendom: here is all our Enemies Treasure; the Spoil wherewith promised unto our Soldiers may serve to great purpose to encourage them forward; here is the Store of Ordnance, Armour, and other Warlike Provision, which shall best furnish us, and in time to come miserably confound the rest of the Christians. We shall beside this, enjoy a most goodly and rich City, with a Haven of all others most commodious, from whence all things necessary for War may at all time at occasion be supplied; by Land, and Sea be supplied with such as they shall be in need of; of great importance shall we be to our Enemies, and of great advantage to ourself. This is their Castle, Storehouse, Treasury and Armoury; this is the very receptacle and place of refuge for all such as trouble the Turks by Sea; from hence shall we have free scope and passage unto Apulia, Calabria, Sicilia, and many other Christian Countries: But of for your selves valiant Capitans, when ye shall consider how that you have within these few months by your valour and Wisdom (inhabited unto my Empire the strong City of Belgrade, which my great Grandfather Mahomet that mighty Emperor could not with all his power get; I rest in great hope that these few and obdurate Christians shall not long be able to defend themselves in these their Dens and lurking places.

Having ended this Speech, the Captains every one unto his Company made known what the great Emperors Will and pleasure was; and open Proclamation made through all the Camp, where in the spoil of that rich City was all granted unto the Soldiers, as a Prey and Reward for the pains they were to take.

Solyman heavy with sleep and care, laid himself down upon his Pallat to take his rest. But the Great Master (to whom the unaccounted fair of the Emperors posterity, for great matter) all that night in Arms painfully viewed every part of the City, cheerfully encouraging his Soldiers to remember; That they did watch for the safety of their Country, their Lives and Liberty. It fortuned the same night, that a poor Christian serving a Turk in the Camp, calling secretly unto the Watchmen upon the Walls, gave them warning that the Turks prepared the next day to give a general Assault unto the City. Which thing when the Great Master understood, because he would have nothing done rashly or fearfully (as it commonly happeneth in things done upon the sudden) called together his Knights, and spake unto them, as followeth:

I am glad sacred Companions and Fellows in Arms, The Great Master that the time is come when in one Battle getting unto our selves great honour, and defending your Country, you may be justly accounted the worthy defenders and Revengers of the Christian Commonwealth and Name. The people against whom we are to fight to-morrow, assaileth us first presuming upon their multitude; But if we measure Valour, not by number, but by Courage and Prowess, undoubtedly a few resolute men will easily overcome a multitude of Cowards. You know your Enemy, and the manner of his fight; you are to fight (most worthy Knights) with them whom you have always vanquished at Sea, and in just Battle sometimes overcome by Land, at such time as with their whole power they assaulted your Walls, emitting in the mean time many hot skirmishes, wherein you ever put them to the worst; Wherefore you and they in the Assault to-morrow shall have swift Courage, as Conquerors and men conquered may have. Neither will they fight, because they are weak; neither will they fight, because they are strong; but because the great Tyrant and cruel command of their Captains enjoineth them thereto. Wherefore remembering what you are by birth; what opinion the Christian Commonwealth hath conceived of you, where you are, and what you have taken upon you; take up your your Arms with just fury and indignation, and fight against them, following one frantic wish, as if you saw your Slaves bearing Arms against you; whereunto you are enforced, not only by the indignity of the wrong by them offered, but also by necessity, which of itself is of power to make Cowards valiant and ready. For here we are in an Island from whence we cannot escape, and in a weak and defenceless place, which do not so much protect and battered Walls quail them, or die therefore to-morrow shall give unto us either joyful Victory, or a most honourable death.

As he was yet thus speaking, news of approach of the Enemy caused him to make an end; and every man hath with speed unto the place of his charge. The Enemy coming fast on; with a most horrible cry (as their manner is) fiercely assailed the City in five places, where the English, Spanish, Italians, Narbonenses, and Avergnones had their Stations. To the assault of every of which places, Solyman had appointed ten thousand Turks. Mulapha the Bassa called upon the name of his great Prophet Mahomet; and promising unto the Soldiers the rich Spoil of the City, fiercely assailed the English Station, from whence he had been three times before shamefully repulsed. Pyrrhus the other great Bassa, with like fury assailed the Italian Station. In both places was maintained a cruel and deadly fight; the Turks fighting for their Lives and Liberty. Neither was there any, of what degree or order soever, which did not that day fight for the defence of the City. The Priests and religious were not then exempted, but fought among other Soldiers; Women, Children, and with them the aged Fathers, beyond the strength of their Bodies and courage of their Minds, some burning Pitch-balls, some Hoops with which being cast down upon the Enemies, troubled them so, as nothing was more feared; for upon whomsoever it fell, it stuck fast, and so scalded their Bodies, that they were glad to cast down their Weapons to rent off their Clothes, whereunto many of them rent off the Skin and Flesh also. All which things fell to thick upon the Turks, as if it had rained Fire and Stones, besides the deadly Shot, which amongst such a multitude of Enemies never fell in vain.

The Great Master having a careful Eye over every part of the City, after he had well relieved the Italian Station, which was at the first hardly distressed by the Knights, left there Antonius Montellani, one of the Knights of the Order, with such Company as he thought convenient for the safety of that place, and went himself with the rest unto the English Station, which was then hardly to be by the Bassa Mulapha. But whilst he was there besieged in repulsing the Enemy, and had now well relieved the place, a sudden cry ran along the Walls, that the Spanish Bulwark was already possessed by the Enemy; with which heavy news he was not a little troubled, but leaving there Emmericus Gombauld, one of the Knights of the Order, with a chosen Company of Soldiers for the defence of that place; he with his Guard hastened unto the Spanish Station, which he found to be a wonderful chance already taken by the Enemy. In the beginning of the Assault, certain Turks to flun the danger of the Shot, had for fear hidden themselves at the foot of this Bulwark, among the Stones, which had before been beaten down with the battery; in the mean time, other Turks of the same Regiment, under the leading of the valiant Captain Achimeter, hotly charged the Spaniards on the right hand of the Bulwark, not medling with the Bulwark itself, as a thing of greatest strength; the valiant Soldiers appointed for the defence of the Bulwark, seeing their Fellows and Countrymen distressed fast by them on the right hand, could not endure to stand firm on the lookers on, but left the Bulwark, and went to the place so hardly assaulted; where whilst they were valiantly encountering the Enemy, the cowardly Turks who had before hid themselves for fear, hearing all fill over their Heads, and thereupon by guessing (as the truth was) that the Defendants were drawn thence to another place more distressed; to colour their fear, and prove their good fortune, like tall fellows, crept out of the holes wherein they had before for fear hidden themselves, and secretly crawling up the battered Walls of the Bulwark, got into it before they were discovered, where finding none but a Piece unto a place more convenient for the annoying of the Enemy, had laid down their Weapons; they suddenly set upon them, slew them, overthrew the Christian Ensigns, and so became Masters of that strong Fort. The Turks without thinking that, wonderfully commended the Valour of those men, and flaming themselves of Cowardice, made great haste through the midst of the Town-Ditch to get up into the Bulwark to help their fellows. But in going through the Ditch, they were so cut off with Shot on both sides out of the Flankers, that few of them could get up into the desired Bulwark. And the Great Master with a crew of valiant Soldiers, nothing fearing the armed Enemy, now in possession of the Bulwark over their Heads, with great resolution scaled the same.

In this assault, in the mean time Hugo Capomati, a Spaniard, and Ademius a Frenchman, both Knights of the Order, with a Company of Cretan Soldiers brake into the Bulwark by Gate which the Turks had not as yet boulded, and being once got in, they made of the Turks a quick dispatch; for whom they flew not with the Sword, they enforced to mischief themselves for half back again over the Walls. The Bulwark thus again recovered, which had been two hours in possession of the Enemy, and the City delivered of a wonderful fear, the Great Master (well worthy of that name) leaving a sufficient number of Soldiers for the keeping of that Fort, went with the rest of his Company unto the place where the Spaniards with the rest of the Defendants were charged by Achimeter, and now wearied and almost spent, had much ado to hold out; who encouraged with the sight of the Great Master, as if Victory had attended upon him, with great cries and signs of joy valiantly and with great slaughter repulsed their Enemies, as if they had been fresh men. Long it was to recount the deadly fight and hard adventures which befell at the Assault of the other two Stations of the Avergnones and Narbonenses; but the Turks were in every place put to the worst, and lay by heaps slain in the Ditches and Breaches of the Town. Solyman from his standing (for the Turks that purpose made of high Mass) beholding the miserable slaughter of his men, and no hope of gaining the City, caused a Retreat to be founded, a thing welcome both to the Rhodians and the Turks. In this terrible Assault, which endured by the space of six hours, divers of the Knights of the Order were slain, especially of the French and Spanish Nation, with one hundred and fifty common Soldiers, all worthy of eternal fame.

the Rhodians laboured night and day to raise a new Wall, in stead of that which was beaten down.

At the same time, Solyman perfwaded by the general opinion of all his great Captains, that the City was that day or never to be taken, determining to give another general Assault, caused Proclamation to be made through his Camp; wherein he gave the spoil of the City unto his Souldiers, and the more to encourage them, spake unto them in few words, as followeth:

Solyman encourages his Souldiers to a fresh Assault.

Fortune at length valiant Souldiers, having nobly proved your Courage and Patience, now offereth unto you the worthy Rewards of your Labour and Pains. The Victory and Wealth of your Enemies which you have so much desired, is now in your Hands. Now is the time to make an end of this mangled People, of whom more are slain than left alive; and they are not Men, but the Shadows and Ghosts of Men, feeble and spent with Hunger, Wounds, Want and Labour; who will I know resist you, not because they so dare, but because of necessity they so must, enforced therewith all extremities. Wherefore now revenge your selves of the Fallow, Cruelty, and Villanies of these Christians; and make them a useful example to all posterity, that never Man hereafter presume to offer injury to a Turk, in whatsoever State he be. The way is already open into the City, there is a fair Breach made already; Horsemen may at once enter, nothing wanting but Courage in you to assail the same.

The Souldiers encouraged with this Speech of their Emperor, made great shew of cheerfulness, and promised to do their utmost devoir, threatening unto the Christians most horrible Death and miserable Captivity.

In the mean time, the great Shot flying continually through the Breach did beat down many Houses in the City; but the Countermure new built against the Breach standing upon a lower ground, it seldom toucht, to the great good of the Rhodians. The rattling of the falling Houses, the horrible noise of the Enemy, with the thundering of the great Artillery, wonderfully terrified the miserable Citizens; in every place was heard the Lamentation of Women and Children, every thing fleweth the heaviness of the time, and seemed as altogether lost and forlorn. The day thus troublefomely spent, the night followed much more troublefome; and after the night, the day of Assault of all other most dreadful; for with the dawning thereof, the glittering Ensigns of the Enemy were seen flying in the Wind, and the Turks cheerful with the hope of Spoil and Victory, hastened towards the Breach with great Outcries and Songs, after their Country manner; and there before one of the Gates of the City called St. Ambrose Gate, set down a great number of their Ensigns deckt with Garlands, in token of Victory. The Turks great Fear also at the same time failing too and fro before the Haven, made them as if it would have assailed the City on that side; who had seen the City so before have been besieged both by Sea and Land; and to most Mens judgments, it seemed that the Rhodian State should that day have taken end and been destroyed. Yet for all these extremities, the Rhodians were nothing discouraged, but looking upon their Weapons as the only remainders of their hopes, not regarding any danger, upon the Alarm given came running out of their Houses by heaps unto the Walls, like desperate Men oppoling their Bodies in stead of their battered Walls against their enemies in defence of their Country. There needed neither Exhortation nor command of Captain, every Man was unto himself a persuader to fight valiantly in defence of the City; and one of them propounded unto another the cruel death, the miserable servitude, the mocks and taunts they should endure, if they should chance to come into the proud Enemies hand; all which was to be avoided either by honourable Victory or Death. The Turks conducted by Achimet, fiercely assailed the Breach, which was by the Rhodians (standing upon the ruins of their Walls) valiantly defended. In the mean time the difmailed Matrons and Maidens, some in their Houses, with heavy Hearts expected the woful Destruction of the City and themselves, overfome in the Churches with Floods of Tears and lamentable Cries, poured forth their Prayers to the Almighty, craving his help in that their hard distress, and to protect them against their barbarous Enemies. The deadly Fight at the Breach, was on both sides with great courage and force maintained. The Turks were in good hope forthwith to win the City, if they did but a little more strain themselves; and therefore to terrifie the Rhodians the more, oftentimes in their fighting gave out most terrible outcries; and the Rhodians accounted the Turks as good as vanquished, for they being so many in number, and in a place of such indifferency, had not yet prevailed; beside that, they were greatly encouraged with the greatness of the common danger, and the fight one of another's Valour, so that by their invincible Courage the Turks were enforced shamefully to retire. The Rhodians seeing their Enemies turn their Backs, gave a great shout in derision of them; the Turks disliking that they in number many (and now Victory, if they should with a little resolution maintain the Assault they had begun) should be so derided of a handful of Men, as good as already vanquished, with great indignation returned again to the Breach, and more furiously assailed the Rhodians than at the first. At which time the City had undoubtedly been taken, had not they which defended the ends of the Wall, yet standing on both sides of the Breach, out of their Barricades with their Shot overwhelmed the Turks thronging in at the Breach, and others with murdering Shot out of the Flankers of the new built Wall to cut them in sunder, that a greater laughter for the time was hardly in any place seen. Achimet beholding the wonderful laughter of his Souldiers, and that he fought with great disadvantage and loss, against desperate Men, who resolving to die, feared no danger, gave over the Assault, and again retired; leaving behind him in the Breach an Archie Ditch, the Carcasses of five thousand of his dead Turks besides many more which afterwards died upon the hurts they received.

This Assault was given unto the Town the last day of November, a day dedicated to St. Andrew; after which time the Captains of the Turkish Army, although they despaired not of the Victory, yet terrified with so great slaughter of their Men, resolved with any account no more to attempt the City with any notable Assault; but by sundry great Trenches to be made through the midst of the ruins of the Walls, to get into the City; and with Mattocks and Pickaxes to overthrow the new made Wall and another Barricado which the Defendants had made within the same; and in the mean time whilst this was doing, to keep the Rhodians full filled with continual Skirmishes and Alarms. This device put in in execution by the wonderful labour of such a multitude of People, feared the Enemy to greater purpose than all that he had before done; who daily overthrowing or destroying the new Fortifications which the Rhodians made in stead of them which were before overthrowen, and by little and little creeping on further, drove the Defendants to that extremity, that they were glad to pull down many of their Houses, therewith to make new Fortifications, and to make their City less, by casting up of new Trenches; so that in short time they were brought to that point, that they could not well tell which place to fortify first, the Enemy was now so far crept within them; for the ground which the Enemy had thus gained within the City, was almost 200 Paces in breadth, and 150 Paces in length.

Solyman, although he did now assure himself of the Victory, and was by nature cruel and desirous of revenge; yet perfwaded by Achimet and Cassius (two of his most valiant Captains) that for the enlarging of his Empire, nothing was better than the fame of clemency; commanded Pyrrius the old Baffa to prove if the Rhodians might by parley be drawn to yield their City upon reasonable conditions. Whereupon the Baffa sent one Hierocimus Monelia, a Genoway, unto the Walls, who craving of the Defendants safe Conduct, said he had something to say tending to the common good of the distressed City. All Mens minds were presently filled with expectation of some great matter, and he commanded to speak. Who answered, that he might not deliver his Message openly, but would either by Speech in secret, or by Letters deliver the same unto one Matthias de Via his Countryman, one of the Citizens of the Rhodes. When Francis

Francis, one of the Knights of the Order, a Frenchman of a choleric disposition, whose great courage was well seen in all that Siege (having as it is reported, with shot out of Saint Georges Tower himself slain five hundred Turks during the time of that Siege) being now present, and moved with indignation to here a motion made of private conference with the Enemy; bent his Piece upon the Messenger, and caused him forthwith to depart without doing his Message. Many who in time of the Assault feared not any danger, but were altogether become desperate and careless of themselves, after that they had understood that the Enemy had offered parley, and that they began to conceive some hope of life, resorted unto the Great Master, requesting him, that he would provide for the safety of his loving People, whose warlike Forces were with many Assaults fore weakened, the City beaten down about their Ears, and most of them which were left, either wounded or sick: They had (as they said) now sufficiently proved both their force and fortune; and therefore he should do well, to beware, lest while he was too long in consulting, the Enemy should conceive a further indignation in seeing his offers refused. With these and such Speeches they enforced the Great Master to send Embassadors to Solyman. The Men that were sent, were Antoniuss Grosulus a Frenchman, Ensign-bearer for the Order, a Man of great reputation for his wisdom and experience; and with him Robertus Braulius, a Man of great gravity, and skilful in the Greek Tongue; for whom was received as Pledges, a Kinsman of the great Captain Achimet, and a certain Epirot which fled out of the City unto the Turks, because one of the Grecian Captains had struck him with his open Hand, a Man of a sharp Wit, and one that could perfectly speak the Greek, Turkish, and Italian Tongues, as appeared to his great credit amongst the Enemies, being had of them in great regard, although he was not known whilst he dwelt in the City, that he was any such Man. After that carnalis Solyman Enterpreter, for he himself could speak no other Language more than his own, accounting it a great disgrace, and the cause of the Orthoman Empire to use any other Language. The Embassadors admitted unto Solyman presence, told him, That they were sent to know, for what cause he had sent to require parley? Who in a flaming heat, as if he had known nothing thereof, said there was no such matter; and commanding them presently to void his Camp, sent them away with Letters to the Great Master and the Citizens, to this effect.

If I had not compassion of human infirmity, which oftentimes tumbls beheading Mens ambitious and hungry Minds, into most dangerous and unnecessary delusions, truly I would not have directed unto the Great Master these Letters at this time; but as you have well deserved, pursuant you with death and most miserable servitude, which how easy a thing were it for me to do, you your selves know. But having now sufficiently tried my force, if you be wise make proof of my Clemency. You have already satisfied your own fury, your own mad humor, and now advise your selves, lay your Hand upon your Heart, and without delay yield your selves as I command; your Lives I give you your Wealths, and more than that, your choice to tarry there still, or to depart; Refuse not the Grace frankly offered, which was of use to have been most heartily desired. It shall not always be lawful for you (as at this present) to make choice of both. From our Camp.

Upon the return of the Embassadors, the poor of all sorts flock together to the Great Master his House, not far from the Breach; where after the multitude of the common People was dismissed, and the chief of the Burgers sent for, the imperious Letter of the Turkish Tyrant was openly read before the Knights of the Order, and the better sort of the Citizens. Whereunto the Great Master accounting it both honour enough, and sufficient term of life honourably to die, answered in this sort.

You heard (Sacred Fellows in Arms, and valiant Men Citizens of the Rhodes) these impetuous and fervent Letters, whereunto how we are to answer, requiring no great deliberation; we must as resolute Men either yield or die; all hope of the Victory is gone, except foreign aid come. Wherefore if you will follow my Counsel, let us with Weapons in our Hands, until the last Gasps and the spending of the last drop of our Blood, like valiant Men defend our Faith and Nobility received from our Ancestors, and the Honour which we have so long time gotten both at Home and Abroad; and let it never be said, that our Honour died but with our Selves.

This Speech of the Great Master seemed unto many, heavier than the imperious Commandment of the Turkish Tyrant; and a great while Men stood silent, heavily looking one upon another, many with sighing of their countenance and outward gesture, more than by words expressing what they thought in hearts. At length a certain Greek Priest, with great compassion of mind (as it seemed) and Tears trickling down his Cheeks, brake forth into these words:

After his opinion concerning what Solyman then said by his Letter.

A notable Speech
of a Great Priest
for swearing
the Great

And I would also hold my peace, if I were a private Man; and not first of all in so great and troubled assembly, broach mine own opinion. But forasmuch as the regard of our common preferment can bring a word out of my Mouth now; and all Men know that now is the time to speak and say what every Man thinketh best; which shall neither always nor long be granted unto us, I will not let it now overpass and slip away: Wherefore let us suppose, that no command of a most mighty Prince obliging us, were come unto us, but that I were reasoning as a private Man with his Neighbour, and in our cups without any, without any great affliction to either party; as Men indifferent not liking or hating (as Men sometimes do of Princes Affairs which concern them nothing) and then (as I hope) my Speech shall be unto you neither unpleasant nor unprofitable. We Greeks and Latins, with joined Arms, have now these fix Months without our deadly Enemies, not only abroad before our Walls, but all in the very bowels of our City, without any foreign help; as we have, of long time all vainly looked for, so are we now every one of us out of hope thereof. And yet our Enemy either moved with the secret goodness of God, or else ignorant of our strength and forces, spent with Wounds, Slaughter, Sticks, and perpetual Labour, doth voluntarily offer that unto us, which was of us to be most of all desired and earnestly sued for. Your publick and private Treasures, the bodies of your selves, your Wives and Children be kept so violated, be taken from us only the City, which be hath for most part already beaten down and taken. Worthy Great Master, and you most valiant Knights, I have known prowess and valour in many Battels at Sea, but especially in this Siege; whereof seeing there is no more use in this our desperate estate, I do appeal unto your wisdom and discretion. Since all is now the Conquerors, in that be largest unto us, and Gods, that it is to be accounted gains, and the yielding up of the City and Island no loss, which the victorious Enemy already commandeth: which although it be a heavy matter and grievous unto the Nobility, yet your Fortune perfwaded you thereto. Wherefore if you be to be moved with any compassion, I account it better to yield, than to be slain our selves, or to see your Wives and Children by Law of Arms to be led away before your Eyes into miserable Captivity and servitude. If any Christian Religion remains in your warlike Minds, I beseech you seek not the utter destruction of this innocent People, who (I may with modesty say) hath not evil deserved of you, whom Christ Jesus, whom the Enemy himself, would have preferred. That I say this which I speak unto you for Christian Charity, and for no other cause, let this be a sufficient Testimony. That so long as you were able to resist by your own power, or heard for Aid from foreign Princes, I never spake words, or once thought of yielding; but now seeing the fatal ruins of all things about us, our common Estate brought unto the uttermost extremity, our deadly Enemy in the heart of our City, no hope, and that the War cannot longer be protracted; I wish you to yield, and for my part had rather make choice of Peace than War, and to prove the Enemies Favour than his Fury.

Most of them there present, were of the same mind with the Priest. But as nothing can be so reasonably spoken as to content all Men, so this Speech was not of them all liked; some there were (though not many) which considering the harms they had done unto the Turks, and doubting with what safety they might yield themselves into the power of that faithless People, had rather to have fought it out to the last Man, and so to have left unto them bloody Victory. Amongst these one bold spoken Fellow stepped forth, and in presence of them all diffwaded the yielding up of the City; in this sort:

I have not been with any thing more unacquainted, than to deliver my opinion before Printers, or in such great and publick Assemblies, being always more desirous modestly to hear other Men Opinions, than to publish mine. I have therefore for this time, seeing extreme necessity will not longer suffer me to keep my wonted course of silence, I will frankly speak my Mind, and tell you what in my Opinion is to be answered unto the heavy Meddlesome and imperious Command of the most perfidious Tyrant. This cruel Enemy hath overrun our Walls, and is entered three hundred Foot and more within our City, and as a most troublesome Guest hath taken and overtook with us as it were under the same Roof. Such as left no longer an end to such an unbecomely Guest and troublesome Neighbour, persuade you because he is troublesome, to give him all; but (worthy and sacred Knights) I am of far different Opinion; neither do I think a Possession of two hundred and fourteen Years is so lightly to be delivered up, and the Ground forsaken; but rather that this troublesome Intruder is in like manner to be himself troubled, and with deadly Skirmishes continually vexed; whom after we had by force of Arms and Undermining, at length be broke into our City, not by any Falour in himself, but helped by time, which tameth all things; and since his first entrance it is now almost forty days, in which time for all his haile, he hath scarcely got forward a hundred and thirty Paces, hindered by the Blocks, we have laid in his way, and will not cease continually to lay, if we will Men and mindfull of our former Victory. Did we not have bravely Fought, have I (as with these Eyes these sacred Knights to yield up this famous City of the Rhodes, the ancient Bulwark of Christian Religion, unto our merciless Enemies, polluted with the infamous Superstition of Mahomet: who besides the insupportable thirst they have of our Blood, how faithless and mischievous they are by Nature, if we know not, we need not make example of our selves, but we may take example by the calamity of Constantinople, the late misery of Euboea, and that which later was, of Methone; as also by the Mamelukes at Caïre, miserably slain contrary to the League, contrary to the Faith and Promise by the Turkish Emperor himself before given. What, do you me remember how the Death of the most noble Captains at Belgrade was of late procured by the falshood, craft, and deceit of the same faithless Mischants? Let us then, being Men of Wit and Understanding, shew these mad Knights, let us give our selves into their power, which have no regard of right or reason, of Religion, or any thing else, whose Cruelties and Cruelty it is hard to say which is greater, which for these many years have plotted and laboured nothing more, than how by policy or force they may utterly root our the Name of the Rhodians, which they so deadly hate. They keep us shut up and besieged now the fourth Month, fasting together with us, in extreme dangers and endless labour, slain by haile before our Walls and Fortresses, and cannot be removed hence with Thunder, Lightning, Storms, Tempests, and all the Calamities of Winter, a time which giveth intermission to all War, both by Sea and Land: so do fellows they are of Revenge, and greedy of our Blood; and that not altogether without cause, for we have also shed theirs, and gladly would still so do, if it lay in our power. But seeing it seemeth good unto God otherwise, and that we are surprised with inevitable necessity, yet let us whilst we are at liberty, and have power our selves, by honourable, death amongst the Christian Ensigns, (as the Torments and Reproaches which our cruel Enemies hope to inflict upon us; so shall we enjoy eternal Fame and Glory, prepared both in Heaven and Earth for such as honourably die in defence of their Prince and Country; which Honour is accounted not them to envy unto thy most noble Name and Virtue, worthy Great Master, which having for many years enjoyed the commodity and profit of Peace, and greatly enriched by Bounty of this sacred Military Order, refuse now to bear this last burden of War.

At these words an ancient Greek, for his Wisdom and Discretion, of great Reputation both with the Greeks and Latins, perceiving his Countrymen wrongfully touched, and the desperate holding out of the City vainly perfwaded, took hold, and interrupting this young Gallant; in answer of that he had said, spake as followeth:

That grief of mind and desperation can make Men rather valiant than Wits, as you have many times heard before of this, you may see this day, perceiving all, most valiant Gentlemen; for advised modesty never falls into obloquy, neither confuseth falshood with truth; it disreputeth not the slaughter of the Citizens, it perfwadeth not fury, nor exhorteth Men to madness; but it is by nature so engrained in many, that when they cannot by their own Wisdom and Policy deliver themselves from their troubles, they yet seek to draw others into the fellowship of the same danger; so greedy were of malice and misery always, even of company. But if you (worthy Commander) will give me also leave to speak, a Man amongst his Countrymen not of meanest Place and Authority, which thing both the present Calamity and urgent Necessity might of you easily obtain, I would alledge such reasons, and lay down such matters, as should not only refresh the copious and glorious words of this brave and great Orator, coupled together of purpose to flourish out the matter, but also such as might stir your mind to that which is honest, profitable, and necessary: expelling hatred, fear, trouble or despair. This Gentleman, whom we all know, not only to be a vehement Orator, but sometime a Man most terrible, whereas for all his great words be is by nature mild, and so mild, that he never had the heart to kill, nor so much as lightly to wound any one of them whom he calls his enemies, much, rather whose perfidious dealing to be despised, while cruelly he doth without, whose manner of living he exclaimeth against, as altogether without Law, without Reason, without Order, without Regard; and now in time of Truce, and whilst the Showers of Arrows, Iron Bullets, Fire and Stones doth cease, creeping out of his Cave, maketh much ado, and keepeth a great fire; and not knowing in what danger he is, doth now with glorious words call upon death, whereas he hath hitherto yielded himself to much afraid, and all persons the besieged, who because he would spare us, will not suffer us to do that whereby we should undoubtedly perish. But whereof precedeth this new found Clemency? This unwonted favour toward the People of the Rhodes? I am not of the Tyrants Privy-Council, neither ever curiously sought after the reason of greater Mans Bounty, but am glad to receive it when

I need it. Yet for all that, I will not dissemble what I think in a matter so doubtful; he is willing (as I suppose) in this Siege and Conquest of the Rhodes, to shew unto other Nations whom he purposed to invade, both his Power and his Patience; left always (as his cruel Nature, be should make desolation in places he would reach over, and so for ever alienating the Minds of Men, be enforced to fight with all Men with Fire and Sword; by which Rigour he hath not so much hurt his Enemy as himself. For this cause (as I suppose, he leaveth unto us life and goods, left whilst he is in going about to take them from us by force, and we seeking to keep them by desperation, we should both fall into great desolation, nor left lamentable unto the Conqueror than to the conquered. Besides that, if he should kill us here, truly he might then enter the Breaches of the City on the Bodies of the dead, no Men now left alive to resist him. But Lerus is shut up, Arangia is strongly Fortified, Lyndus is by Situation impregnable; here be knowneth are Weapons, Armor, and Men; here must begin a new War, except he will have the remainder of your War, the fatal Plague of his Empire, to prey still upon his Subjects; all which strong places he shall have without slaughter, without bloodshed (as reason is) if he should let us and us poor wretches depart in safety with a little troth. Except these worldly considerations have moved him to mercy and compassion; then out of doubt it is wrought by divine power and the secret favour of God towards us, and of our Saviour Christ Jesus Crucified. Whereunto if you be Men well advised, if Religious, if mindful of the duty of Christians, it becomes us not to oppose any Obstacle, and with the ruin of your selves to destroy this miserable People, which for this half years Siege, hath scarcely had so much rest as might suffice the necessity of nature, standing for you in Battel, enduring both Wounds and Death for your Honour and Victory; by whose faithful labour and diligence you have been always helped both at home and abroad; whether you invaded the Turke by Land in Mytilene, Nicopolis, Methone, Patras, or other parts of Greece, or else by Sea thrust him out of the Passions of the Ionian or Aegean; whereby it may appear even unto a Blind Man, how injurious it is, and far from truth, to object unto this, That enjoying the Fruits of Peace, we refuse the Charges of Wars; nay we never refused Wars. But now is it come to that point, that if we would never so faint make Wars, we are not able to do, the flower of our youth being slain; and (small as it seems) not all left to us, but we lie in Beds with Wounds, Sicknes, Watching, and restless Labour; but also in Mind discouraged, whilst all things fall out prosperously to our Enemies, and to us adversity the greatest and best part of our great Artillery being broken with continual use, which if it were whole we could have thereof small use or profit, for want of Powder, which not only this City now wanteth, but also your strong Holds, Lerus, Lyndus, Halicarnassus, Arangia, and all the Islands, so curious or loo to look into other Mens doings, much left into your manner of War; but yet (Great Master) you cannot deny, but it is so, who have caused Soldiers to be brought from thence hither openly, and Gampdown secretly; by which Policy you have withstood your foreign Enemy these fix Months, and deceived the treachery of one or two domesticall Traitors. But I gladly admit we have all these things, I stand upon the truth. I say no more than Men say, but we lack to please a few; and suppose we wanted neither Armour nor Courage, I would then ask you this, whether they would advise you to use them to your defence, or to your destruction? For now to both it cannot be, no more than at once to be a Freeman and a Slave. To use them to your destruction, that were madnes and senseless pride, hateful to God and Man; you should therefore use them to defence;

how shall we defend a City (I do not say, as the truth is) already lost and possessed by the Enemy, wherein be reigneth rage, and turneth all upside down? But having the Walls battered down, a great Breach in the Spanish Station, and another not like, but even more so as good as made in the Italian Station, how shall we be able to keep this unfortunate Town, battered and rent at the French, English, and Avenge Stations, and the Tower of St. Nicholas? Which if it were not so battered and bored of all Warlike Provision, but found and thoroughly furnished with Munition and Victual, yet necessity enforcing, and reason persuading, you ought to forsake it, forasmuch as all power of further resistance is taken from you. Do you yet see how easily and almost without any trouble, the Enemy (by means of) the Castle be hath new built upon the Mount Philerno, not past two Miles distant, can take from you all manner of Provision both by Sea and Land, and refrain you from going out or in? Truly notable Gentlemen, concur for your Martial Prowess, you see and have long ago foreseen these things better than I, altogether ignorant in Martial Affairs, altogether busied in the Trade of Merchandise, and caring for my Family, yet suffer me to say the truth. All the Powers, whereby this Kingdom flood, are departed and gone; against the force of our Enemies no policy of force remaineth; and to expect Armies of Angels, or Soldiers from Heaven, and other such like Miracles, is in my judgment more and more to provoke God to anger, although in his anger he be unto us merciful. Wherefore being destitute of all worldly help, let us as we may, provide for our safety. I beseech thee (worthy Great Master) by these my aged Tears, by the natural pity ingraved in thy breast, except not this miserable City to the Spoil of the Enemy, our old and middle aged Men to the Sword, our Wives and Daughters: to be Ravished, our Boys and Turtles to the unnatural filthiness of our barbarous Enemies, and to be corrupted with the mad and greivous Opinion of the ungodly Mahometan Superstition: I would Noble Knights you had seen what wretched Men, with whom Mourning our heavy Families and Children crying about their Mothers, sent us bidders, and what Prayers they made for us at our departing; I would you knew with what mind and how great hope they expect their safety from your clemency and advised resolution.

The Great Master rejoiced that the City was not to be defended, a Common Council of the Burgesses of the City.

A Trust take with the Turks for fear days.

This Speech of the aged Greek might have moved a Heart of Flint; but the Great Master, who in his countenance shewed a greater courage than his present fate required, commanding every Man to his charge; after the matter had been thus most part of the night discoursed, gave then no other answer, but That he would be careful of all their well doing. The next morning he sent for Prejanes, Martininus, and a few other of the greatest judgment and experience; by whom he was fully resolved, that the City in so many places by the Enemy laid open and shaken, was not policy to be long defended; whereupon he caused a Common Council to be called of all the Knights of the Order together with the Burgesses of the City; where after long debating, whether they should fight it out to the last Man, or yield upon such Conditions as were to be obtained; It was by general consent concluded, that the City should be yielded, and thereupon a Decree made which was by the Great Master pronounced. Whilst these things were thus in doing, a Truce was taken with the Enemy for four days, but full of fear and danger. During which time, divers of the Turks presuming upon the Truce, came by great Companies to behold the Walls and Rampiers of the City; wherewith Fornovius the Frenchman (of whom mention is before made) being fore moved, in his choler without further command discharged a Tire of great Ordnance among the thickest of them, contrary to the Truce taken. At which time also the Rhodians received into the City secretly by night a Ship loaded with Wines out of Crete, and in her descent a Spanish chief Pilot of the Rhodian Gallies, and with him 100 voluntary Soldiers all Lascins, all which went out of Crete without the knowledge of the Venetian Senate; for at that time the Venetians were in League with Solyman. The Turks justly offended with the breach of the Truce, and the taking in of new Supplies, which they supposed to have been far greater than in former times they were; without command of any Captain or Ensign displayed, in great numbers thrust in through the ruins of the Breaches into the City as far as the Rampiers and Barricades new made, and furiously assailed the Defendants; In which Conflict many were slain and wounded on both sides. But after the Turks had to their coil again made proof of the courage of their Enemies, as without commandment they began that skirmish, of themselves they brake it off and retired. After the Truce was thus broken, the Captain of the Turks Fencers, a bloody cruel Fellow, having taken three Christians Prisoners, cut off their Hands, Ears, and Noes, and sent them so dismembered into the City with Letters to the Great Master, charging him with the unjust breach of the Truce, barbarously threatening within three or four days to make like example of him to all posterity. Amongst others none more forward with this fuddain and unexpected breach of the Truce, than Robertus Persimius, Raymondus Marches, and Raymondus Lupus, three Knights of the Order. Men of singular Willdom and Gravity, Embassadors at that time in the Turks Camp; whom the barbarous People in their fury had undoubtedly slain or put to torture, if they had not saved the like measure to have been shewed to their Hostages in the City. But after that Nicholas Vergatus, and Georgius Sandrinus, two of the Burgesses of the City, were come into the Camp with Articles containing the conditions whereupon the Rhodians were contented to deliver up the City, all their fury and rage was quickly appeased. Solyman for his greater Majesty and the more terror of these Messengers, heifer round about with his great Army, and guarded about with his Janizaries in their richest Attire and glittering Armour, gave them audiences; who admitted to his presence, with great humility offered unto him in writing the conditions whereupon the Rhodians would yield up unto him the City. The chief points whereof were, That the Churches should remain unto the Christians inviolated; That no Children should be taken from their Parents; That no Christian should be enforced to forsake his Religion and turn Turk; That such Christians as would tarry still in the City, might go do at liberty, without paying any Tribute for the space of five Years; That all they which would depart might go with Bag and Baggage, furnished with convenient Shipping and Provision as far as Crete, and to carry with them so much great Ordnance as they pleased; and that the Christians should appoint a reasonable day for the time of their departure. All which Articles Solyman consented unto, and told them to follow faithfully to perform the same. But how they were indeed performed the Writers of that age do much vary: It should seem they were neither altogether kept, nor broken; but so performed as pleased the Conqueror; certain it is that

A Turkish out Fall.

Solyman his Speech into the Great Master.

Although (said he) I might worthily and justly infringe the Articles I have prescribed concerning the yielding of the City, with thy most wicked crossed Compter, the People of the Rhodes, and thee especially such a capital Enemy, from whose defence punishment, neither Fate nor God ought to stay a just Conqueror's yet I have determined to be not only gracious and merciful unto thee, so great an Offender, deserving exemplary Punishment; but also liberal and bountiful; who if thou wilt by widdow amend the grievous Transgressions of thy former Life, I promise unto thee most honourable Entertainment, great Preferment, and the highest Places in my Empire, in my Army in time of War, and in Counsel in time of Peace. Not to refuse this mine offer, both thy present estate persuadeth thee, and the Christians (whose quarrel thou tookst upon thee to defend against me, with better beginning than (suffice) defence at thy hands; no better; for what should let thee forsaken of all thy Friends, a Man as it were betrayed and vanquished, to cast thy self into the perpetual faith and protection of a most mighty and merciful Conqueror, of himself offering thee this undeserved Grace and Favour.

The virtuous answer of the Great Master.

Most Mighty and Gracious Emperor, you offered me Favours before your other worthy Captains: I desire to serve not; neither is my present estate and desert towards you such, as that I dare or ought to refer the same; yet I will speak freely in the midst of your Victorious Army, a Man vanquished in presence of the Conqueror, whose great Mercy I never despised of, and whose Faith I never doubted; I had rather now I have lost my Sovereignty, forsworn to life my private and unfortunate Life; or else for ever hereafter to live in Obscurity, than of my People to be accounted a Fugitive rather than a vanquished Man: For, to be vanquished is but chance of War, and of so great a Conqueror no shame to him that is Conquered; but afterwards to forsake his own People and to turn to the Enemy, I account it shameful Cowardise and Treachery.

Solyman marvelling at the Courage and Majesty of the Hoary old Prince, in his so great extremity, dismissed him, and sent him again into the City, guarded with his own Guard, until he was come into his Palace; and unto every one of the Knights attending upon the Great Master, was given a rich Garment, in token of Solyman Favour. Within a few days after Solyman coming into the City, went to visit the Great Master also; whom he found busy in packing up his things against his departure. Here Kneses would have worshipped him, he would in no case suffer him to do so; but with his hand putting aside the Vail of Majesty (which manner of Reverence the Turkish Emperors give only to God, and their great Prophet Mahomet) took him up and Saluted him by the Name of Father. To whom the Great Master for his Willdom and Discretion went to him no less admirable, than he was before in time of War for his Valour and Courage, spake in this sort:

Solyman cannot see the City unto the Great Master.

If my Fortune and Success had been unfavourable to my Heart and Courage, I should have been in this City, rather as a Victorious Conqueror than a Man Conquered. But since the fatal Destinies would needs overthrow the Rhodian Estate, I am glad that you are the Man before all others by Fortune assigned, of whom I shall receive both Force and Grace. And unto you, amongst many other your rare and worthy Praises, this shall not be the least, That you vanquished the Rhodes and shewed Mercy; by this means you have joined unto your dreadful Power, the Name of Clemency and Courtesy; an Honour not of the Highest to be despised, by which alone we come nearer unto God. Wherefore I doubt not but you will keep the conventions of the late Peace inviolated, which your own clemency persuaded you to grant, and necessity enforced us to take. I shall now be an eternal example to the Turkish Emperor, Clemency and Virtue, more than if I had by and by at the first yielded my self; Obstinately unwilling; hath made me very and Mercy now Famous through the whole World, and unto the Worlds End.

The Speech of the Great Master to Solyman.

Whereunto Solyman by his Interpreter, answered:

It is to me a great pleasure, that God at length hath put into thy mind to make choice of Peace before War, which I would thou hadst liked of from the beginning; then truly thou shouldst this time have received of my great and mighty Majesty, more good than thou hast endured hitherto. Which that I have done unto thee, not for any hatred, but only for desire of Sovereignty, thou mayest gather by this, That I suffer thee and thine to depart hence at liberty, with all your Wealth and Substance as I formerly made no War, thereby to heap up Wealth and Riches; but for Honour, Fame, Immortality, and enlarging of mine Empire. For it is the property of a King, royally defended, by strong Hand to take from others, and to invade others; not upon a greedy and covetous Mind, but for the honourable desire of Rule and Sovereignty; which whilst my Neighbour withstandeth, I count it enough by force of Arms to remove him.

The virtuous answer of Solyman to the Great Master.

But the Tyrant (as many supposed) spake all this by way of diffimulation, having it was commonly bruted, given order for the rigging up of a great Ship, and certain Gallies, for the fuddain transporting of the Great Master and the Knights of the Order to Constantinople, which report seemeth to have been but feigned either of malice, or else by such as least knew Solyman's Mind; for if he had so purposed, who should have let him, having them all in his Power.

Joanis

Jeovius in his little Treatise Rerum Turcicarum dedicated to Charles the Fifth, reporteth that he himself heard, Liladulus the Great Master say, That when Solyman entered into the Rhodes attended upon with thirty thousand Men, there was not any Man hard to speak a word, but that the Soldiers were as if they had been oblivious Friars; and that when he came to ask leave of Solyman that he might depart, he was so courteously used of him, that turning himself to Adrian the Basha, whom he above all Men loved, said, Truly I cannot but grieve to see this unfortunate old Man, driven out of his own dwelling, to depart hence so heavily.

The Great Master embarking himself with his Knights and such others as were willing to depart, in Vessels and Gallies prepared for that purpose, departed out of the Island on New-years day at night; and after long and dangerous Travel by Sea in that Winter weather, landed at last at Messina in Sicilia, from whence he afterwards sailed into Italy, and so travelled to Rome, where he was honourably received by Adrian the Sixth of that Name, then Bishop there, a Hollander born, sometime School-master to Charles the Fifth, and his Vicegerent in Spain; who if he had been as forward in the short time of his Papacy to have relieved the Rhodes, as he was to maintain Charles his Quarrel against the French King, it was not unlike but the famous City had been relieved, and the Island in possession of the Christians at this day. Thus Solyman, whilst the Christian Princes were at discord amongst themselves, to his great glory and no less grief of all good Christians, entered the Rhodes the 15 day of December, a day dedicated unto the Nativity of our Saviour Christ, in the year 1522, after it had been by the Knights of the Order valiantly kept and defended against the Infidels by the space of 214 years, since the time they by force took it from the Infidels in the year 1308, and now being so long holden as was possible, when it had been six Months besieged. At this Siege Solyman lost a great part of his Army; for besides them that were slain at the Assaults, which were many, thirty thousand died of the Flux.

Whilst Solyman thus lay at the Siege of the Rhodes, Ferdinand Basha Governour of the Marches of the Turkish Empire, along the River of Empratice, by the commandment of Solyman went with a great Army against Alin-Beg, whom the Turks called Schach, Sugar-Oglu, that is to say, King Sugar his Son; which P. Jeovius corrupting, calleth him by the name of Savonar-Oglu. This Alin after he had betrayed his Uncle Aladulus the Mountain King, unto Sinan Basha, was by Solyman left chief Governour of that large and wild Country along the borders of Armenia and Cappadocia, wanting nothing of the honour of a King but the Name only, as is before declared in the life of Solyman. Solyman jealous of his Honour, and fearing lest he should take upon him the absolute Government of that Country (which indeed of right belonged unto him, the Children of Aladulus the late King, being now all dead) and so to make himself King; especially if he should joy in friendship with the Persian King, after the manner of ambitious Men, purposed by any means to have him taken out of the way; and had therefore sent Verbanes to ease him of that care. The Basha without making any show of Hostility marching with his Army along the Confines of his Country, as if it had been but to look to his charge, when he was come as near as he could to

Alis, without mistrust, thought good to assay if he could by policy bring that to pass which he was otherwise with great danger to attempt by force. Wherefore feigning himself to be extremely sick, he sent Embassadors to Alis, requesting him as a friend to vouchsafe to come unto him being at the point of death, unto whom he had many things of importance from the great Emperor to impart, and would if he should die, leave with him all his charge until Solyman should otherwise dispose thereof.

Alis, who from his youth had always honoured the Turkish Emperors and faithfully loved them, mistrusting no harm, came to the Basha, accompanied with his own Son, whom the faithless Basha without regard of infancy, caused presently to be put to death with their Father; and so reducing all that Country into the manner of a Province, under Solyman's obedience, came to him with twenty thousand Men, about the time that the City of the Rhodes was yielded up. This is the faithless dealing of the Turks, not with the Christians only; but with them of their own superstition also; using it as no small policy, utterly to extinguish the Nobility of all Countries subject to their servile Tyranny.

Solyman after he had thus subdued the Rhodes, and disposed of the Island as he liked best, returning to Constantinople, brake up his Army, and for the space of three years after followed his pleasure, not doing any thing worthy of remembrance. During which time and many years after, the rich and flourishing Country of Italy, sometime Mistress of the World, was miserably afflicted and rent in pieces by Charles the Fifth (then Emperor) and Francis the French King, the one envying unto the other the glory of the Empire; and he not content therewith, seeking with immoderate ambition to make himself Lord of Italy; most of the other Christian Princes and States being at the same time either by the one or by the other, drawn into the fellowship of that War, to the great trouble and fore weakening of the Christian Commonwealth. Whereupon Solyman waiting all occasions that might serve for the enlarging of his Empire, and annoying of the Christians, thought it not a fit time for him to let his foot into Hungary; whereunto he had already laid open a way by the taking of Belgrade. He knewed fast right well that Lewis then King of Hungary was but young, altogether unacquainted with the Wars, commanding over his headstrong Subjects (especially his rich Prelates and Nobles) no otherwise than pleased themselves, being himself rather by them altogether overruled; besides that, he was in good hope, that the other Christian Princes near unto him, either carried away with regard of their own Estate, would not, or else before unto himself by League fast bound, could not afford unto him any great aid or succour; the Germans he knew would make small haft unto such Wars as should yield them much danger, and but small pay. As for the Princes of the House of Austria, Charles the Emperor, and Ferdinand his Brother, although they were joined unto the young King, and the nearest bonds of Alliance (Lewis having Married Mary their youngest Sister, and Ferdinand, Ann, King Lewis his Sister) yet was there as he thought small help to be expected from them; Charles having his hands full in Italy, and Ferdinand altogether careless of himself and that Sigismund King of Polonia would for the young Kings sake break the ancient League he had with the Turkish Emperors, he could hardly be persuaded: As

Solyman returns with his Conscience.

Solyman upon the discord of the Christians and after that Lewis invaded that Kingdom.

Solyman comes against Lewis King of Hungary.

As for other Christian Princes farther off the stood not in any great doubt. Thus having with himself singled out this young Prince the Hungarian King, whom he had in his greedy mind already devoured, he set forward from Constantinople, and was come on his way as far as Sophia in Servia with a mighty Army of two hundred thousand Men, before that the Hungarians had any knowledge of his coming (so blind and senseless was that State, which now sleeping in security, had long before lost those Eyes which ever watch, and never spared cost or pains to keep the same in safety) in stead of whom were others come in place, sharp of sight, and too too provident for them, who concerned their own advancement; but blind as Beetles in forcing this great and common danger (wherewith they were shortly after all quite overwhelmed) until it was now brought home unto their own Doors. The young King of himself but weak, by reason of his youthful years, and nothing strengthened by them, for whom he had most done, and should have been his greatest stay, was wonderfully dismayed with the fame of the approach of so mighty an Enemy; yet the better to withstand him, he sent Embassadors with all speed unto the Christian Princes his Neighbours, requesting their Aid against the common Enemy, but all in vain. In the mean time, after the ancient manner of his Country he gave out general Summons for the Assembly of his Council for the Wars; whether his great tributary Prelates (of duty bound to appear) came with their Troops of evil appointed Horsemen, and not half full; who also delivered in less sums of Money by far, than of right they should have done, towards the maintenance of the charge of that common War. And the temporal Nobility, forgetting the warlike Discipline of their famous Ancestors, as fresh-water Soldiers which had seen the Turkish Emperor in his strength, and but little acquainted with some light skirmishes or small invasions, in their vain bravery made light account of the Turks; proudly vaunting, That although they were in number but few, yet they would easily overthrow the great numbers of them, if ever they came to battle fought. But above all the rest, one Pandus the morous Archbishop of Colofia, sometimes a Minorite, who had before been in divers light skirmishes against the Turks, with great infidelity did so confidently brag and boast of the Victory he vainly dreamed of, that in his Sermons unto the Soldiers, and in open talk with the Nobility (if he could have done so much as he wanted of) it should seem that he himself had been enough to have overthrown the Turks whole Army.

But when all the Kings Army was assembled, and a general muster taken, there was hardly found five and twenty thousand men in all, horse and foot. So that the foolish hardness of Tomarus, and others so much to give the Turkish battle, was of most wife men disliked. The old Soldiers and men of great experience said plainly, That it was more folly and madness, with such a handful of men to give battle unto the Enemy, who would bring eight times so many more into the Field as they were. Wherefore they wished, that the young King should be withdrawn from the imminent danger, among whom Stephanus Verbanes, a noble Captain, of all the rest best acquainted with the Turkish Wars, gave Council, that the person of the young King should for the safety of the Common State, whatsoever should happen, be kept out of the danger in the strong Castle of Buda. But the unruly Soldiers with open mouth impugned his wholesome Council, and said plainly, That except the King himself did lead them, they would not at all fight. Of which opinion was also the rash Prelate Tomarus, persuading them with all speed to give the Enemy Battle, and that the noble young King under the protection of Almighty God should in person himself go and give the signal of battle against his Enemies. The King overruled by this unlucky Council, upon a heavy without reason for forward with his Army, and came to a place called Mohatcho or Angace, which is a little Country Village not far from Danubius, almost in the middle between Buda and Belgrade. And now Balybes with twenty thousand Horsemen (the fore-runners of the Turkish Army) were at hand, at which time the Commanders and Captains of the Turkish Army, entered into Council, Whether it were better to incamp their Army within their Wagons along the River of Danubius, and so to expect the coming of Joannes Sepsius, Count of Gilia, and Vayvod of Transylvania (who was then said to be coming towards the King with his Transylvanian Horsemen, of all other fittest to have encountered the Turks; or else to march forward, and presently to give them Battle? But Tomarus, who now commanded all, knowing that upon the coming of the Vayvod, he was to give place, and himself to be commanded (which unto so proud a man was no small grief) for the maintenance of his credit and reputation, and to carry away the glory of the Victory he so vainly hoped for, could not abide to hear of any delay; but halting heedlessly to his own destruction, did with such vehemency impugn the wholesome Council of others, who would have expected the coming of the Vayvod, that he by his frantic persuasions, drew on the unadvised young King into most apparent and manifest danger. For Balybes divided his Horsemen into four Battels, which by turns skirmished with the Kings Army without intermission, and gave the Hungarians no leisure to rest either day or night, but continually wheeling about, kept them in so strait, that no man could without great danger go to water his Horse at the side of Danubius, which was fast by, or once to fit out of the Camp, but were enforced to dig Pits for water in places where they lay; with which necessity Tomarus was enforced to put the Army in order of Battle, and there was now no remedy, but he must of necessity fight for the honour of his Prince and Country. His Battle was ranged all in length, and his Horsemen not altogether (as it was thought) so uniformly placed, as were the Troops among his Footmen; left the Turks (being in number eight to one) should with their multitude compass them round, and so enforce them to fight as it were in a Ring; for now was Solyman come also with all his huge Army. The Hungarian Tents defended with a small Garrison, were left a little from the Army on the right hand, inclosed round about with Wagons, one chained to another; near unto the which, Tomarus General of this unlucky Battle, had not altogether undiscerningly placed a Troop of chosen Horsemen for the defence of the Kings Person against all uncertain Events of War. This day (unlucky to the Hungarian name, but unto the King himself most fatal and unfortunate) overthrew that his purpose, devised too late for the safety of the Kings Person; for at the first encounter the Hungarians, although they had received no harm by the Turkish Artillery (being mounted too high, of purpose as it was thought, the Gunners being for most part Christians) were easily beaten down, and overthrown, oppressed by the multitude of their Enemies, especially Tomarus with the rest of the Prelates and

and Nobility being almost all slain together, and the Hungarian Horsemen also either slain or put to flight. All things going thus to wrack, a Company of Turks assailed the Camp, which was hardly defended by the weak Garrison. Which thing the Troop of the chosen Horsemen appointed for defence of the Kings Person, beholding, could not be afraid, but that they would needs help them which defended the Camp. The young King seeing all his Army discomfited, and himself forsaken of the Horsemen which he was in hope should have guarded him, betook himself to flight. But as he was making shift for himself, thinking to have passed over a fenny Ditch, his Horse in plunging out, fell backwards upon him into the Ditch; where being heavily laden with Armour not able to help himself, he was in the midst of the filthy Ditch in the Mud most miserably drowned. Some few Horsemen escaped out of the Battel, the rest were either slain or taken Prisoners. This woful Battel never sufficient to be lamented, as the ground of the miseries of that worthy Kingdom, was fought the nine and twentieth day of October in the year 1526.

Solyman having obtained this Victory, marched on directly to Buda, the Regal Seat of the Hungarian Kings, which was delivered to him with the Castle; upon condition, that he should not violate any man either in Person or Goods, and at his departure to leave the same again unto the Hungarians; all which things he (according to their request) faithfully performed. Being entred into the Castle, he wonderfully commended the fame, but lodged not therein, because it is by their ancient Law forbidden the Turkish Emperor to lodge within any walled place which is not his own. Wherefore he returned and lodged in his Camp alongst the River of Danubius.

The Heads of the Christian Bishops and Captains presented to Solyman.

Whilst Solyman lay thus at Buda, seven bloody Heads of the Bishops and greatest of the Nobility (slain in the late battel at Mohatche) were presented to him, all set in order upon a wooden Stape; whereat he smiled, to see his Courtiers laying their right Hands upon their Breasts, and bending their Bodies as if they had done them great obedience, to salute them by name, and in dition to welcome them by the names of valiant Popes. But afterwards, when he had more particularly enquired what every one of them was, it is reported that he most of all detested Ladislav Salcarnius the great Bishop of Strigoniom, for his miserable Covetousness, that being a man of infinite Wealth, refused to spare part thereof unto his Sovereign, requesting the fame at his great need. Tomoreus he blamed of inconsiderate rashness, for that he being a Clergy-man, would buse himself so far in matters not belonging to his vocation: On the contrary part, he commended Franciscus Perennus Bishop of Veradium, a man honourably defended, for his wife Counsell (though it was not followed) for that he had heard it reported, that he as a true Prophet foretelling the common slaughter ensuing, had sharply said in the Council at such time as Tomoreus would needs fight with the Turks, and was not by any means to be removed from that his fatal opinion. That he did force what that their Frier-like General would the next day do; and that he would wish so great an enterprise effect no more, but to make one Holiday the more in the Christians Calendar, in remembrance of thirty thousand Hungarian Martyrs, most miserably slain of the Turk in an unequal battel, for defence of the Christian Faith and Religion (for at that time, they which willingly offered themselves to death in defence of the Christian Faith, were all accounted for Martyrs;) Georgius Sepsius and the others, he called soft Fools, that would adventure with so small strength to encounter so strong an Enemy. At such time as the Countersails of King Lewis and Mary his Wife were shewed unto him, he honourably said, That he was sorry for the young King, that it was his evil hap to have so unadvised Counsellors in a matter of so great importance, as to persuade him against all reason to fight at so great disadvantage; and that he came not into Hungary to take his Kingdom from him, but only to revenge the wrongs done unto him by the Hungarians; and that if he had escaped the danger of the Battel, he would assuredly have again resorted unto him the Kingdom of Hungary, contenting himself with some small Tribute; and that it should have been unto him honour enough to have saved the Nephew of Sigismund King of Havia his Confederate, so strongly allied with the honourable House of Austria. All which he commanded to be told to Mary the Queen, who was far feared from Buda to Polonium. Which might perhaps all seem to have been either dissemblingly spoken, or falsely reported of the Equity and Courtship of the barbarous King, if he had not shortly afterwards to the ample declaration of his Bounty and liberality, without any desert, given the same Kingdom of Hungary to Joannes Sepsius, not born of any Royal Blood, and then retaining the mind of a very Enemy. After that, he took away three goodly Images of Bras of ancient workmanship, which were placed in the entrance into the Kings Palace, by that renowned King Matthias Corvinus the great favourite of rare Qualities and Vertues; these Images represented the forms of Hercules with his Club, of Apollo with his Harp, and Diana with her Bow and Quiver, all which he placed in the Tile-vault as Confessionaries, as a Trophy of the Hungarian Victory. Howbeit these Images were since taken down by the pervasion of the Musli, and molten (as contrary to their Superstition) and great Ordinance made of them. He carried aloft away with him three Pieces of Artillery of most excellent and curious workmanship; and certain brazen Pillars of chamed work, which supported the Chapters of the Gates. He tarried at Buda about twenty days; in which time to satisfy the cruel nature and greedy desires of his Souldiers, he sent out divers Troops of Horsemen into the Country thereabout, by whom all the Country betwixt Rab and the River of Tibiscus was by that sudden and unexpected incursion laid destroyed, that it is reported that above an hundred and fifty thousand People of all sorts were either slain or led away into most miserable Captivity. All which done, he returned again by the same way he came to Constantinople.

About the same time Joannes Sepsius Vayvod of Transylvania, with a great power came now too late into Hungary to have aided the King; but glad, as was thought, of his death, as tending to his own advancement; forasmuch as he was now (the King being dead without issue) a man of greatest account among the Nobility of Hungary. Wherefore as one of a deep and reaching Wit, and in great hope to obtain the Kingdom, he began cunningly to labour divers of the Noblemen one by one, and instantly to request them, that at the next Parliament they would not betray the Honour of their Country, in suffering the Royal Dignity of that ancient Kingdom to be transferred unto a stranger, of such a Nation as happily loved them not; for why the Hungarians ought well to remember what great calamities they

they had received in former times, in chusing foreign Kings and Strangers to rule over them, and in following their unfortunate Ensigns against the Turks; which thing the woful miseries of times past might notably prove; which either Sigismundus of Bohemia, or Ladislav; the first, of Polonia, by their unfortunate Battels, once at Nicopolis, again at Columbarium, and last of all at Varna, had brought unto the Hungarians. But to speak, may once to remember the harms received by the long Cowardize of Ladislav, or this late rashness of his Son King Lewis, would make any noble mind to blush and be ashamed; under whose Government all Military Discipline, and the Glory of Hungary, might well be thought to be utterly lost. And he said there remained of the Nobility of Hungary, men honourably defended of most ancient Houses, worthy of the Kingdom, which bare noble minds, and were of sufficient Courage, Discretion, and Power, in this time of common heaviness to restore the honour of the Estate, and worthily to defend the Kingdom; amongst whom (said he) I would not be accounted to base minded, or heavy headed (although there be many which for the honour of their Houses and Wealth may seem to go before me) that I will therefore confess, that any of them is for Valour, Prowess, or Fortune, better than my self, either for conducting of an Army, or government of a Kingdom; for I shall be a King of Courage and Valour sufficient, if by your favourable good Will I shall be thought worthy of your content and suffrage. The Vayvod taking this course, by his earnest suite and labour had won the good Wills of many, and so much the easier, for that Stephanus Bator (a man of greatest Nobility among the Hungarians) was a little before gone into Bohemia unto King Perdinand, who was then greatly buified (by reason of a Parliament there summoned) in procuring the favour of the Nobility and Commons of that Realm, against the time of the Parliament, where in he was in good hope to be chosen King; as he was in short time after.

King Ferdinand.

At the same time the Hungarians were with great solemnity celebrating the Funeral of their late King; whose dead Body after the departure of Solyman from Buda, was found whole, by the demonstration of one Coriscus, one of the Squires of his body, who was present when he was drowned; and so was brought out of the Fens of Mohatche, to Alla Regalis, where it was with great Pomp buried amongst the Sepulchres of the other Kings of Hungary his Predecessors. Which solemn Funeral once ended, the general Military Parliament (by the Authority and Voice whereof the Kings of Hungary were by their ancient Laws and Customs to be chosen) was called; in the shutting up whereof, John the Vayvod having in that common heaving no Competitor, nor any of the greatest Nobility which durst stand against him, was with the great applause and consent of all these present chosen King. To whom, forthwith Petrus Perennus came and presented the ancient Crown of the Kingdom of Hungary, which was in his keeping, made after an homely fashion of pure Gold; with which the lawful Kings of Hungary used always to be solemnly crowned. It is reported, that it was the Crown of Stephanus first King of Hungary, and was by an ancient Custom always kept in the Castle of Viegrad. And so John the Vayvod was orderly crowned, and consecrated by the hands of Paulus Bishop of Strigoniom, lately chosen instead of Ladislav Salcarnius, slain in the Battel at Mohatche, and by the hands of Stephanus Brodavius Bishop of Faciis, whom he chose for his Secretary. And unto Americus Cibachus he gave the honour of the Vayvod of Transylvania, being but a little before chosen Bishop of Veradium. In his preferment, he was greatly holpen unto the Kingdom by the Nobility which followed him out of Transylvania, men of great account both in Peace and War; amongst whom descended of the Hungarian Blood, were chief, Stephanus Verbetius, Paulus Antadus, Georgius Polchenius, Nicolaus Glesle, and Janus Dacia. But whilst this new King is in this fort buied in rewarding his Friends, and strengthening himself in his Kingdom, he was advertised that Ferdinand his Competitor of the Hungarian Kingdom was chosen King of Bohemia; who out of the old controversy betwixt Matthias Corvinus and Ferdinand the Emperors great Grandfather, alleged great claim unto that Kingdom, derived from the time of Ladislav, who was reported to have been poisoned at the time of the solemnization of his Marriage, through the ambition and malice of Georgius Pograbracis; who affecting the Kingdom of Bohemia, shortly after obtained the fame. And now it seemed that the time was come, wherein Ferdinand made greater with the Kingdom of Bohemia, and strengthened with the power of his Brother Charles the Emperor, nor forgetting his Right, might upon good ground lay claim unto the Kingdom of Hungary; unto him (as he pretended) of right belonging ever since the time of Albertus the Emperor. Neither did Ferdinand, beside the strength of Austria and Bohemia, want the furtherance of divers of the Princes of Hungary; having in his Court many of unquiet Spirit, half Fugitives, desirous of change, which envying, as the Vayvods Royal Prefecture (as if it had been taken from themselves, more worthy thereof than he) by the rash and tumultuous favour of the Vulgar People. For besides Bator, who in most Mens judgment might most worthily have required and obtained the Kingdom, there were others also almost of like Nobility and Valour, as Valentinus Tauracius, Stephanus Maylatius, Janus Scala, Gasper Sacerdus, Nicolaus Pamphilus, and Ferdinandus Gnarius; to whom also was joined Paulus Bachinius born in Servia, a valiant Gentleman, who being entred into the Mahometan Religion, to avoid the Turkish Slavery, got away unto the Christians, and hardly escaped from the Battel of Mohatche. By the pervasion of these Noblemen, Ferdinand of his own disposition ready enough to claim his Right, especially a Kingdom, and trusting unto his Strength in Austria, Bohemia, Rhinia, Siria, and Cappadocia, marched directly towards Buda. With whole coming, John the new King being wonderfully troubled, as a man befet with want of all things, having neither sufficient Strength whereupon to rest in his new got Kingdom, neither any great assistance of the Fidelity of his Subjects, like enough either for fear, or of their natural inconstancy, to fall from him, determined not to abide the coming of his Enemy to Buda; but exhorting his Captains to follow him, although he were glad to depart and give place to his evil Fortune for a time, with such Power as he had brought with him out of Transylvania, and such other as he could otherwise levy, he passed over the River to Pestum; nor daring any where thereabouts to rest, by long marches passed over the River Tibiscus, and there encamped at Acas, which was a strong Castle upon the further side of the River. His departure being known, Ferdinand marching on, obtained Buda without resistance; where he laid a while, and consulted with his Captains.

Whether

Whether he should pursue his flying Enemy, or not. But it was quickly resolved, That the discouraged Enemy was to be speedily pursued, before he should gather greater strength, or enter into greater Policies. Wherefore Ferdinand committed all his Army unto the Nobility of Hungary, who his Friends, whom we have before named; who his Friends, with all speed possible, came to the River Thissus; where passing over upon a Bridge made of Boats which they brought with them in Waggon for that purpose, they came with Ensigns displayed unto the Castle of Tocai, where the King lay with his Army in order of Battle. But terrified with the sudden coming of his Enemies, and debating with his Captains of the greatness of the danger, took a course unto himself rather than on honourable, for his Captains desiring nothing more than to join Battle, and in that manner concerning their Enemies, perfwaded him to withdraw himself a little out of the Battle, and to keep him out of danger; and if things fell out otherwise than well, to reserve himself unto his better fortunes; as for themselves they would most resolutely fight against those traitorous Fugitives, inasmuch as it were a great dishonour for them, being Hungarians, a warlike People by nature, to refuse Battle being offered by the Enemy. Amongst the Chiefs of the Kings Army, Ferentus Bodo an old Captain of great experience and courage was chief, to whom the King delivered his Ensign ordered his Battle, for the number of his Soldiers; he himself stood in the main Battle with the Hungarians, placing the Transylvanians in the Wings. In Ferdinand's Army, Valentinus Turacius led the main Battle with the Hungarians, under Ferdinand's Ensign; strengthened on the one side with Troops of Horsemen out of Syria, and on the other, with the Horsemen of Austria. But Paulus Bachinus (according to the manner of the Turkish Wars, wherewith he was well acquainted) with a Company of Light-Horsemen lay close in ambush in a convenient place for that purpose, a good distance off, against the left Wing of the Enemies Army, ready as occasion should serve, to take his most advantage. It was not greatly needful for the Captains to use any persuasions to encourage their Soldiers, ready enough of themselves to fight. The great Ordinance once discharged, the Armies came fast on and joined Battle, where the Wings of both Battles fought with divers fortune. The Syrian Horsemen were not able to endure the force of the Transylvanians, but were put to the worse. And on the other side, the left Wing of Bodo's Army, consisting for most part of raw and new Soldiers, was by the Horsemen of Austria overthrown. At the same time both the main Battles (being almost all Hungarians) fought with equal courage, and that so eagerly, as seldom had been seen a more fierce or cruel Battle. But by a fresh charge given by Ferdinand's Horsemen, who had now put to flight the right Wing of Bodo's Battle, all Bodo's Army fighting most valiantly, was disordered and put to flight; Bodo the General labouring to restore the Battle, and to save the Ensign to him before by the King delivered, was by the coming in of Paulus Bachinus with his Light-Horsemen taken. The other Captains seeing all lost, and not hope of recovery, broke themselves to flight; all the Kings Artillery and Ensigns were taken by the Enemy. The King seeing the overthrow of his Army, for safeguard of his life fled into Polestina. Ferdinand's Captains following the course of the Victory, entered into Transylvania; where the People yielding themselves at the first, all the whole Province, submitted it self unto the Authority of Ferdinand. Bodo and the rest of the Noblemen that were taken Prisoners, with the Ensigns taken from the Enemies, were sent to Ferdinand. But when Bodo having his liberty promised, could not be perfwaded to renounce his Oath given to King John, and to bear Arms against him, he was by Ferdinand's commandment cast into a dark Dungeon, where shortly after confined with sorrow and grief, he miserably ended his life.

Shortly after, Ferdinand (the Hungarians generally submitting themselves unto him) was by their common consent fluted King, and crowned with the fame old Crown whereby King John had been crowned, which the fame Peremus (a man of little constancy) brought unto him; and with him was also crowned Anis his Wife, the only Sister of the late King Lewis. All which solemn ceremonies were celebrated at Alba Regalis, the usual place for the Coronation of the Hungarian Kings. Ferdinand by rare felicity thus possessed of two Kingdoms, whereunto he was not born, returned into Bohemia, and left his Deputies for the Government of the Kingdom of Hungary; these were Stephanus Bator, whom he appointed Viceroy, who afterwards he joynted Paulus Bishop Strigoni, who had also revolted from King John, and made Berabastus Secretary, and Alexius Turonus a Moravian, Treasurer.

King John thus miserably distressed, and thrust out of his Kingdom by Ferdinand, fled to Hieronymus Lascus, a man for his honourable descent and learned virtue, of great fame and reputation amongst the Poles; who glad of so honourable a Guest, was more careful of nothing, than with all possible kindness and courtesy how to comfort him, wrapt up in so many calamities with the loss of his Kingdom; he frankly promised unto him all his own Wealth (which was not small) for the recovery of his former estate; and that which more was, for the reviving of his former felicity, the uttermost of all great matters was accounted wonderful. That bountiful entertainment of this poor King by Lascus, was not altogether unpleasant to Sigismund King of Polonia, although (because he would not offend Ferdinand, with whom he was joyned in Friendship and Alliance) he seemed to most men plainly to forget himself, in shewing so small kindness unto King John, whose Sister Barbara he had sometime married; which was the cause that Lascus forgot no point of courtesy in entertaining his Guest, and yet the credit of Sigismund with King Ferdinand not toucht. But when they had spent almost a month in consultation, and debating of matters too and fro, Lascus accustomed with his deep Wit sharply to point, and advicfully to determine upon one weighty cause, at last rested upon this one point, That ready help in so hard and desperate cause was only to be hoped for of the Turkish Emperor Solyman; being of opinion, that he being a most mighty Prince and of an honourable disposition, answerable to his greatness, woy to respect the humble Prayers of an oppressed and exiled King; especially, if that being by his mercy and power restored, he could be content for to great a benefit to hold his Kingdom, as of the bounty of the Ottoman Kings. For Lascus saw that Solyman (so great and proud an Emperor) was not so desirous of Kingdoms (whereof he had so many as could not easily be reckoned, then commanding over a great part of the World) as of glory and renown, where-with he understood him to be wonderfully delighted above all other Kings of the East, particularly carried away with that windy vanity. This Counsel (as in effect it proved) was unto King John wholesome and reasonable, if a man do but respect the poor Estate of a King, so greatly wronged, living in exile, but respecting the Christian Commonwealth, was undoubtedly most dangerous and lamentable, for the East, particularly profit to bring the whole State into most dreadful and horrible danger; but the sick minds of worldly men, living in small hope of doing well, and at the point of desperation, refuse no worldly remedies, be they never so doubtful or dangerous. And not long after, upon this resolution with the King, Lascus desirous by noble actions to encrease the honour of his name, took the matter upon him, and went as Ambassador from the exiled King to Solyman to Constantinople. The report was, that Sigismund did not only not stay him, but secretly gave him his safe conduct with Letters of Credence, wherein he commended him unto the Baffaes and other great men in Solyman's Court, defended of the Polonian Blood, as his faithful and loving Subject sent thither upon an extraordinary and special Embassy. Lascus as soon as he was come to Constantinople, with wonderful exterior respect, shewed the favour, not of the Baffaes only, but of the other Courtiers also; presenting them with such Gifts as might for the fineness and rareness thereof, rather than for the value (as he thought) be most acceptable and pleasing to their Wives; for amongst that barbarous and corrupted People nothing is better welcome than Gifts, whether they proceed of fine good Will, or other respect, is no great difference. Amongst the great Baffaes at that time of greatest Power and Authority was Luftebeius, or rather Lutis, who had married Solyman's Sister; and Abraham born at Praga, a base Village in Acarmania, brought up in the Court from his Childhood with Solyman; he was then Visier or chief of the Baffaes, and Keeper of the Emperors Seal, and was by his office to subscribe all such Grants or Letters as passed from the Emperor; by which his great place and special favour he had with Solyman, he in Magnificence, Power and Authority far exceeded all the rest of the Baffaes, being never pleased himself, and that with such Sovereignty and the good liking of Solyman, that it was commonly said, he was the commander of his thoughts. Lascus thus insinuated into the Court, and oftentimes talking with the Baffaes without an Interpreter, for that he could well speak the Slavonian Tongue (the familiar speech of the Turkish Courtiers) eagerly solicited the Kings cause, wonderfully commending him; for at his first coming, after he had saluted Solyman, and was about to have declared the cause of his coming, he was after the manner of the Turkish Court referred to the Baffaes; for Solyman used not to admit any Christian to talk with him in his Court. Lascus requested of Solyman, by the Baffaes That King John wrongfully thrust out of his Kingdom by Ferdinand Duke of Austria, and Treason of certain of the Hungarians, might by the Turkish power be again restored unto the Kingdom of Hungary, which he would hold by advice of the Turkish Emperor, of right belonging unto him, since the time that Solyman with victorious hand revenging his wrongs, and subduing his Enemies, had by Law of Arms (Fortune to judging) gained the same. Promising that King John, who for his worthiness was by the general good liking of the Hungarians lawfully chosen to be their King, and so after the ancient manner of that Kingdom crowned; if he were now received into Solyman's Protection, and by him restored, should protest to forget to great a benefit, but always most faithfully to be ready to honour the Majesty of Solyman, paying him such yearly Tribute as it should please him to impose, and to make it known to all men, that he was his Vassal. Which thing if it would please him to grant, as it should be no less honour and glory to Solyman himself, than profitable and comfortable unto the distressed King. For beside, that heretofore Kings are compared unto Gods, rather for giving than receiving; it was easy to be seen, how greatly it did concern the profit of the Ottoman Kings to be neighboured with a weak and tributary King, rather than with Ferdinand's Prince of great Power, lately chosen King of Bohemia, supported by the strength of his Brother Charles the Emperor, commanding over the warlike Nation of the Germans; which was as much difference as was betwixt the maintenance of a continual heavy War upon his Borders, and the safe enjoying of a most assured Peace. Beside that, it concerned the Turks to beware, that such things as they had got by the Sword, they should also by the Sword defend; and not to suffer any one to grow greater than the rest in Riches and Power. For it might so fall out, that Charles, grown to be a Prince of mighty Power, might draw the rest of the Christian Princes to join with him in the common cause of the Christian Religion, and in that quarrel, as the Christian Kings of Europe had in former time done, with united Forces to seek to recover again what they had before lost; whose Force it would be hard to withstand. These things being sharply delivered, and by the Baffaes again reported unto Solyman, who sitting at a secret Window, had before heard them as they were by Lascus to the Baffaes declared; it was no great labour to persuade the Turkish Emperor, of himself desirous of Glory and Sovereignty, again to undertake the Hungarian War, and to grant King John his request, promising accordingly to the success of the Victory to give him that he desired, that he would faithfully perform what he had promised, and not leave himself therefore unthankful.

In the mean time, Ferdinand upon great reason thinking it necessary by all means possible to confirm himself in the possession of the Kingdom of Hungary; and fearing no force but the Turks, determined to prove Solyman's disposition, and to seek for his Friendship; hoping by reasonable means to compass it, by shewing unto the barbarous Prince (not altogether abhorring from the commendation of Justice) his ancient Title and Claim, and that he was by the ancient Laws of the Country right thereof; thinking that Solyman having obtained so many Victories, and ruling over so many Kingdoms, would now at length give himself to Peace, as a man contented with his glory already gotten. His desire was, to be received into his Friendship, and to joyn with him in League upon the same conditions which Ladislav and his son Levius had for certain years before obtained of the Ottoman Kings, and Sigismund King of Polonia then also with like quietness enjoyed. Wherefore having found out a fit man, whom he might send upon this Embassy to Constantinople, one Thomas Overlandus, a Hungarian) he furnished him accordingly, and gave him Gifts, such as he thought good to bestow upon the great Baffaes. But when Overlandus was come unto Constantinople, he found Solyman harder to be intreated than he had before hoped, and the Baffles altogether unwilling to hear of any League; for although he was courteously received of Solyman, and most patiently heard, whilst he both eloquently and discreetly gave the great Baffles, delivered his Embassy; yet in the shutting up of all, he received no more but a proud and insolent answer; for Solyman said, it was far from the manner of his Ancestors, to receive them into grace and favour which had done injury to the Othoman name; wherefore that Ferdinand had done impudently to invade another mans Kingdom, and to think to hold it to himself; forasmuch as his old Title and Claim which he took so much upon, was altogether extinguished and lost by Law of Arms, by his late Victory against King Lewis; for which causes he adjudged him unworthy of his Friendship and Favour, purposing sharply to revenge the wrong he had received; and proclaiming War, to come again into Hungary with such a power as should be sufficient to invade Ferdinand, either in Austria or Germany. Wherefore instead of Friendship and League he denounced unto him all the calamities of War; and so commanded the Embassador with speed to depart from Constantinople. But Oberdanus when he was come back again as far as Vienna, and had there told the Kings Lieutenants of the threatening words of Solyman, and that he would shortly come thither with his Army, he was not of any of them believed, but reputed for a vain man. Wherefore to shun the hatred of them which mislook truth for falshood, he made hast to come to Ferdinand, who was then at Spiria, labouring for voices to further his suit, for that at the next Assembly of the States of the Empire, which was then at hand for the Coronation of his Brother Charles, he himself as he well hoped, was to be chosen King of the Romans. The News brought by Oberdanus, did not a little trouble King Ferdinand, foreseeing as it were what would happen; for that the Turkish Tyrant used not lightly to break such promises, but to perform them to the uttermost; and that more increased his care, he knew he should come in evil time to crave help of the Germans, for the defence of his Kingdom in Hungary against so mighty an Enemy, especially his Brother Charles the Emperor being busied in his Wars in Italy, and he himself wanting Money, the only means to raise an Army to withstand the Turk. The Spring now come, and all things fresh and green, Solyman altering nothing of his former design, having levied an Army of an hundred and fifteen thousand men, set forward from Hadriampole, his European Horsemen going before him conducted by Abraham the great Baffa, and Achemates Michael-Ogli, General of the Acazzij or voluntary Horsemen; and his Asian Soldiers led by Becramehin Baffa following after him; he himself with his Janizaries and Soldiers of the Court keeping in the middle. And marching on in this sort, came in five daies to Belgrade, where King John accompanied with Lajcus and such of the Hungarian Nobility as took his part, came unto him, of purpose to make himself known unto him which was to protect him; and doing him all the honour he politely could, to request him to proceed to revenge his quarrel. Solyman him self a very friendly countenance, raising himself a little from the Cushion whereon he sat, gave him his right hand, protesting, That nothing could happen unto him better, or that he more desired of God, than to be able to relieve distressed Princes, especially such as were wrongfully oppressed by his Enemies; wherefore he willed him to be of good comfort, promising of his bounty frankly to bestow upon him whatsoever he should in that War win with the Sword from the Enemy. King John obtained this rare favour of Solyman by the earnest mediation of Abraham the commanding Baffa; whom he had before at Constantinople by his Embassador Lajcus to now with Gifts and Requests, that he throughly took upon him the defence of the Kings cause; wherein Lajcus was especially holpen by Allofius Gritus the Duke of Venice his Son, who then followed the Turks Camp, and was for his Fathers sake and the great sufficiency he held himself, had in great reputation amongst the Turks; and in such favour with Abraham, who did all in all with Solyman, that he could persuade him to any thing he would. For this Allofius Gritus, born and brought up in Constantinople, and wonderful eloquent in the Turkish Tongue, had by the honourable carriage of himself, and the great Port he kept in his House, so thoroughly possessed Abraham (that all commanded) that he would many times bring Solyman himself over the Haven to Pera, to solace himself in Gritus his pleasant Gardens and Banqueting Houses, which he had there most pompously made after the Italian manner; whereby to his great profit he obtained to be the chief man in receiving of the Turks Customs.

The fame of Solyman came directly from Belgrade to Buda, so terrified the Citizens of Buda, that they almost all forsook the City and fled unto other places further off, some to Strigonium, some to Alba Regalis, some to Pollonium; so that at his first coming he entered the City (almost desolate) without any resistance; the Castle holden by a Garrison of Germans, he commanded to be besieged. The Captain of the Castle was one Thomas Nadafus, a man of great account among the Hungarians, both for the honour of his House, and for his answerable to the fame, greatly with singular Learning; he perceiving his Soldiers dimmed with the sight of so great an Army, and willing to surrender up the Castle; as befel a valiant Captain forbad his Soldiers to have any talk with the Enemy, commanded the great Artillery to be bent and discharged upon the Turks; and seeing his Soldiers slack and timorous, reproved them of Cowardice and Treason, threatening them with shameful death, if they did not hold out the siege to the uttermost; and then themselves valiant men, both for the honour of their Country, and of King Ferdinand whose Pay they received, and of whose bounty they were to expect Rewards and Preferments answerable to their Deserts. But they misdoubting by the running too and fro of the Turks, that the Castle was undermined; and smelling, or at leastwise imagining themselves to smell the fume of the Gunpowder, which they supposed to be in the Mine, and doubting to be presently blown up; were struck with such a sudden fear, that neither the fear of future punishment, neither the shame of so foul a Fact, nor the reverence of so worthy a Captain could stay them, but that they would needs without further delay deliver up the Castle; which when they could by no means persuade the resolute Captain to consent to, but that he still with stern Countenance exclaimed against their Cowardice and Treason, they laid hands on him, and bound him Hand and Foot, and so presently concluded with the Enemy to yield to him the Castle, so that they might in safety depart thence with Bag and Baggage; which their Request Solyman granted. But when the Garrison Soldiers (in number about seven hundred) were to depart depart with their baggage towards Pollonium, as was before agreed; and the Janizaries coming into the Castle, having looted the Captain; were about to let him go also; Solyman advertised of the treachery of the Garrison Soldiers, and of the Fidelity of the Captain, changing his mind, judged such villainous minded men unworthy of his mercy, and in detestation of their perfidious dealing with their Captain, gave them all to his Janizaries to be slain; but to the Captain himself he offered honourable entertainment, which when he refused, Solyman courteously sent him away; he helped therein by the commendation of King John, although his Sister was married to Solyman, his deadly Enemy. Which bloody execution done by the commandment of the bloody Tyrant, the Turks did was not only lawfully done, but also to the immortal glory of his name in the execution of Justice; which might peradventure seem reasonable, if the perpetual hatred of that most barbarous Nation against the Christians gave not just occasion of suspect, that it proceeded rather of their ancient malice, than of any regard of Justice. For why should the Germans who had offended to his great good, and therefore obtained his safe conduct, be thought worthy of so cruel death? when as Solyman himself in punishing the perjury of another, ran into wilful perjury himself; perverting the commendation of Justice which he so much desired, by his most bloody and unjust sentence.

Buda the chief City of Hungary thus taken by Solyman, he resolved forthwith to besiege Vienna the chief City of Austria; in good hope, that by the carriage away of that, the other Cities of less strength both of Hungary and Austria would without any resistance be yielded unto him. Wherefore he sent before him Achemates with the voluntary Horsemen, who according to the manner of the Turkish Wars, running through the heart of Hungary, and entering with Fire and Sword into Austria, passed by Vienna, miserably burning and destroying the Country before him as far as Lynce. The poor People not knowing where to hide themselves from the fury of their Enemies, nor of whom to crave help, fled as Men and Women distressed, carrying with them their beloved Children, the unfortunate pledges of their love, and what else they could, as things saved out of the midst of the Fire. For whatsoever fell into the Enemies hand, was lost without return; the old men were slain, the young men led away into Captivity, Women ravished before their Husbands faces, and afterwards slain with their Children, young Infants were ripe out of their Mothers Wombs, and others taken from their Breasts were cut in pieces, or else thrust upon sharp Stakes, yielding up again that breath which they had but a little before received; with many other incredible Cruelties, which were then by the merciless Enemy committed. Solyman himself shortly after followed these forerunners, and setting forward with all his Army from Buda towards Vienna, by the way took the Castle of Altenbourg, whether by force or composition, is diversly reported; and the Garrison Soldiers there placed by King Ferdinand, he reserved three hundred Bohemians, whom he commanded to follow his Camp.

He assaulted the little City of Naupolis seven times in one day, and was as often repulsed; but being loath to spend any longer time about a Town of so small importance he forsook that, and held on his way to Vienna, whither he came about the fix and twentieth day of September, and incamped in five places in the plain about the City, with such a World of People, that when they viewed his Camp from the highest

Tower in Vienna, it seemed that the ground was for the space of eight miles all covered with the multitude of his Tents and People. King Ferdinand, who from the time that he had by his Embassador Oberdanus received the hard answer from Solyman, always stood in doubt of his coming; and beside his own Forces (which were not great to oppose against so mighty an Enemy) craved Aid of other Christian Princes his Neighbours, especially of the Princes of the Empire; Who granting him Aid against the common Enemy, appointed Fredrick Count Palatine of Rhene and Duke of Bavaria, General of their Forces. But whilst the Germans after their manner, slowly set forward, and made less halt than the greatness of the present danger required, Solyman coming in the mean time, had to besiege the City, that it was not possible for the Duke Fredrick by any means to get into it, but was glad to stay with his Army at Clervise about twelve miles from Vienna. A few daies before by good hap, upon the report of the loss of Buda, twenty thousand Soldiers Horsemen and Footmen out of divers Countries, were in good time come to Vienna: Amongst these, the chief Commanders was Philip the Palfgrave, Duke Fredrick Nephew (a young German of great Courage and Hope, sent thither but a little before with a few Companies of Horsemen and Footmen by Fredrick his Uncle, who was coming after with a greater power himself, but was now shut out of the City by Solyman); Nicolaus Count of Salma, the Lord William Rüdiger, Steward of the Kings Household, Joannes Caszianer, a noble man of Croatia, and afterwards Governor of Vienna; and next unto them, Nicolaus Turrianus, Joannes Harvius, Leonardus Feljus, Helior Ramkack, Men both for their Birth and Valour of great account amongst the Germans. The City of Vienna as it was of some good strength toward the North by reason of Danubius, so in other places it was at that time neither by Art nor Nature strong. Church of Saint Ulderich. In the third Camp, towards the rising of the Hills, lay Michael-Ogli, towards the Church of Saint Vitus. At the Scottish Gate toward Damnius, lay the Afpi, with divers Companies of the Janizaries; which with Shot out of their Trenches, suffered no much to appear upon the Walls in that quarter without most manifold danger, and poured such showers of Arrows over the Walls into City, as if they had fallen out of the Clouds; that hardly could any man stir in the City unarmed, but he was forthwith wounded. Solyman himself lay near unto Saint Marks Church, compassed about with the Janizaries and other Soldiers of the Court, defended also with the brick Walls of the Garrison thereabouts. Whilst the Turks were thus incamping themselves, the Christian Defendants oftentimes fortunately fellied out upon them, and flew many of them. In one of which fallies Wolfgangus Hagen a valiant Captain, with certain old Soldiers of the Spaniards, was slain fighting most valiantly at the Gates of the Castle; and in another skirmish Christophorus Zellitz, a man of great courage, falling out of the City with five hundred Horsemen, was intercepted and taken with six others of his Company; who were all compelled by the Turks to carry so many Heads of their slain Fellows upon Poles, and so presented unto Solyman; of whom he inquired many things as well concerning Ferdinand himself, and where he was, as concerning the Princes which had the charge of the City, whether they were in hope to defend the same against his mighty power or not. Whereunto Christophorus aptly and wisely answered, although not altogether so truly. That King Ferdinand lay not far off at the City of Linze, expecting the Assembly of a great Army; and that the Princes of Germany, Bohemia, Moravia, and of divers other places were coming unto him, with great Aid; so that if he would but stay a while until these Forces were come together, he should find great Power; forasmuch as it would not be long before the King would come and give him Battle: as for the Princes in the City, he said, he knew no more of their minds, but that both they and all the Soldiers from the highest to the lowest, had solemnly sworn to defend the City, and not to give it over, until the last man, reposing trust in hope not in the Walls and Fortresses thereof, but in their Weapons and Valour, being men of great resolution, and not easily to be vanquished or discouraged. With which answer although Solyman was a little moved, yet dissembling his present heart, said, he had hitherto made War against divers Nations, and always had the Victory, whereof he doubted not now also; but as for him and the others taken with him, they knew they yet to make them know that he could never mercy unto his vanquished Enemies, he frankly granted them their lives and liberty; charging them, that after they were again returned into the City, they should in his name with the Defendants of themselves to yield up the City, which it was impossible for them long to defend against his mighty power, which neither the strong City of Belgrade, nor the famous City of the Rhodes were able conditions as he should grant unto them; promising that amongst other things proceeding of his infinite bounty, he would take order, that they should in safety depart thence with bag and baggage; in which doing, they should well provide for the safety of themselves and of their Goods, by flying into his mercy in time, before the fury of the War was grown to further extremity; all which it would be too late to expect after the Victory, when nothing was to be hoped for but cruel death, murder, and miserable destruction. Wherefore, it was good for them well to consider of the matter, and not foolishly to refuse that was now frankly offered them of mercy, which they should not afterwards obtain with any Prayers or Tears; for why, he was resolutely to do, (as he said) not to depart thence before he had taken the City. When he had thus schooled them, he gave unto every one of them three Hungarian Ducats, and so sent them away. They being received into the City with great joy, made relation unto the Princes and great Captains, of all the threatening and proud speeches of the Turkish Tyrant; which they took in such disdain, that they would not vouchsafe to return him any answer. Solyman not a little displeased, that his great words were so lightly regarded, by way of derision sent word to the City, That if they wanted help, he would send them the three hundred Bohemians, whom he took in the Castle of Altensberg; to whom answer was returned by them of the City, That they needed no help from him, wherefore he might dispose of his Prisoners as he thought good. By this, Solyman perceived, that Vienna was not to be won with words, nor the Defendants to be discouraged with great looks; wherefore he began to use his Force, and with such Ordinance as he had brought with him to batter the Walls, which because it was not great, but fitter for service in Field than for battery, did not much more harm than to beat down the Battlements and such like findings, made of Timber and Boards in manner of Galleries, hanging here and there over the Wall, for the final Shot to play out of, a simple device instead of Flankers. His great Artillery provided for battery, which he dayly used upon the River of Danubius, which he dayly looked for; but by good hap, Wolfgangus Hoder, a forward Captain, hearing of the Turks coming up the River, went out of Poffonium with certain small Vessels well appointed, and meeting with the Turks, set upon them with such courage and resolution that he slew many of them, and sunk divers of their Boats and Pinnaces, amongst whom were they which were bringing up Solyman's great Pieces for battery to Vienna, which was there all sunk in the River, with the Boats that brought it. By this good service, Solyman was disappointed of his great Artillery, and the City delivered of a great danger. So Wolfgangus having made great Spoil among the Turks, and lost some few men, returned with Victory to Poffonium. Yet another part of the Turks Fleet coming up to Vienna, at the first coming broke down all the Bridges; for a little above the City, the River of Danubius dividing its Channel, maketh divers Islands, which by sundry Bridges are joynted together, over which lieth the way from Austria unto the City. This Fleet so kept the passage, that no man could without danger either by Water or by Land go in or out of the City. Solyman having lost all his Pieces for Battery, and seeing how little he prevailed with his Field Pieces, fell to undermining of the City, hoping by that means to overthrow the Walls, and to make a way for his men to enter. This work, as the Turks chief hope, was with wonderful labor and diligence attempted in fifteen sundry places; which was not so secretly done, but that it was by Drums laid upon the ground, by Bafons filled with Water, and Sounds made into the Earth, perceived by the Defendants; and

and so with Countermine met withal, that most part of those works were utterly frustrated, and in them eight thousand of his Turks either slain or buried quick.

Eight thousand Turks lost in the mines.

The walls of Vienna blown up.

The Turks repulsed from the breach.

A most terrible assault.

The Turks the third time repulsed.

Solyman to baffle the Defendants that they should not so perfectly discover his Mines, divided his Army into four parts, appointing them orderly to succeed one after another in giving Alarms to the Town, that filling their Ears with continual noise, he might keep them always occupied. In the midst of the hurly burly his Mine-work went forward with all speed possible, neither was he in that his expectation deceived; for one of the Mines brought to perfection, unexpectedly by the Defendants, and suddenly blown up, shook and overthrew a great part of the Wall near unto the Gate which leadeth towards Carminia, whereas the Turks gave a great shout, as if the City had now been taken, and withal courageously stepping forward, pressed in on all sides, by the ruins of the Wall to have entered the breach, charging the Defendants with their small Shot and Turkish Arrows as thick as Hail. Who upon the contrary part like resolute Men stood in the face of the breach, with more assurance than the Wall it self, receiving them with deadly Shot and push of Pike, in such furious manner, that the Turks for all their multitude, unable longer to maintain the Assault, began to retire. Which thing Solyman perceiving, sent in new supplies, and so renewed the Assault before given over, but with no better success than before; for having received a great overthrow, as Mars forgetting both Duty and martial Discipline, they retired, not expecting any sign of Retreat. At this Assault so many of the Turks were slain, that the ground near unto the Town lay covered, and the Ditches filled with their dead Bodies. Not long after the Wall was blown up in two places more, over against St. Clares Church; by which breach, being not very great, the Turks looking to have made a bloody Fight with the Germans which defended that place; which they fought so desperately to have entered, that without regard they thrust one another upon the points of their Enemies Weapons; who glittering in good Armor, readily received them being for most part naked Men, and slew them without number, and so enforced them again disorderly to retire, having before filled both the breaches with their dead Carcases. Three days after ensued a most cruel Fight, when as another part of the Wall (near unto the Gate of Carminia, and not far from the first breach) was so suddenly overthrown, that the Turks through the new made breach seeing the Christians as they stood ready to come to the defence thereof, and likewise the Christians them, now approaching; for eagerness and haft on both sides threw away their Pieces and Bows, and came to handy blows in the middle of the breach; the Turks with their Scimiters, and the Germans with their long Swords. At which time, as the Christian Captains encouraged their Soldiers with cheerful persuasions; so the Turkish Commanders enforced forward their Turks both with words and wounds. The Assault began so terrible, that it was thought a more fierce and deadly Fight was never seen from the beginning of the World; which was with great resolution maintained by the Turks, for that many of their most valiant Horsemen forsaking their Horfes, thrust in with their Targets and Scimiters, or else with their Lances amongst the Janizaries and other Footmen, and there fought most desperately. At last, after this furious Fight had endured by the space of three hours and many of the Turks best Captains and Soldiers lay dead upon the ground by heaps; the Turks seeing no hope to prevail, gave over the Assault, and retired to their Camp.

Long and tedious it were to recount every Assault given during the time of that dreadful Siege, with every particular accident not unworthily the remembrance, which for brevity briefly I pass over. Yet among the rest, the most valiant Leader (though afterwards unfortunate) the Lord William Rosenhorff is not to be forgotten, who oftentimes perceiving many of the Turks stragling disorderly abroad in the Country; one day upon the fuddain sallied out upon them with certain Troops of Horsemen, with them, and having them in chase, did such speedy execution, that of five thousand three hundred scarce one hundred and forty escaped his hands; after which time his Name became terrible unto the Turks. Solyman was exceedingly grieved with the often and bloody Assaults by him in vain given to the City; but purposing now to prove the last and utmost of all his Forces, he called to him the chief Commanders of his Army, whom at the first he sharply reproveth as Men of no Courage, which being many times as good as possessed of the Victory, had most cowardly contrary to the manner of that victorious Nation, turned their backs upon their Enemies, in the breaches already half won; wherefore he would them to pluck up their Hearts, and to make all things ready for a new Assault, wherein he expected that they should with courageous fortitude and resolution, recompence their late Cowardice; for why, he accounted it a great dishonour to forsake the Siege begun; wherefore they should resolve the next day as victorious Conquerors to take the City, or else that they should faint heartedly Cowards to end their days. The next day after this heavy charge given, which was the fifteenth of October, the great Commanders of the Turks Army with all their Forces assailed the City, thrusting their Men into the breaches by heaps, as if they would, if it had been possible, have discouraged or overborn the Christians; they were come to handy Blows, and the Fight was in every place most terrible, the Christian Defendants still repelling them with greater Courage than they were able to assault them. Besides that, to the great advantage of the Defendants, many Pieces of their great Ordnance skillfully mounted in places most convenient, and continually discharged among the thickest of their Enemies as they pressed on, made of them such slaughter, and so cut them off, that being thoroughly discouraged, they shrunk back, and could not by any threats or command of their Captains be thrust forward; refusing rather to be slain of their own Captains (as some of them were), than to be rent in sunder with the murdering shot of the Christians. So that the Captains seeing now no other remedy, gave over the Assault and retired, leaving behind many thousands of their dead Turks in the Town-ditches.

The next day after this Assault, Solyman despairing to win the City, and fearing the coming of King Ferdinand and the Count Palatine with a strong Army, as it had been to him reported, considering also that Winter was now coming fast on, determined to raise his Siege; and to colour the dishonour thereof, he sent certain of the chief Prisoners which he had taken, richly Apparelled, with their Purse full of Money, into the City, to tell the Captains, that he came not with purpose

posé either to besiege or take the City, but to revenge the wrongs done unto him by his Enemy King Ferdinand, and to have fought a Battle with him for the Kingdom of Hungary; whom forasmuch as he could not draw unto Vienna, he would remove thence to seek for him, as his Capital Enemy; wherefore they should do well to yield themselves; which if they would, he promised not to enter their City, but to receive both the Citizens and Soldiers into his protection, referring unto them their Lives and Goods, with perpetual freedom. Which his offer the Defendants scornfully refused, as proceeding of meer deparation. The next night following, Solyman with more than barbarous Cruelty, caused all the Prisoners in his Army to be slain; which pitiful Occurrences was of the Soldiers heard into the City, not knowing what the matter should be, until that the next day after the departure of the Enemy, they found the dead Bodies of Men, Women, and Children in all places of the Camp wallowed in their own Blood, a most lamentable Spectacle to behold. Solyman purposing to forsake the Siege, caused Abraham the great Basha to draw himself in order of Battle, as if he would have given a fresh Assault: In the mean time he himself rode upon the fuddain with the rest of his Army, and returned towards Buda in such half, that he neither put any Garrison into such places as he had taken, neither demanded of them any Tribute. After whom the Basha followed, keeping himself a days journey behind him; and in five days he arrived with all his Army at Buda, thirty two German Miles from Vienna.

This Siege was given over by Solyman about the sixteenth of October, wherein he is reported to have lost eighty thousand Men, amongst whom was his great Lieutenant of Asia, with many other of his forward Captains and best Soldiers. Of the Defendants few or none of name were left; but of the Country People it is supposed that there was about sixty thousand slain and carried away into Captivity; all the Country about Vienna was miserably spoiled, all their Trees and Vines being by the Turks cut down to the ground. Solyman according to his promise restored Buda unto King John's who by solemn writing acknowledged himself his Vassal, and to hold the Kingdom of Hungary of him as his Lord and Sovereign. Unto him Solyman joynted Aloisius Gritti as his Legate, to help him to provide such things as should be needful for the defence of that Kingdom.

It happened one day whilst Solyman lay at Buda, and had given King John with divers of the Nobility of Hungary access into his Pavillion, that he fell earnestly in hand with King John, to pardon Paulus Bishop of Strigoniun, and Petrus Paresius (who had taken part with King Ferdinand) and to receive them into his favour again; which Men King John in no case liked of, because that they as Traitors unto their Prince and Country, forgetting their Faith and Oath, had performed the like duty to Ferdinand, as they had but a little before done unto him at the time of his Coronation; wherein he shewing himself unwilling to be entreated, said, That their mutable Minds fraught with Infidelity, would never contain themselves within the bounds of Loyalty, but find occasion to commit some fouler Treason than they had before. Whereunto Solyman straining his Voice a little as one somewhat moved, most honourably replied, Can any thing (said he) happen unto thee in thy life better or more honourable, than if by this kindnes thine Enemies shall be of all Men accounted Ingrateful, that is to say, Men noted with eternal Infamy, when as in thy self the commendation of a good and courteous Prince shall for ever remain? And lo not long after, leaving the gold of Winter then approaching, dangerous for his Beasts for Carriage, especially his Camels, bred and brought up in the hot Countries of Asia; he set forward to Belgrade, and to travelling through Thracia, returned to Constantinople.

All this while that Solyman thus raged in Hungary and Austria; Charles the Emperor lately reconciled to Clement the seventh of that Name, then Bishop of Rome, with a strong Army besieged Florence, by his Lieutenant Davallus, (who might have done much against the Turks, if he had been so well employed) labouring by all means to repress the liberty of the Citizens, whereunto they had but a little before aspired, and to bring them again under the subjection of the Family of Medicea, whereof Clement was the chief. Which thing with much ado he brought to pass, revelling Alexander the Bishops Nephew in the Dukedom of Florence, and afterward giving him his bafe Daughter in Marriage; forgetting his Brother Ferdinand in the mean time, thrust out of the Kingdom of Hungary by Solyman, and the Dukedom of Austria waited by the Turks, with the City of Vienna in danger to have been lost. Which common calamities might well have moved both the Emperor and the Bishop, to have had more regard of, than by oppressing the liberty of one free City, to seek how to serve their own private respects.

The year following, which was 1530, Solyman with great Solemnity and Triumph, after the Turkish manner, Circumcised three of his Sons, Mustafa, Muhamet, and Selymus, at Constantinople.

Solyman hardly digesting the dishonour he had before received at Vienna, and oftentimes solicited by King John, for aid against Ferdinand, who with greater stomach than power could, not continually to molest him; but most of all prick forward with the insatiable desire of enlarging his Empire, after the manner of the Ottoman Kings, accounting his Neighbour Princes always his Enemies, and their Dominions the objects of his Victories, and spoil for his Soldiers; raised such an Army, as for the greatness thereof might worthily have been a terror unto the World; not so much purposing the protection of King John, which he in this more pretended; neither the Siege of Vienna, as was commonly bruted; as the conquering of Austria, Carinthia, Croatia, Styria, and the rest of King Ferdinand's Dominions, and so afterwards of all Germany. For the accomplishment whereof, he had in his immoderate desire prefixed unto himself the space of three years, which the great Monarchs of Rome could not perform in more than so many Hundreds. It was commonly reported, that the proud Tyrant was many times fain, That whatsoever belonged unto the Empire of Rome, was of right his, forasmuch as he was rightfully possessed both of the Imperial Seat and Scepter of Constantinople the Great, Commander of the World, which his great Grandfather Mahomet had by law of Arms won from Constantinople the late Christian Emperor, whom he flew at Constantinople. And therefore both in his common talk and writings, as oft as he had occasion to make any mention of Charles the Emperor, he would proudly, and as it were in disdain term him by the name of the King of Spain, but never by the name of Emperor.

The discord of the Christian Princes, and the great troubles even then arising in Germany about matters of Religion, did not a little encourage the barbarous Tyrant to take in hand this great expedition. King Ferdinand certainly advertised, that Solyman was in person himself setting forward with his huge Army, sent unto him three Embassadors; whereof Leonardus Neghera, a noble Gentleman, well learned and skilful in divers Languages, was chief, with rich Presents, and reasonable offers to entreat with him for Peace. Who meeting him upon the borders of Servia, were by him courteously received, and patiently heard; yet obtained of him no other answer, but that they should follow his Camp, and attend his further pleasure. The report whereof brought a general fear upon all Germany, but especially them of Austria, in whose fresh remembrance as yet remained the bleeding Wounds of their Country, their Brethren and Friends slain, their Wives and Children led away into Captivity, their Goods and Castles lost, their Houses and Fields burnt, and thousands of other grievous calamities which they had endured in the late Invasion of the Turks. Charles the Emperor had in very good time a little before, for a while well appealed the disension then arising in Germany about matters of Religion; putting them in hope of a free and general Council to be holden for the deciding of all such matters; and in a great Assembly of the States of the Empire to be holden at Ratisbon, to pursue the greatness of the imminent danger, to put an Enemy threatening unto them all the calamities of War, with the manifold mischiefs like to ensue, if they should in so unfruitful fall at variance amongst themselves; offering with great resolution, to go in person himself with all his old expert Soldiers, in defence of the common Christian cause; so much prevailed with the Princes of the Empire, and the Embassadors of the free States, that they highly commended his forwardness, and all other matters for that time set apart, agreed all with one consent, at a prefixed day to send unto Vienna such warlike Forces as they had in any time before set forth for the defence of the Christian Religion, and the Majesty of the Empire. Whereupon he wrote unto Aloisius Vastius (his Lieutenant General in Italy, and one of the greatest Captains of that age) that he should without delay call together the old Captains, and to levy so many Companies of Harquebusers as they possibly could; and with them and the Spanish Soldiers to repair forthwith unto him into Austria. He also employed Andrew Auria his Admiral, that he should with like diligence rig up a strong Fleet of Gallies and Merchants Ships, and to go against the Turks Navy into Gracia. At the same time he sent for his noble Horsemen out of Burgundy and the Low-Countries, and many noble Gentlemen and old Soldiers out of Spain; for the guard of his own person he entertained twelve thousand Germans, such as had longest served in his Wars in Italy, over whom commanded Maximilian Herberstein and Tamsius, both famous Captains. At the same time Clement the seventh then Bishop of Rome, although his Coeffers were greatly emptied by the late Florentine Wars, which had cost him ten hundred thousand Ducats; yet to make some show of his devotion to so dangerous a time, with the great good will he bare unto the Emperor; after he had with grievous exaction extorted from the Clergy a great mass of Money (whereunto his rich Cardinals contributed nothing, as if it had been a thing utterly unlawful for them, in so good a cause to have abated any jot of their pontifical shew in the Court of Rome) sent the young Cardinal Hippolitus Medices his Nephew, being then about twenty years of age, a Man indeed fit for the Wars than for the Church, as his Legate unto the Emperor, accompanied with more good Captains than Clergy-men, and his Coeffers well stuffed with Treasure, whose coming to Ratisbon was unto the Emperor and the Germans very welcome; for besides that he was a young Gentleman of very comely Personage, and exceeding Bountiful, he entertained for those Wars (besides the Company he brought with him) eight thousand Hungarian Horsemen, of all others best acquainted with the Turkish Wars.

King John understanding, that the foremost Strigoniun of Solymani great Army were come as far as Segyer from King Ferdinand such Towns as he yet held in Hungary; wherefore he sent Aloisius Gritti (whom Solyman had left as a helper for his Estate) to besiege Strigoniun, which is a City of Hungarian situate upon the side of Danubius, about thirty Miles from Buda, the Castle thereof was at that time holden with a strong Garrison of King Ferdinand; whereunto for all that Gritti laid such hard Siege both by the River and by Land, that the Defendants doubting how they should be able to hold out, especially if Solyman should take that in his way, as it was most like he would; sent for relief to Caccianer a warlike Captain, then Governour of Vienna, and General of all King Ferdinand's Forces; by whose appointment certain small Frigats went down the River of Danubius, from Polissium, well manned; who suddenly falling upon the Turks Fleet (which he kept the River, that nothing could that way possibly be conveyed either in or out of the Castle) should by their unexpected coming open that way. But Gritti having intelligence thereof by certain Hungarians, which thought they served King Ferdinand, made no great account to give sometime to that one part, sometime to the other, as best fitted their purpose; presently resolved to send his Fleet up the River, and by his sudden coming to oppress his Enemies, in like sort as they had thought to have done him. And the more to encourage his Soldiers, he promised great rewards to all such as should perform any extraordinary piece of service in that Action; and so having thoroughly furnished all his Fleet with good soldiers, busked with Turkish Archers, sent them up the River to seek their Enemies; who fearing no such matter, as Men furnished with the same mischief they had prepared for others, were at the first exceedingly dismayed; yet considering that they were reasonably well provided for their coming (although they yet wanted such help as Caccianer had appointed to send them) they thought it a great shame to flee, and therefore putting themselves in order of Battle, came down the River; and with great courage encountered their Enemy. There began a sharp and cruel Fight, many being slain and wounded on both sides; but at last they of Polissium not able longer to endure the deadly thro of their Enemies, and especially of the Turkish Archers, (who with their Arrows sore galled both the Soldiers and the Mariners) they turned their backs and fled; in which Fight of sixty Frigats which came down from Polissium, only thirteen escaped, with Corporals and Gentlemen, all the rest being either sunk in the Fight, or else taken by the Enemy, being run ashore and forborne by the Polissians, trusting more unto their Legsy Land, than their Oars by Water.

B:ides

Besides this loss of the Frigates, there was slain of the Poffianians almost five hundred. After this Victory, Gritius hoping that they in the Castle of Sirigium, despairing now of relief, and fearing the coming of Solyman, would not long hold out, left off their battering of the Castle, (wherewith he perceived he little prevailed) purposing by lying still, and keeping them in the Castle from all relief, to enforce them in time to forsake the place. Thus whilst the divided Hungarians by their own hands inconsiderately fought one another's destruction, with the ruin of their Country; Solyman the great Enemy of all Christians was ready 'at their backs to devour both the one and the other, as in few years after he did.

Much about this time the old Spanish Souldiers in Italy, drawn together by Vasius, as the Emperor had before commanded, were come to the Alpes. In this Camp, of one sort of Men and other, was above twenty thousand, whereof almost the third part was not serviceable; for the old Souldiers enriched with the long Wars in Italy, and the spoil of the rich Country of Lombardy, wherein they had of late been Bilitied, brought with them all their old gotten spoils and subsistence, not forgetting so much as their Women, and whatsoever else served their pleasure; for carriage whereof they drew after them a great multitude of Carriages and unnecessary People, all which served for no other use but for the Souldiers pleasure, and to consume Vasius. Which their licentious wantonness Vasius desiring to reform, gave strict commandment through all the Camp, That they should leave behind them all such unnecessary Baggage, and appointed what Carriages should suffice for every Company. Whereat the Souldiers began at the first to murmur, and presently after to arise up in Mutiny; for many of the Captains being rich, and diliking of that long and dangerous expedition, covertly incited the common Souldiers to cry out upon Vasius the General, for making them already die. Which thing once put into their heads, and the matter fell on foot, quickly grew to that height, that they all with one voice said flatly, That they would go no further before they had received their Pay. Vasius although he well perceived that tumult to be raised by some of his Enemies, which fought thereby to lighten his credit, was glad for all that for the present to dissemble the matter, and yielding to the necessity of the time, to content the mutinous Souldiers with one months Pay, promising them their full contentment, at such time as they should come unto the Emperor; and so when he had with much ado appeased that Tumult, he set forward into Germany.

Immediately after the Spaniards followed the Italians, who with few cheerfulness offered themselves to that service, that every Captain brought with him twice so many in his Company as was expected; so that Vasius (who before doubtful for their forwardness in so dangerous a War, especially in the aid of the Germans, of whom they had in the late Wars received great harms, had by great and earnest persuasions induced divers of the Nobility, and others of the better sort, to enter into that honourable Action, in hope that they would draw after them great numbers of their Friends and Tenants, (as indeed they did) was now glad to send back again many of the common Souldiers, by reason of the multitude; and also to his great discredit, and the offence of many, full force against his will to displace most part of those forward Gentlemen, whom he had but a little before made Captains, who to their no small charge had gallantly furnished themselves according to their degrees and places; for the Emperor had then appointed what number of Italians he should bring; and also given commandment, That rejecting all self, he should commit the leading of them only to those old expert Captains, of whose valour and discretion he had before had good experience. There were Martius Columna, Petrus Maria Rabus, Philippus Torriellus, Johannes Baptista Capisalus, Fabritius Maromaldus, Yppolitus Scipianus, and Camillus Columna, being all Men of great worth, and approved faith towards the Emperor.

In these Italian Companies were fourteen thousand select Footmen, beside many other brave Men who voluntarily resorted from divers places to Vicenza. After these Footmen followed Ferdinand Gonzaga with two thousand Horsemen, and certain Troops of Grecians and Spaniards, and with them came many noble Gentlemen out of all parts of Italy, who had before been great Commanders, but now served as private Gentlemen voluntarily without charge or pay; accounting it a great shame to tarry at home as Cowards, and not to be present in that religious War.

The Emperor also about the same time having taken view of his Horsemen come out of the Low-Countries most excellently appointed, and Shipping his great Ordnance, whereof he had bought great store at Nuremberg, departed down the River from Ratisbon to Regen, the River of Danubius nearest carried by many Vessels and Souldiers since the time of the great Roman Emperors, as it did at that present; and yet besides them which went down the River by Shipping, the pleasant Banks on both sides were filled with great Companies of Horsemen and Footmen passing all along the River under their Colours, with their Drums and Trumpets sounding, which altogether made the most glorious shew that a Man could well behold upon earth.

In the mean while, Solyman in six and fifty days march came to Belgrade, thrust over the great River Savus by Bridges made in divers places, an infinite number of his Horsemen into Hungary, and leaving Danubius on the right hand, turning a little upon the left, marched directly towards the rich Country of Sirria, called in ancient time Valeria, and now Siermark. By the way as he went he came to the little Town of Ganza, which one Nicholas Jurischitz (a Man of an invincible Courage) kept with a small Garrison of his own. This Town standeth in a Plain not far from the City of Sabaria, built square, and but of a small compass, not very strongly walled, a poor obscure town, never famous till now by the great dishonour that the Turkish Emperor Solyman there received. After the chief Baffa (who for absolutely commanded among the Turks, as if Solyman had received him into the fellowship of the Empire with himself) was very desirous to save this Captain Nicholas, for that he knew him to be a Man of great Courage, and was familiarly acquainted with him at such time as he lay Embassador at Constantinople; wherefore he attempted first gentle persuasions and large offers, and afterwards by most terrible threats, to induce him to yield the Town to Solyman. But finding him so resolutely set down, that he was neither by fair nor foul means, but only by force to be removed out of his Town; he inclosed the same round about with the huge Army of the Turks, and by Mines overthrow the Walls in three places. Which sudden breach whilst the Garrison Souldiers most valiantly defended against the furious Assault of the Janizaries on the South side of the Town, the Baffa planting his Field-pieces upon the Hills on the North side, did from thence grievously annoy the Defendants; who fiercely assailed by their Enemies before, and beaten with the great Ordnance behind, were grievously distressed. Wherewith the worthy Governour somewhat troubled, though not much discouraged, suddenly of Timber and Boords raised up a Curtain twelve foot high, at the backs of his Souldiers, wherewith they were covered from the sight of their Enemies, that they could not make any certain shot at them, but only at that Curtain at all adventures, not doing any thing to great harm as before; and with desperate and restless labour, in despite of all the Turks great power, repaired the Breaches, in as strong manner as at the first. In the mean time two hundred of the Turks Horsemen fraying from the Camp, and seeking after Booty into the Country as far as Nesbitz, were by the Hungarian Horsemen intercepted, and all slain or taken; whose heads the Hungarians brought to Vicenza, and the more to encourage the Souldiers which daily repaired thither, in token of good luck for them upon stakes upon the Walls of the City. Then was it certainly known of the Prisoners, that Solyman had in his Camp five hundred thousand Men, and three hundred Field-pieces, which were not of greater weight than a Camel might well carry one of them, being taken from the Carriage for why, Solyman purposing by destroying the Country before him, to draw the Emperor unto Battle; had (as they said) brought no greater pieces of Battery with him. Which report of the Prisoners was also confirmed by the Embassadors of King Ferdinand, whom Solyman gave leave to depart at Ganza, giving to every one of them to spend his money and buy the power of Letters unto the Emperor and King Ferdinand his Brother; wherein proudly usurping the Titles of many Kingdoms, he most insolently wrote himself Lord and Sovereign of almost all Countries and Nations. But the effect thereof was, That he was come into Hungary, to revenge the wrongs which they had done unto King John his Friend and Vassal, and would with Fire and Sword enter their Countries, and by the power of God and his great Prophet Mahomet, the favourers of just quarrels, give them Battle, if they durst meet him; wherefore if they would as valiant and courageous Princes meet him in the Field, he would in one Battle end that quarrel with them, and in reward of the Victory either win or lose the Empire of the World. When Solyman had thus a great while lain at the Siege of Ganza, and thereto given divers sharp Assaults, being still with great loss and dishonour repulsed, he in the space of four days cast up near unto the Town-Ditch two great Mounts of Faggots and Earth, as if they had been two great Mountains, of such height, that they overtopped not the Walls only, but even the highest Towers in the Town (by which wonderful work the greatness of the Turks Army might easily be conjectured.) one of these great Mounts he cast up directly against the face of the Town; and the other at a corner of the same, to flanker along the Wall from whence he did with his shot not only beat them which appeared upon the Walls for the defence thereof, but them also which upon occasion went too and fro in the Streets. These Mounts being with incredible celerity brought to perfection, the Town-Ditch filled up, and many of the Defendants either slain or wounded upon the Walls, the Turks gave a most furious Assault at the place which was before shaken of the Mine; against whom the valiant Captain, as need was in that extrem danger, opposed all the strength he had left. But the Turks fill pressing on with their infinite multitude, were got up to the top of the Walls with eight Engines, from whence they had repulsed the Defendants; which being all either wounded or wearied, throwed themselves under the defence of their Penthouses, being neither able nor of courage to make further resistance, so that the Walls were now abandoned, and the Town there left without Defendants; when suddenly such a great clamor was made by the loud cries and lamentation of the Women and Children and other fearful People, that the Turks which had recovered the top of the Walls, strucken with a sudden fear, thinking the Town to have been full of Souldiers, stood as Men astonished and dismayed, whereupon the Defendants began again to take courage, and to they themselves; at whose sight the Turks possessed with a needless fear, forsook the Wall, and could not by any persuasions or threats of their Captains be brought on again to the Assault. The Town was that day in all Mens judgments defended by the mighty power of God, and not by the strength of Man. It grieved the proud Tyrant above measure, that so safe a Town should so long hold out against his power, so that oftentimes in his rage he would threaten to rake it down to the ground, and not to leave any sign thereof remaining; which he would undoubtedly have in time performed, had not Abraham the great Baffa (by whose counsel he was altogether directed) otherwise perswaded him; who waiting a fit time, when his choler was past, told him, that it was not worth his name and greatness to spend his money and time to assault a Town of no importance, by raising whereof he should neither get honour nor profit; for why, no Man would marvel, if he with his puissant Army should take so small a thing, especially by long Siege, whereby the strongest places are enforced to yield; and when he had so taken it, it would be accounted a greater honour for so little a Town to have holden out so long, than for him to have with so great forces in long time constrained it; but if it should otherwise fall out, as the chances of War are uncertain, that he should by any occasion be constrained to leave it, he should thereby get no small dishonour; wherefore it were more wisdom to spare his Souldiers labour in so small a matter, whereof he was not to expect either honour or profit, and for to reserve them for his greater designs, and not vainly to spend his forces and time in besieging of so safe a Village, from whence he might now depart with less dishonour than he could afterwards, when he had proved the uttermost of his forces, and yet in the end glad peradventure to forsake it; wherefore it were more for his honour to raise his Siege, and calling the Governour of the Town unto him, to give him the Town as it were in bounty, than to spend so many good Men as he must needs cast away in the winning of it by force; with these and like reasons the Baffa prevailed so much with Solyman, that Nicholas the worthy Governour of the Town was by a Herald at Arms sent for to come to the great Baffa, Solyman disdaining (as it should seem) to speak with him himself. The Governour being sent for, though he was grievously wounded, and in small hope of life, yet stoutly refused to come to any parley, except he were first well assured both of his conduct, and good hostages for the safety of his person, and that nothing should be exacted of him, not besting his Religion and Honour; which stout answer caused Solyman and the Baffa to think, that his strength was not yet so weakened; but that he was still able to hold out the Siege; and thereupon, that he required for his safety was forthwith granted, and two Men of great account sent for hostages for him into the City with Solyman's safe conduct. Which being received, the Governour went forth, and was by Abraham the great Baffa honourably received into the Camp, and commanded to sit down by him in his Tent; where he was by him first by the way of courtesy demanded, whether he had recovered his old infirmity; whereunto he was troubled at such time as he was sent Embassador unto Solyman at Constantinople. After that, whether the wounds he had received in the last Assault, were dangerous or not? But last of all, and that which most concerned the matter, upon what hope he alone had so long and so obstinately withstood the mighty Sultan Solyman, when as all his Neighbours round about him had so willingly submitted themselves? saying further, That he marvelled much why he repented any confidence in the lingering King Ferdinand. Whereunto the Governour modestly answered, That he was (thanks be to God) well delivered of his old Difcase, and that his wounds were without danger; but as concerning his holding out, he said, that he for his great Wisdom knew, that it was the duty of a good Soldier valiantly to withstand his Enemies, and not to be troubled with any evil hap, or discouraged with any chance of War; as for himself, he said, when Mans help failed, he had repented his full trust in God, by whose power he had been hitherto preserved, which as he well hoped should never fail him at his need; and that King Ferdinand was not so far off, but that he would before it were long be there present with a great Army; wherefore he did not greatly marvel, that he was not relieved before that time, forasmuch as many lets and occasions might chance which might hinder the Kings purpose, considering, that fortune always by nature uncertain, was in nothing more like unto herself in her unconquancy, than in martial Affairs. The Baffa wondering at the invincible courage of the Governour, said, That although the great Emperor Solyman might now at his pleasure utterly destroy the Town, with all that therein was, yet being by nature of a most honourable and mild disposition, and a great lover of valiant and courageous Men, had commanded him in his name to give him that Town, and the lives of all them that were in it, as a reward for his valour; whether in the defence thereof; yet so that he should swear Obedience unto him, and receive some few Turks into the Town, in token that he had yielded the same. The politic Governour knowing that of eight hundred valiant Soldiers, he had scarcely a third part left, and them also fore weakened with wounds and want of rest, thought it necessary to make his Peace in the best he could; for what could have happened unto him more withlily, than with his Honour to keep the Town till, and with the loss of a few pleasing words to deliver himself, with so many of his Friends, from extreme fear and peril? And so in all his talk shewing no sign of fear, and with great words setting forth the strength of his Garrison (which was indeed brought to an extreme weakness) said he was ready at the first to have yielded up the Town, for the old acquaintance he had with him, at Constantinople, but was always lured by the Germans and Spaniards which were there in Garrison, fierce and cruel Soldiers, whose hard hearts were (as he said) hardly intreated to suffer him at that time to come out of the City into the Camp; wherefore he could promise to a be Friend to all such, Turks as should pass that way, and to relieve them with such things as his wasted Country could afford; and further in token of his submission, to let up one of Solyman's Engines in the chief Tower of the City; but as for receiving any Turks into Garrison, in token that he had yielded up the Town, he was willing to do, but that he was greatly afraid they should be evil entreated by the Germans and Spaniards, who dearly hated the Turks; whereof it was to be thought, that new Wars would soon arise. In conclusion, he so cunningly used the matter, that the great Baffa was contented with this small token of submission, that he should receive in at one of the Gates of the City, one of Solyman's Captains with ten Janizaries, which being done accordingly, and they courteously for a while entertained and again dismissed, the great Baffa held himself with that simple submission; well contented; when as the Governour had neither German nor Spaniard as then in Garrison. So when Solyman had with his great Army laid at the Siege of Gumza by the force of twenty eight days, and in that time to his great loss assaulted the same thirteen times, he rose with his Army, glad of a little fained submission for the safeguard of his honour; and leaving Vienna on the right hand, whither most part of the Christian Army was assembled, took the way on the left into Carinthia, and so came to the River Danube, and from thence to the City Gratia. This turning of Solyman out of the way from Vienna, where he knew his Enemies lay, put the hearts of the minds of the Christians, which they had before not without cause conceived, in some such, that he but a little before feared as a Prince of great pride and power, shamefully flunked at the little Town of Gumza, and now shunning his Enemies at Vienna, began to grow into contempt as if he had been running away for fear. Which disgrace the Turks fought by divers excuses to cover, as that the strong City of Nesfat lay betwixt him and Vienna, which could neither without much difficulty be taken, nor danger left Enemy behind him; besides that, Winter began to approach, which caused him (as the Turks gave it out) to content himself with the spoil of the rich Countries betwixt the Rivers of Savus and Dravus, and so in good time to return again to Belgrade. But they which were to see farther into the matter, were of opinion, That Solyman understanding by his espials, and secret advertisement from his Friends, that the Princes of Germany had with one consent joined their Forces with the Emperors, brought out of Italy, Spain, and the Low-Countries, which at his setting forth he least feared, and that the Christian Army in number great, consisted not of raw Soldiers, but for the most part of such as had been trained up in Wars; Men both for courage and skill nothing inferior to his Janizaries and best Men of War; chose rather to take the spoil of the Country, at home, might with safety, than to adventure his Person and State to the hazard of a most doubtful and dangerous Battle.

Whilst these things were in doing, Michael-Ogli by the commandment of Solyman, sent Cafon with fifteen thousand of his voluntary Horsemen (who in Solyman's expedition against Vienna, had run through the Country of Austria as far as Lynx) charging him without stay to spoil all the Country far and near which lieth between

Danubius and the Alpes, thereby to learn what he could of the state and strength of the Emperors Camp; and by doing all the harms he could possibly, to leave a most lamentable remembrance of the Turks being in Austria. Cafon was of himself forward enough, and desirous of the spoil; but so much the more, for that he was by the former Road into that Country become both famous and rich; wherefore dividing his Horsemen into three Companies not far distant one from another, he suddenly oppressed an infinite multitude of all sorts of People in the Fields and Country Villages as he went; all which he either slew without mercy, or carried away as miserable Prisoners. Thousands of Men and Women tied together in Chains and Ropes, were by the cruel Turks enforced to run as fast as their Horses; the Country Villages all burnt down to the ground, and in them the poor Children of the Christians, whose Parents were either slain or carried away Captives; so that all the Country every way almost for the space of a hundred and fifty Miles, was covered with Smoke and Fire, within three Miles of Lynx; where King Ferdinand then lying, was glad to get himself farther off to Strabingia, where his Brother Charles the Emperor lay. This cruel Turk according to his charge, having with Fire and Sword without compassion wrought all the Wo he could possibly upon the poor Christians, and now loaded with the spoil of the Country and multitude of Prisoners, began to return the same way he came, thinking to find Solyman either at the Siege of Gumza, where he left him, or nearer hand at Nesfat coming towards Vienna. But he as is aforesaid, riling with small honour from Gumza, and fearing the power of the Christians, was quite gone another way as far as Gratia, the Metropolitical City of Stiria, standing upon the River of Mura; which turned to the utter destruction of Cafon and all his followers; for as soon as it was perceived by the burning of the Country all about, that the Turks were come near to Lynx, the Christian Captains with their Companies went out of the Camp, some one way, some another, as was thought most convenient for the meeting with these mischievous Turks, which never rested in one place; wherein they used such diligence in taking the passages, that it was not possible they should escape unfought withal. Four Companies of Spanish and Italian Horsemen under the leading of Lewis Cove a valiant Captain, first lighting upon them in a Valley near unto Nesfat, and desperately charging them, were by the Turks slain. But some persons were of opinion how he was on every side laid by the Christians in the Vallies betwixt Nesfat, Sabaria, and Veprinum, the night following with more than barbarous Cruelty slew four thousand of the Christians he had before taken Prisoners, because he should not be hindered by them in his flight; and dividing his Army into two parts, about midnight began to set forward, using the benefit of the night to have escaped from his Enemies out of these Vallies wherein he was enclosed. One part of this Army led by Feriz taking the way Southward, did with incredible labour cut a way through the thick and overgrown Woods (a thing thought altogether impossible) and to with little or no loss came to Solyman into Stiria. Cafon with the other part of the Army breaking out of the Valley of Strabingia, chanced upon the Palatine (General of the Forces sent from the German Princes) who with ten thousand Footmen and two thousand Horsemen, and certain Field-pieces brake the Battel of the Turks, and slew them as great number; In which conflict Cafon his chief Ensign was taken. He fighting most valiantly in the reward to give others time to escape, was himself there slain; whose gallant Head-piece presented afterwards to the Emperor, confirmed the report of his death. They which escaped from the Palatine, in their flight fell into the hands of Lewis, and the Marquis of Brandenburg, by whom they were slain like Beasts. The Hungarian Horsemen led by Valentinus Turczan, lighting upon them which fled from Lewis and the Marquis, had the killing of them for the space of seven Miles; and of all others did upon them the cruellest execution, following them hard at the heels with their fresh Horses, and fiercely insulting upon them in their own Language. Those few dispersed Turks which escaped the fury of the Hungarians, fell into the Hands of the Country People about Veprinum and the Lake of Bulaton, which came out on every side in hope of spoil, who shewed them small favour; so that of eight thousand which were with Cafon, it was thought not one returned to Solyman.

The Emperor understanding that Solyman was gone as far as Gratia in Stiria, called his chief Captains together into the Castle of Lynx, to know their opinions, whether it were best to follow the Enemy into Stiria or not. The Cities of Lynx, Gratia, and Vienna, are situate almost in form of a Triangle; but from Lynx to Gratia is three good days journey of bad rough way by Horse. Some said it was best to fight with the Turks in that uneven Mountain Country, where the Turks chief strength consisting in the multitude of his Horsemen, should stand him in small stead, but should be enforced to try the Battle with his Footmen, wherein he was inferior to the Christians. This Counsel although it had in it many difficulties, yet for that it proceeded from the most approved Captains, it moved the Emperor, that he presently sent Antonius a Spaniard (the most famous Captain Antonius Leva his Lieutenant) to take view of that passage; who shortly after returned again to Lynx, bringing word that all the Country as he went was desolate and for fear, forsaken of the Inhabitants; but concerning the place of the Enemies above, he could learn no certainty. Whereupon it was by general consent concluded, that they should all go to Vienna, whither all the strength of the Germans was already assembled, there to take a general view of the Army, and to give the Enemy Battle if he should again return. Some were of great Courage which openly disliked of that going to Vienna; saying, that the Emperor should rather in that distress of the Provinces of Stiria and Carinthia pursue his Enemy, than turn out of the way to Vienna. But others of greater judgment, whose opinion prevailed, said, It was one thing to invade, and another thing to defend; so that the Emperor might with honour enough encompass himself in the Fields of Vienna, and from thence to expect and deride the base expedition and vain boasts of his proud Enemy, who a far off challenged him into the Field, and then like a Coward durst not come near him.

The Emperor coming to Vienna, and taking a general view of the Army, found therein two hundred and sixty thousand Men, whereof ninety thousand Footmen, and thirty thousand Horsemen were accounted the expert Soldiers; and of them many whole Companies and Bands of such as had before been Generals, Captains, Lieunants, Antients, or other Officers and Men of Mark in other Armies, and now were content to serve as private Men. It was thought that for many worthy Captains and valiant Soldiers, were never before in the memory of Man assembled together into one Camp; for the Prince and free Cities had not sent thither common Soldiers, but their chosen and approved Men; so living as it were amongst themselves, who should have been as the Scythians and Arabs, who came from the River of Vipula to the Alpi, and from the Ocean to the Alpei, was by the Prince of the Empire and free Cities either sent thither, or of themselves voluntarily came thither. A thing never before heard of, that all Germany should as it were with one consent, be glad to take up Arms for their common safety, in defence of their honour and liberty; especially against a People brought out of the furthest parts of Africa and Egypt, who were the greatest number of Spaniards, Italians, and Burgundians, the Bohemian Camp lay not far off, strengthened with them of Silicia and Moravia. There were also some Troops of Polonian Horsemen, not sent thither by public Authority, but serving as voluntary Men; King Sigismund winning thence, who as he was careful not rashly to break the League he had made with Solymam; so left them to the advantage of the Christian common cause, by the example of which he gave place for such of his Subjects as would (as if it had been without his knowledge) to shew their Valour in the most honourable War.

*The Order
of the Christian Army*

The Christian Army ready to receive the Enemy, lay in a great Field near unto Vienne, in this Order; Three great Squadrons of Pikemen, standing one Squadron a great way distant from another, were to place againſt the Enemy with like and equal Front, that all the Horſemen divided into two parts, might well be received into the great ſpaces betwixt the three Squadrons; ſo it was not thought convenient to oppoſe fo many Squadrons of Horſemen in open Field without ſome advantage. The third Squadron ſtood before the Footmen, the Turks Horſemen, the third thouſand of the Turks Horſemen. The ſwinging of the Horſemen was led by the Emperor himſelf, and the left by King Ferdinand. Before and behind, and on every ſide of the three Squadrons of Pikes, ſtanding in thoſe places which were left open for the Horſemen, about thirty paces off, were placed twenty thouſand nimble Harquebuſiers ranged in length, and but five in a file, ſo that they might be ſufficiently directed the ſecond, and after them the third, and to the right ready and orderly coming on fight, might deliver their Bullets upon their Enemies; neither was it thought any diſadvantage to place them to this, for that if they found themſelves by the Enemies oppreſſed, they might eaſily retire amongſt the Pikes, ſtanding faſt at hand. Before the Harquebuſiers was planted the great Ordnance, whereof, the Emperor had ſuch force. He was ſo ſatisfied, that he could therewith ſecurely ſtand, and ſo he was accompanied in his whole Army. Only the Hungarians were well acquainted with the manner of the Turks fight, choſe to lie in the open Field in two great wings, under the leading of their two valiant Captains Valentinus and Paulus. Many noble Gentlemen belonging this goodly Army, were for joy, conceiving a moſt durable hope of Victory, if the proud Enemy durſt with all his might ſtand againſt them. But Solyman, who by all means fought with his ſoldiers, and ſo he ſought to keep the wide and open Fields, continually adverſed both of the Emperors Strength and the manner of his living, got him over the River of Mura, and at Marburg by Bridges which he made on the fuddahn, passed over the great River Dræw. And so he which that Summer held almost all the World in suspense, with the doubtful expectation of the success of that War; having with all that his huge power wherein he threatened the World, done nothing at all worth the remembrance, but was in every place overcome, or else shamefully repulsed; left Solyman the factious way he came, and directly bewixt the Rivers of Scythia, Scythia, to Belgrade, and so to Constantinople; leaving here and there some remembrance of his barbarous cruelty, and fill looking behind him if the Emperor were not at his heels; at such time as a few Dalmatian and Croatian Horsemen did fill purble the tail of his Army. It is reported, that he carried away with him twenty thousand Christians into Captivity, besides many thousands of other Country people slain by the mercilese Turks; but especially Scythia and his Followers; and so to his eternal infamy was twice in the space of a few years driven out of Germany. The Emperor understanding of Solyman's departure, determined with all speed to return into Italy; although King Ferdinand his Brother most carnellly entreated him before his departure, in so fit a time to employ those great Forces against King John, who was the chief of Solyman's mischief, with power to pursue an Army into the Kingdom only out of Buda, but also quite out of the Kingdom of Hungary, wherein he was by Solyman as his Vassal placed. But the Emperor, for that Winter began now to approach, and the Plague was got into the Camp, yea even into his Court, continued in his former purpose of departing into Italy; yet yielding so far unto his Brothers request, as to leave behind him all the Italians, who were with King Ferdinand, and some Forces were thought sufficient for the accomplishment of the Hungarian War.

Over these Italians, one Fabritius Maramulus was by the means of Alphonſus Viſtius appointed General; but no order taken for the payment of their Wages, whereby the Soldiers might be the more encouraged to take in hand that War, and also kept in obedience. Which think at the first much offended the minds of the other Captains; thinking themselves disgraced by the preferment of Maramulus, a Man of no greater account than themselves; but as soon as it was known abroad, the under Captains and Officers of the Bands, led with the craze and favour of their old Captains; said plainly, they would not go into Hungary, unless their King Ferdinand would in person go himself, or else one of the great Counts of the Vefine or Leva were appointed for the General, and the Common Soldiers said flatly, that they would ask leave to depart, except they had three months Pay, which they knew well they should never get of that poor King, already brought unto great wants. Vefine to appease this Mutiny, travelled greatly with his Soldiers, persuading them to remember the faith of Soldiers, and by their constant perseverance to maintain their honour: they had got by their cheat; and telling them, that valiant Soldiers never wanted Pay, furnishing themselves by their Industry with all things necessary from the Enemy. And as for the Leva, their General, they had no just cause to mistake him, being an old Captain of great experience, for courage and policy no inferior to any of the great Commanders, and priced by the Emperors own appointment as a Man most sufficient, whose judgment they ought not in any cafe to diflike. When Vafius had with rife and fuch like reafons well appealed the tumultuous Soldiers, there was gone out of the Camp into Vienne, to take further order for the remedying of all difficulties ; Night the Nurfe of fedition came on, whofe darknefs excluding all modetty and fear, gave further fcope and place unto the mutinous Soldiers infolency. By chance there was at that time brought out of the City into the Camp very counfe, hoary, moulty Bred ; which fome of the Soldiers having bread, and thufing it upon the points of their Spears, fhewed it unto their Fellows in great choler, railing againft King Ferdinand, which in his own Kingdom in the beginning of the War had made no better ufe, but with fuch corrupt and peftilent Bread to feed thefe being Strangers, which were only for his defence. They then to adventure upon their lives. And but a little before, a certain Spaniard, being but a common Soldier, coming into the Generals Tent, and calling the name Bred down at the feet of Vafius, bitterly cursing the Emperor and King Ferdinand, had raifed a wonderful Tumult ; wherefore the Italian Soldiers flocking together out of their Tents, gave many hard Speeches concerning their Pay, their Vituals, and the difficulties of the Hungarian War. There one Titus Marconius of Volaterra, a Man of a troublefome Spirit, but reafonably well fpooken, was by the other Soldiers fer up upon a great heap of Saddles, that he might be the better heard, and by divers feditious Captains requir'd him to fpeak his mind, fo far as he thought might ferve to the fafety and welfare of them all. Wherein he reported that he fpake unto them in this feditious manner as followeth :

And thus the Spaniards (said he) beloved Com-pansions and Fellowes in Arms, as you have heard, go into Italy? And a great hart again return into their native Country? And which I am ashamed to say, at notable Gages the wretched Wives? And we Italians at banished Men fight this Winter with Ice and Snow in Hungary? And thus forth for a most beggerly King, and him also to the Hungarians a Forreigner and meer Stranger, against a natural born Prince, of his Subjects well beloved and strongly backed with the power and wealth of the Turkish Emperour? And that which might fully give any covageous mind under the conduct of Maramaldus, who oftentimes blinded with anger and a hasty cruelty, bade so furiously thrise us through with his sword, that he seemed not more to desire the name of a Captain for his pay, then for the killing and murdering of us unwearied Slaves. Neither can I believe that you, who have oftentimes been Captains and Antients your selves, will be so mad, as to serve under a common Captain, without hope of any Pay, of any Provision, of Victory, or return. Truly it delights me not so much to have come hither for the honour of the Italian Name (even more reckoned of than a Rusli) although I have eleven times served; as it doth thinke day alyme me to see this shameful end of the War, ended before it was well begun. But in Regall Dignity is no shame, nor equity in rewarding the Soldier; for Kings now pay nothing, according to Soldiers only according to their necessities. I love it, this is in maintenance of this that getteth us here, this is in maintenance reparation; all which Peace once by Victory obtained, leaveth their Grace. So smeth it with us at this present (Fellow Soldiers) the Emperour and his Brother King Ferdinand, delivered from the fear of a most dangerous War, to cast themselves of this mastardie of us, seek to thrise us into Hungary at Beas-tialty.

to the slaughter, by the spending of our Blood, hoping to pursue unto themselves Victory, and by the loss of us to take from themselves, though the Turks and Hungarians should use the force of Cannibals, and the Snow of the Alpes. But peradventure you understand not these terrible, no more than you understand what this terrible and bloody Comet, shooting his Beams towards Italy, pretendeth. Verily it is not fatal either to Solymán or Cæsar, but rather threatened unto us death and destruction; for they with like comfort full of safety and discretion, would not consider any way unto their own deaths, but withal without any themselves one from the other, and flung all the death of the World. Wherefore if you are lawful for their, without the knowledge of their Adversities, so notably to provide to keep themselves out of danger, when as on each side half the World cry as a reward of the Victory, shall not we look to ourselves, that we be not thrust thither from whence appeareth no hope of return, but with utter destruction, when as we may do it without offence, and by good right, especially seeing no Pay is offered us. That you see what a goodly end is made of that notable War, wherein only we the Italians, in stead of commendation and reward, reap injury and disgrace; and are peradventure of purple exiled into Hungary, that this flour of Civility being now out of Italy, and sent far out of the West Colonies of Spaniards and Germans may be placed in our hands. Truly it seemeth hard dealing, to be sent out of the way into a barbarous Country, where we shall find all hostility, and no place of refuge to recover us, being distressed. Besides this, we shall also whether we will or no, feel how heavy and intolerable it will be both to our bodies and minds, to endure the miseries of this Winter and dangerous War; and in the mean time, with no small hearts grief imagine what things our Children, our Brethren, our Kinsmen, and our Wives, suffer at home of the Spaniards and Germans, who have contrary Companions, it concerneth us more at this time to have a good forgetful, than valiantly to Fight. The occasion presented unto us for our safety and welfare, standeth upon a fickle point, it must be done without delay, and we must be as swift before that the Spaniards traile up their Baggage; and so preventing the Emperors former Company, come first our selves into Italy; for we shall play but a little to consult upon the matter, Valiantly and our other proud Commanders will presently be here, and our bravest of the Italian Blood, who for their own gain will not stand so long as they are into the fight; and who I know will gain most easily entreat us, and with many subtilties seek to seduce us, by offering us great pay, and whatsoever else we shall require: which will all prove but words. But you, if you be Men, refuse to talk with them, as with your Common Enemies; or rather in revenge of their old injuries kill them. Here waiteth now in this Affliction valiant Men, for courage and integrity of life their letters for, whichben lead you forth, order your Battail, and be ready to follow your courage and forwardness. Wherefore you if you will go forward resolutely, and good fortune use no doubt with you in your help; for the full accomplishment of your desire consists in your help only.

Marchion thus no sooner made an end of this mournful Speech, but the tumultuous Souldiers in every Band began loudly to command and approve the fame, and by and by such a confused noise was heard through all the assembly, as if such a tumult were the discontented vulgar People, ready to rise in Arms; but the Drums preently striking up a March, they made no longer stay, but without delay pluckt up their Ensigns, and forward they go directly towards Naples. In this tumult, in stead of their old Captains.

Captains, which either were not then present, or refused to go with them, they chose others to be their Leaders; who once named by the feditious multitude, might in no case without danger refuse to take the charge upon them, were they never so unwilling. These were Montebellius, Nerius, Melcarius, Sandius, and the two Twins of Milan, called Glaffius, who drew after them eight thousand Souldiers; the rest partly for flame, and partly for fear, flayed fill with Maramidius their new appointed General. When they were thus gone, Vafius and divers other great Companies hearing thereof in the City, posted after them six miles, and at length overtaking them, requested them to stay, and not to dishonour themselves with so foul a Fact; telling them that their Pay was ready for them, and omitting nothing wherewith they might have been moved to stay, mingled their prayers with grievous threats; but they resolutely set down, would neither hear nor stay, but as men enraged with fury and their own guilty Conscience, with stern looks discharged some small Shot upon them. Whilft Vafius would there have stayed the Company, and did what he possibly could by threatening and otherwise, to have terrified their Leaders, and to have brought them back, he was oftentimes in danger to have been slain. In the end he was glad to forsake them, and to return as he came. King Ferdinand by this sudden departure of the Italians, for that time disappointed of all his hope of recovering the Kingdom of Hungary from King John, in great cholour wrote unto his Subjects of Syria and Carinthia, whereby the Italians were to pass, That they should shew them no manner of courtesie in their passage; whereupon ensued great harm on both sides. Yet for all that, these Italians in despite of what could be done, at length recovered Tilaventum in the borders of Italy, where they disbanded themselves, and returned every man to his own dwelling, leaving King Ferdinand unto his own Forces. The Emperor also breaking up his Army at Vienna, and purposing now as before, to return into Italy, appointed Ferdinand Gonzaga to go forthwith with the light Horsemen, with whom also he went himself, after him followed Vafius with the Spaniards; two days after came the Cardinal, whose Train was of all the greatest; last of all followed the mercenary Germans; in which order he returned in safety into Italy.

This was the end of those wonderful Preparations made by the two great Monarchs Solyman and Charles the Fifth, in the year, 1532, which held the World in great suspense with the fearful expectation of some marvelous alteration; and so much the more, for that at the same time appeared a great Blazing-Star by the space of fifteen days. All which for all that, God so appointing, forced to far less harm than was of molt men feared.

Now whilft Charles the Emperor was thus in Arms against Solyman in Austria, Andrew Auria by his appointment, with a Fleet of thirty five tall Ships and forty eight Gallies, wherein he had embarked twenty five thousand good Souldiers well appointed, did in the mean time wonderfully annoy the Turks in Peloponnesus. With this Fleet Auria departing from Messina in Sicilia, and passing along the Coast of Italy, into the Ionium, near unto the Isle of Zacynthus met with Vincentius Capellius the Venetian Admiral, with a Fleet of sixty Gallies, he forth by the Venetians for defence of their Territory who offered unto Auria all possible kindness, but excused himself, that he could not joyne with him in that War against the Common Enemy, by reason of an old League betwixt the Turks and the Venetians, which Solyman had but a little before renewed. So that at that time the Venetians stood as men indifferent betwixt Charles the Emperor and Solyman, offering like kindness to both, but taking part with neither, yet in readiness to fall out with either, if they should by Sea or Land offer any injury to their State; wherein they bare themselves so indifferent, that it was thought, that they at one and the self same instant advertised Auria, That Hymerales the Turks Admiral lay with his Fleet of sixty Gallies well appointed, in the Bay of Ambrosia, where he might easily be surprized; and gave likewise warning to him of the coming of Auria with a stronger Fleet, wishing him in time to provide for his better safety, by retiring his Fleet into some other place of more assurance, which he presently did; for knowing himself too weak, he departed from Ambrosia, to the strong Haven of Calcedo. Which thing with other like, well considered, might give just cause to any Christian heart, to bewail the State of that time, wherein the Christian Princes being either in mortal Wars amongst themselves, or intangled by Solyman with Leagues of no assurance, omitted the fairest opportunity that could have been wished for the abating of the Turks greatness; for if the Venetians joining their Forces with Auria, had in time purified the Turkish Admiral, it was like, that not only all Solyman's Power at Sea had been utterly discomfited; but also molt part of Grecia, mindful of their ancient Empire and Liberty, and then ready to have rebelled, and joynd hands with the Christians, might have been recovered out of the Turkish Thraldom; yea and the Imperial City of Constantinople greatly endangered, few or none being left for the defence thereof, beside young Janizaries and effeminate Eunuchs, the heartless Keepers of the Turks Concubines; Solyman himself being then far off in Hungary, and having drawn with him the greatest strength of his Empire.

Auria taking his leave of the Venetian Admiral, with much Honour done at Sea on both sides; was shortly after advertised, That the Turks Admiral was fled to Calcedo. Wherefore now out of hope to do any good against him, he directed his course to Corone (which is a strong City upon the Coast of Peloponnesus, about twelve miles distant from Modon) with purpose to besiege it; which when he had well viewed, and considered of the strength thereof, he laid Siege thereto both by Sea and Land, battering it most terribly at one time with fourteen great pieces of Artillery by Land, and a hundred and fifty by Sea, so that a more terrible Battery had not been lightly heard of; for all that, the Turks valiantly stood upon their defence, and manfully repulld the Italians, which under the Leading of the Count of Sarav assaulted the City by Land. The Turkish Garrisons lying about in the Country of Peloponnesus, did what they might to have relieved the City; who by the valour of the said Count were discomfited, and Zadares their chief Leader slain; whose Head, with others of the slain Turks, were fet upon Stakes, to the terror of the Defendants.

At length the Turks wearied with Assaults and terrified with the thundering Shot which never ceased, and driven also from their greatest strength towards Sea, by the desperate assault of certain certain resolute Christians, whom they had now full force against their will received as it were into their bosoms; fearing also to want Victual and Powder, if they should longer hold out without any hope of Relief; yielded the City and Cattle to Auria, upon condition that they might in safety depart thence with bag and baggage. Corone thus taken, and a strong Garrison of Spaniards, there placed, and the Christian Greeks which dwelt in the City sworn unto them, Auria put to Sea with his Fleet, and sailing again by Zacynthus, came to Patras another ancient City of Peloponnesus, which he easily took and ransacked; for the Turks distrustful of the strength of the City, had strongly intrenched themselves near unto the Cattle; which place also, together with the Cattle, they in short time yielded to Auria; covenanting, that they, and especially their Wives, might with their Garments only depart in safety into Ætolia; which was by Auria so precisely performed, that when three thousand of them palled along through the Army of the Christians, ranged on both sides, and some of the Souldiers began rudely to handle some of the Women, and to take from them some of their Jewels, he caused them presently, to the terror of others, to be hanged. Auria leaving his Army at Patras, with commandment to follow him by Land, failed along the coast of Peloponnesus, until he came to the Strait of Neapactum, now called Lepanto, which is the entrance into the Gulf of Corinth, passing Peloponnesus from Ætolia, with a Strait somewhat narrower than the Strait of Hellspont. Upon this Strait stood two Castles, the one called Rhium, upon the coast of Peloponnesus, and the other Molyreum in Ætolia, which Basileus had wonderfully fortified, and stored with Ordnance for the keeping of that Strait. Auria threatening all extremity unto the Captain of the Cattle on Peloponnesus side, if he did enforce him to plant his Battery, so certified him, that he without delay yielded unto him the Cattle; covenanting only, That he and his Souldiers might in safety depart thence; which granted, and the Turks departed, Auria gave the spoil of the Cattle unto his Souldiers which came with him by Sea; whereby he so offended the minds of the other Souldiers which came by Land from Patras, that they were about to have forsaken him. The other Cattle upon Ætolia side was not so easily taken, being valiantly defended by a Garrison of old Janizaries, appointed for the keeping thereof. Yet in the end by fury of the Ordnance a breach was made, whereby the Christians forcibly entering, flew three hundred of the old Garrison-Souldiers, not taking any one to mercy; the rest fled into a strong Tower in the midst of the Cattle, where seeing no remedy but that they must needs fall into the hands of their Enemies, they desperately blew up themselves, and the Tower, with a great part of the Cattle, with Gunpowder, in such sort, that it seemed all the Sea coast to have been shaken with an Earthquake; and the Gallies which lay a Bow-shot off, were almost overwhelmed with stones blown out so far off. The great Ordnance taken in this Cattle was valued at 70000 Ducats; whereof certain pieces of a wonderful greatness, with Arabian letters written upon them, were afterwards by Auria brought to Grenos; and in remembrance of the Victory, mounted upon the Bulwark at the mouth of the Haven. All these things thus happily achieved, Auria strongly fortified the City of Corone, storing it both with Munition and plenty of Victual, committing the defence thereof to Mendoza a valiant Spaniard, with a strong Garrison of Spaniards; promising of his own charge to relieve him whenever he should need, if the Emperor should defer to do it. The Strait of Neapactum laid open, Salvatus with the Gallies of Malta scoured all along the Gulf, and on both sides of the Gulf, spoiling and terrifying them even as far as Corinth. Not long after, Winter now approaching, Auria receiving Letters from the Emperor, of Solyman's departure out of Hungary, returned with his Fleet loaded with the spoil of the Turks, to Naples, and so from thence home to Genna.

In the beginning of the Spring following (which was the year, 1533,) it was newly reported that the Turks were coming with a great Fleet towards Peloponnesus; and not long after, Adon ducal Governor of Corone, by Letters advertised Peter of Toledo, Vice-Roy of Naples, That he was both by Sea and Land hardly besieged by the Turks; and that he would to the uttermost of his Power valiantly defend the City, so long as he had any provision of Victual: Wherefore he most earnestly requested, That if the Emperor would have the Town kept, he should in time find him Relief, whereupon the oppressed Grecians taking heart, were like enough to rebel, and to help to expulse the Turks quite out of Peloponnesus. But above, all things he forgot not to crave speedy Aid of Auria, and to put him in mind of the faithful promise he had made to relieve him at his need. Upon this news, Charles the Emperor commanded Auria his Admiral, to rig up a convenient Fleet for that Service, promising forthwith to send unto him twelve Gallies, which he had new built in Spain. He also requested the Knights of Malta to Aid him with their Gallies against that common Enemy. Wherefore Auria having with wonderful celerity rigged up thirty tall Ships, and as many Gallies, came to Naples to take in his Souldiers; there the old Garrisons of the Spaniards, which for want of pay were risen in mutiny against the great Commander and General Vasius and the Vice-Roy, and had rifled the City of Acoris, and done no little harm all about in the Country of Campania, were again pacified by a pay given unto them, and presently embarked for Corone, under the Command of Rodericus Macianus their General; at which time also Federick of Toledo the Vice-Roy's Son, with a Company of brave Gentlemen went aboard, vowing unto the Sacred War that their first Service. The Knights of Malta came thither also with their Gallies. But whilft these things were a doing, Auria to encourage them of Corone, for fear lest they despairing of help, should fall to some hard composition with the Turks, sent Christopher Palovisime a resolute young Gentleman of an invincible courage, with a most swift Gally to Corone; who by daylight passing through the midst of the Turks Fleet, safely recovered the Haven, to the great joy of the besieged Christians; and shortly after when he had well viewed all things he was sent for, with the strength and manner of the Enemies lying, and filling the minds of the Defendants with assured hope of speedy rescue, about noon time of the day he suddenly brake out again through the midst of his Enemies, and as it were miraculously escaped in safety, for all that they could do, although they ceased not to give him chase so long as they were in any hope to have overtaken him. Auria departing from Naples, came to Messina, where he certainly informed of the Enemies force both by Sea and Land with the number of their Gallies, and seeing that the chief hope of relieving of the City con-

fleeted in celerity, stayed not for the Gallies he expected out of Spain; but held on his course towards Greece; for it was told him, that the Enemies Fleet daily increased, by the coming in of the Turkish Pirats, and that Assum-beg (otherwise called the Moor of Alexandria, an arch Pirate) wife called the Moor of Alexandria, whose good directions the Turkish Captains reposed the greatest hope of their Victory. When he was come as far as Zazynthus, he was informed by the Venetians, That Lufius Bassa (or rather Lutius Bassa the Turks great Admiral, and Solyman Brother in law) with Solyman of Acanania, and the Moor (men for their skill at Sea, of great Fame and Reputation) lay before Corone, with eighty Gallies manned by such divers Companies of the old Janizaries; so that it was thought a matter of exceeding peril for him to adventure to relieve the Town, except he took the advantage of some prosperous gale of Wind. Wherefore Auria to have yet more certain knowledge of the Enemies Fleet, sent before him Christopher Palavincin with one Gally, again to view the manner of the Enemies lying; who passing the Promontory of Astiries, saw all the Turks great Fleet lying in very good order before the City; and so returned to Auria, confirming that the Venetians had before reported, and that the Turks Fleet was greatly increased, and lay ready as it should seem to give him battle as soon as he should approach the City. For all that, Auria nothing dismayed with the greatness of the Turks Fleet, made no stay, but still kept on his course, and with a fair gale of Wind passing the Promontory of Astiries, came directly towards Corone. Two great Gallions, of all the Fleet the most War-like Ships, came foremost; whereof the one was Auria's own, which he had built with a wonderful Charge; and the other was of Scitilia. These two great Ships were appointed by Auria to turn a little upon the left hand; and at such time as the Enemy should first forward from the shore, to cast Anchor betwixt both the Fleets; that as occasion should serve, they might as out of two strong Castles, beat the Turks Gallies with their great Ordnance, whereunto they were for that purpose wonderfully stored. Next unto these great Gallions followed the other War-like Ships with full sails; after whom came the Gallies in three Squadrons, whereof Salvoians had the leading of the right Wing, which consisted of the Bishop of Romes Gallies and them of Malta; in the left Wing and near unto the Enemy commanded Antonius Aurias and in the middle was Auria himself. At the first sight of the Christian Fleet, the Turks moved not from the shore, but discharged their Ordnance at them afar off, and then began to fire forward and to draw nearer; especially the Moor, who with greater courage than the rest, assailed the side and the rearward of the Fleet; for the Christians keeping on their course right forth to Corone, and turning nothing to the left hand, as was before appointed, seemed as if they had fled; and so much the more, for that the Gallies in the right Wing, for fear of the Turks great Ordnance, did fetch a great compass farther off into the Sea, and many of the middle Squadron and of the left Wing also, had disorderly thrust themselves in amongst the Ships, although they had received little or no harm of the Enemies great shot.

In this confusion of the Christian Navy, the Moor requested Lutius the Admiral, not to let slip so fair an occasion, wherein the Christian Fleet might easily have been overthrown; but whilst Lutius doth slowly and considerably retire forward, Auria in the mean time had put his Fleet again in order, and with a fair Wind was come to Corone. Two of the Ships by the way falling foul one on another, laid behind, being not able to keep way with the rest; about which all the Turks Gallies presently flockt, and took the lesser of them, killing all the Spaniards they found therein. Out of this they boorded the greater, and with a bloody fight had won the Forecastle and Waist of the Ship; when Auria, accounting it no small dishonour to have his Ships so furnished at his heels, caused all his Gallies to turn again upon the Enemy, to rescue those Ships. The Turks seeing that, and with the Western Wind by little and little fallen down to far with the Ships, that they were come within the danger of the shoot of the Town, began with great stir to forsake the Ships, and to betake themselves to their Oars, and so in manner of flight withdrew themselves. Whom Auria pursued a good way to Modon, thundering in their Poppes with his great shot, which he liberally belovewed amongst them; whilst in the mean time Antonius Aurias came to rescue the two distressed Ships. There the Spaniards which but a little before had hardly maintained their close fights, began now as men revived, to flee themselves, and courageously to make resistance; and they which came with Antonius Aurias to their rescue, entering with wonderful celerity on every side, flew and took 300 Janizaries, which with great courage had endured those Ships, and were there left by the sudden departure of their Fellows. Amongst whom was taken one Poluphus an old Captain of 1000 Janizaries; to whom Auria after he was come to Corone, gave a full Suit of Apparel and a chain of Gold, and so let him at liberty without any ransom, thereby to provoke the Turks to the like kind of courteous dealing with the Christians. Assum-beg the Pirate, and the other Captains of the Turks Fleet, wonderfully blamed Lutius the Admiral, for that he would not then fight with the Christians, when as he was thereto most earnestly requested both by the Captains and Soldiers in general, and had a fair opportunity of Victory offered at such time as the Christians Fleet was disordered; but he excused himself saying, That it was given him in special Charge from Solyman the Emperor, That he should in any case respect the safety of his Navy, and not to come to the hazard of a battle. The Turks which believed the City by Land, upon the approach of the Christian Fleet, forsook their Trenches and fled; at which time Mendoza the Governor fallying out, took great store of Victual and War-like provision which the Turks had for half left behind them. So Auria to his great honour having driven the Turks from Corone both by Sea and Land, furnished the City with store of Corn, Wine, Victual, Powder, and Shot; and committed the defence thereof to Maticians and the Companies of the mutinous Spaniards which he had brought from Naples; comforting the Greeks, and exhorting them, patiently for a while to endure those Calamities of War; telling them that the Emperor would the next Spring make War against the Turks both by Sea and Land in Peloponnesus, and free them from the Turkish bondage. And so imbarcking the old Garrison of Sperdadia, departed from Corone, and came before Modon, where he lay as it were braving the Turks Admiral, hoping thereby to draw him out of that strong Harbor to battle. But when he saw that the Enemy could by no means be allured out of his strength, or assailed as he lay, he departed thence to Coregra, and so back again to Messina in Scitilia.

Within

The Moor of Alexandria well knew, and took by the Coasts of the Venetians.

Within a few days after, Assum-beg the Moor of Alexandria and most famous Pirate, lying in wait for the Merchants Ships of Venice coming out of Syria with Merchandize, by chance met with Hieronymus Canalis upon the Coast of Crete; where in the night time was fought betwixt them a fierce and cruel Battle; wherein of the Moors thirteen Gallies, four were sunk, three taken, and the rest having lost most part of their Rowers, fled to Alexandria. In this Fight were slain three hundred Janizaries which were going to Cairo, and a thousand other Turks; of all them that were taken, there was scarcely one saved, but the Moor himself, who grievously wounded in the Face, for safeguard of his life was glad to discover himself; for the Venetians maintaining their State by Trade and Traffique, do of all other things least favour unto Pyrats. When the Moor had made himself known to Canalis, there was great care taken for the curing of his Wounds, and either of them began with notable diffimulation to excuse the matter to other; saying, That they were both deceived by the likeness of the Gallies, and mistaking of their Friends for Enemies; when as for all that, they knew one another night well. For the Moor said, that he took those Venetian Gallies for to have been part of Auria's his Fleet, and Canalis excused himself, by saying, that he mistook him for Barbarossa, who a few years before had furnished three of the Venetian Gallies. Yet the Venetians doubting how Solyman would take the matter, by their Embassador sought to excuse what was done, as a thing happening by error and mischance; of which excuse Solyman accepted, and said moreover, that Canalis had done well and Soldier-like, to repulse by sea the wrong that was offered him. Three of the Emperors Gallies staying behind the rest of the Fleet, were near unto the Promontory Palimurus, upon the Coast of Apulia, intercepted and carried away by Sinam, famed the Jew, a notable Pyrate of that time also.

The Winter following, the Spaniards and Greeks in Corone began to want Victuals, especially Wine and Flesh; for the Turks had so blocked up the City, that nothing was to be had out of the Country; wherefore the Soldiers requested Maticians their Governor and General to lead them forth to some piece of service against the Enemy, forasmuch as they were not to hope for any relief elsewhere before April, withstanding rather valiantly to die like men in Fight against the Turks, than to languish within those dead Walls for want of Victual. But Maticians mindful of his charge, fought by many reasons to dissuade them from such purpose, shewing them what an offence it were rashly to depart out of the City committed to their custody, which might be unto them dangerous, although they should speed never so well; and that those wants which they rather feared than felt, would well enough be overcome by sparing and patience; and therefore told them plainly, that he was resolved for doing to leave the City for the Emperor, and to endure all hardships, rather than to incur the infamy, That he had forsaken the City, and betrayed his Garrison. Yet for all this the matter was so urged by Didacus Tovarres and Hermifilla, both great Captains; and by the general importunity of the Soldiers, that Maticians was enforced to yield to their desire, and to promise them to go; yet earnestly protesting, that he did it altogether against his Will, rather than to suffer himself to depart, that whereof he had no great hope of success. Amongst other that were so forward in this action, was one Barbarius, a most valiant Greek, who could perfectly speak the Turks Language, and of all others best knew the By-ways and secret passages of the Country; he undertook to be their Guide, and by unknown Waies to bring them unto the Enemies undiscovered in the dead time of the night, when as they feared no such matter. So Maticians commending the custody of the City to Lifianius and Mendefius, with charge that they should suffer no man to go out of the City after his departure, for fear of giving any knowledge unto the Enemy, set forward about ten o'clock, by the night towards Andruffa, Barbarius being his Guide, who flunning the common beaten Waies, brought them by secret and uncouth Paths that night half the way to Andruffa; but upon the rising of the Sun he brought them into a secret woody Valley, where they rested and refreshed themselves all that day, and setting forward at night, came to Andruffa before day. In this Town, which was of no great strength, lay one Caranus, a warlike Captain with three thousand Footmen, whereof the one half were Janizaries; and in the Suburbs lay Acomatus with a thousand chosen Horsemen, with which Garrison the Turks kept all that side of Peloponnesus in awe. Maticians brought by his Guide unto the place where his Enemies lay, went directly to the Town to have furnished it; Hermifilla in the mean time standing fill with certain Companies of Spaniards over against the place where the Horsemen lay. But this could not be done with so great silence, but that some of the Horseboys being awake discovered them by the fire in their Matches; who first awaked the negligent Watchmen, and afterwards raised an Alarm in the Suburbs; whereupon Hermifilla courageously fell upon the Horsemen, being altogether unready, and flew many of them before they could arm themselves, and set fire also upon the Stables wherein the Turks Horses stood, with the rage whereof many of the Turks perished, with their Horses and Armor. Great and terrible was the noise raised upon the fuddain in the Suburbs, but especially of the Horses, which burnt as they stood fast tied in the Stables, or by chance breaking loose, ran up and down with their Tails and Mains on a light fire; by occasion whereof, an Alarm was raised in the Town, and the Turks got to the Walls before the Spaniards could enter. Maticians himself labouring to break in at a Postern, was divers times in the Head with a small Shot, and slain; others near unto him were slain also. The Turks perceiving the small number of their Enemies, sallied out upon them, and enforced them to retire to Hermifilla, who had already made great slaughter amongst the Horsemen, by whose skillful direction, the Spaniards retired in to good order, making many flames, with their Harquebuses all drawn into the Rearward, that such of the Turks as were most forward to pursue them, did by their death cause the rest to make less haste. Acomatus with such of his Horsemen as had escaped the Fire, hastened thither also, bringing with him two hundred Harquebuses, which he had caused his Horsemen rather to take up behind them upon their Horses; but whilst he fought eagerly to be revenged upon his Enemies, and with too much heat pressed on with the foremost, he was shot in the Body with a Bullet and slain. So the Horsemen which had before received a great loss as they lay in their lodgings, accounting it in their good hops that they were not there in the slain, and having now lost their Captain, ceased any further to pursue their Enemies, but returned. The Spaniards and Greeks, although they were wearied both with their long march and evil success, retired still refolome men, ready to fight, and so returned to Corone. Prefently after, the Turkish Garrison removed from Andrussa to Megalopolis, now called Londarium; after whose departure the Christian Soldiers of Corone gathered together and buried the dead bodies of their slain Fellows (which till then lay unburied) and brought back with them the Head of Maccian their late General, which the Turks had there set up upon a long Pole, which they honourably buried at Corone. Not long after, the Plague began to grow hot in Corone, so much the more grievous, for that it came accompanied with many other hard difficulties. For which causes, the Spaniards as men at once enforced with many extremities, imbarbed themselves with all the great Ordnance, and such Greeks as would go with them, in certain Ships which came with Corn out of Sicilia, and so departed, leaving the Town empty for the Turks to come unto.

Corone
besieged by the Spaniards.

It was commonly reported, that the Spaniards left Corone not without the secret consent of the Emperor, which was the rather thought to be so, because that they which forsook the place, received thereby no disgrace, and the Emperor himself had offered to give the Town to Clement Bishop of Rome, the Venetians and the Knights of Malta, who all refused to receive it, as loath to be at so great a charge in keeping a place serving for no greater purpose; the very cause why the Emperor was so willing to part with it. Now Clement the great Bishop had by means of Alofius Gritius made a motion of a Peace to have been concluded for ten years betwixt Solyman and the Christian Princes, and thereupon the Town to have been again delivered unto the Turks; which Peace Solyman was not altogether unwilling to grant, being then wholly bent to invade the Persian King. Ferdinand was also in good hope that his Brother Charles the Emperor, would for the yielding up of that Town have covenanted with the Turk for some great matter for his benefit in Hungary, which as was thought would also have been easily obtained. But whilst the Emperor drawn diversly with the consideration of his honour in keeping it, and of his profit in giving it up, stood too long in revolving, the Town in the mean time was by the Spaniards (their necessity daily increasing) abandoned, and so left to the Turks for nothing.

by his King John.

Solyman now purposing to turn his forces against the Persians, of whom he had in the Frontiers of his Dominions received great hurt, especially in Comagene; renewed the League he had with the Venetians, and some other Christian Princes; but of all other his Affairs with the Christians, he was most careful of the interest he had already gotten in Hungary. For it was reported, that King John his Vassal induced by the continual solicitations of his Subjects, was desirous of Peace with King Ferdinand, upon condition that he might quietly enjoy the Kingdom during his life; and after his decease it to remain to King Ferdinand and his Heirs. Wherefore Solyman, that nothing should be there done in his absence without his knowledge, sent Alofius Gritius the Duke of Venice his Son (of whom we have before spoken) a man both for the honour of his House, the good carriage of himself, and the special commendation of Abraham the chief Bailie, in great credit with him; with Commission as his Lieutenant to be assistant unto King John, in such magnificent force, as that without him the King might conclude nothing in matters of State, concerning either Peace or War, with any other the Christian Princes. With this proud Commission from the grand Seigneur, Gritius entered into Transyl- vania, then a part of the Kingdom of Hungary (much about the same time that Solyman set forward from Constantinople against the Persian) attended upon with seven thousand persons of one sort and other, among whom were Urbanus Batianus, and Jeanus Decia, two famous Hungarian Captains with their Companies, and many of the Turks Janizaries also. At his first coming, to make his Authority the more known, he sent out his proud command unto the great Men and Governors of the Cities of that warlike Province, charging them forthwith to repair unto him to great Solyman's Deputy, authorized by him to hear and determine all the controversies and matters of State concerning the Kingdom of Hungary. At that time Americus Cilius Bishop of Veradiah, a man of great Nobility and Power, widely singularly well qualified, was Vayvod or Governor of Transylvania, an honour next unto the King; he understanding that Gritius was come into his Province, and making himself half to welcome him, as one not greatly moved with his coming, or much regarding the commandment of Solyman; wonderfully offended Gritius, who desired nothing more than at his first entrance to have confirmed the opinion of his Authority in the minds of the Vulgar People by the prett and ready attendance of the Vayvod. But it was commonly bruted, that the stout Bishop upon a Christian Zeal detested the Friendship of the Turks, and could not well brook that they should be too much acquainted in his Province, for fear lest that fruitful Country abounding with Men and Horfes, should by one or other fall into their hands. Gritius was come to Bacovia when he understood by many Messengers, that the Vayvod was coming with a great Train, and lay about ten miles off, encamped with divers gallant Troops of Horfemen, in warlike manner appointed; for the Bishops of Hungary being wonderful rich, were by old custom bound to keep great numbers of Horfemen, which as occasion served they used to bring into the Field against the Turk; accounting it great honour with their religious hands to defend the cause of Religion. But then especially the Nobility of the Country well appointed resorted on every side, on courtesie to honour and contenance their great Bishop and Governor, at whose commandment they were; inasmuch as the Bishops retinue made them of a good Army. Which thing moved Gritius exceedingly, so that he should be enforced contrary to his expectation to party with the Bishop in the open Fields, as with an Enemy in sight of all their Followers. Hereof great envy, a deadly mischief always repining at another mans honours; when as the one swelling with Turkish Pride could not then abide any equal, and the other jealous of his honour, could by no means endure any superior. In such place as he had the Sovereignty of. When these two great men had met together in the open Field, and there dined more like Enemies than Friends, without any shew of friendship or good will; Gritius inwardly chafing at his bare entertainment, covertly threatened to be revenged upon all such as should make to light account of his Authority; and immediately as he departed from the Banquet, taking his Cap from his Head (which was after the Turkish manner made of a high fashion, of rich Sables) and opening it with both his Hands, said, This Cap will not hold two Heads, and therefore it must be fired to one, and so put it on again. Decia, one of the Hungarian Captains, his Followers, who deadly hated the Vayvod (for that he had long time before, for his misdeeds Speech in a great Assembly, given him a blow with his

Fitt) took hold of that Speech of Gritius, as a fit occasion for him to work his revenge: and said, *Your honour maketh a fit comparison, neither can this Province contain two equal Governors or Commanders, nor you ever enjoy your Power and Authority, except you do this day with speed and manly resolution defend both Solyman's credit, and your own. You know not this proud Haughty American will's Pride and Insolency if you but say the word, I will quickly put down; for he hateth Solyman, he regardeth not the King, and of you he maketh no account at all, for why, he aspires unto the Majesty of a King, and faith that the Vayvodship of Transylvania will bestow him a King; for that in this Country Decedebals the Dacian sometimes reigned, whom the warlike Emperor Trajan with all the force of the Roman Empire had subdued. No man can more proudly or arrogantly set himself forth than he, neither more craftily or cunningly disguise to serve his turn. Indeed he hath for fashion sake presented your honour with a few simple Presents, and given you his Hand also, better known for his Falshood than his Faith; to the intent that when you are once past his Country, he may scold and jeer at your Deceit; overly he deadly envious at your Power and Felicity, and grudges in his heart, that you should let down the Laws of Peace and War in Hungary; and whereas he doth manifestly aspire unto a Kingdom, he secretly you above all others, lest you should trouble his designs, about his credit, and chafeth at his insolency. Verily, he that thus maligneth your happiness, and contemneth your Authority, is not to be suffered, but by good reason to be taken away, thereby at this your first entrance to defend the credit of your Commission, and honour of your Name. For nothing is more dangerous than a faithless Companion, and a secret Enemy, especially when you shall leave him at your back behind you; for when he shall, as occasion serves, shew forth his hidden malice, he shall so much the more slyly and desperately endanger your Person. Gritius enraged with his Speech more than before, thought it best to make halt, and to use his Authority to the full; he commanded Decia, and promised him in short time to requite his good will towards him, especially if he would by some notable attempt abate the Bishops Pride. It is reported, that Gritius gave him no other charge, but to take the Bishop that he so might after the Turkish manner have sent him in Chains to Constantinople, and bestowed the honour of the Vayvod upon Hieronymus Lascus the Polonian, who in hope of that honour, used him most proudly. King John, had done unto him great and faithful service, as his Ambassador both unto Solyman, and also unto the French King. But when King John perceived that he could not conveniently without manifest danger place him, being a Polonian (who could scarcely speak the Hungarian Language) Governor over such warlike People; he as it were enforced by necessity, preferred this Americus the Bishop of Veradiah, a man of them both, revered and feared. Which so grieved Lascus, a man of great Stomach and Experience, and thereunto excellently learned, that he would never admit of any excuse of the Kings, but always after complained, that he was by the King deluded. Yet for all that, he kept himself within the bounds of Loyalty, and enjoyed certain Lands and Towns which the King had given him in the Borders of Polonia; and estranged nevertheless from him in mind, was now become one of Gritius his Followers, hoping of his better Preferment by his means unto Solyman; and for that cause was not so forward to do the King such service as he had in times past. Now by the commandment of Gritius, a strong Company of Turkish Horfemen, and certain*

Troops of Hungarians, were delivered to Decia; who secretly departing that night from Bacovia, came suddenly to the Vayvods Camp, having a little before by his Hungarian Spies learned that he lay in the open Fields in his Tent, by reason of the great heat, without any watch or guard attended on only with his Pages and Household Servants, as a man without fear; and that all the rest of his retinue lay dispersed in the Country Villages round about. All which served so well for Decia his purpose, that the Vayvod ignorant of his death so nigh at hand (who rather contemned than feared his Enemies) was suddenly oppressed by Decia his Soldiers; so that whilst he was yet lying in his Bed, and scarcely waked by his Chamberlains and household of the Enemy, Decia broke into his Tent, cut off his Head as he lay. All they which lay near, amazed with the suddenness of the matter, fled away for fear, and left their Horfes and other things for a Prey to the Turks and other of Decia his Followers. Decia having done so great an outrage, returned to Gritius, presenting unto him the Vayvod's Head, which he brought in his Hand by the Ear. Lascus was then present, but altogether ignorant of the murder, who as a man moved with a natural compassion in so sudden and horrible a Fact, and forgetting all former grudges (as in like case it oftentimes chanceth) stood as one dismayed, silently rejoicing at the unworthy death of his Enemy. To whom Gritius turning himself, said, Lascus, Dost thou not know this shaven Pate, only it is a great Man's head, but of such an one as was very ambitious, rebellious, and proud. To whom Lascus replied, Truly though I loved him not, yet I thought it not to wish it stood upon his Shoulders; disallowing therein the Cruelty of the Fact. Which thing Gritius perceiving began to repent him of that was done, and said openly, that although he was worthily slain, yet he could have wished rather to have had him taken Prisoner. The report of this horrible murder soon bruted abroad, the Bishops Kinsmen and Friends, yea almost all the People of that Province rise up in Arms against Gritius, to revenge the death of the reverend Bishop, whom living they had both loved and feared. Never did any People in revenge of a common wrong so enter into Arms with great desire, more heat, or quicker speed; so that in few days there were assembled together unto King John and King John, under the leading of Stephanus Moyses, a Noble Gentleman, who of all other most honoured the Bishop, and in that common grief took upon him as chief, the persecuting of the Authors of such inhumane Cruelty. Gritius perceiving how grievously the matter was taken, with the danger he was in, began to doubt with himself what course were best for him to take. To go forward, and to fall into the hands of the furious People, the same was prefigured death; and to return and leave the honourable deputation he had with so great expectation of all men taken upon him, was unto his aspiring mind no less torment than death it self. Thus perplexed, he with all speed got himself with his Followers to the strong Town of Mege, in hope to throw himself until such time as the rage of the Country People were either of it self appeased (as it oftentimes falleth out in such sudden Tumults) or else he should be relieved by King John, or the Turks Sanzaks which had the charge of the Frontiers of the Turkish Empire. The Townsmen of Mege seeing Gritius accompanied with so many Turks, that the Gates against him yet at length by the perfavation of the two Hungarian

Captains Decia and Batianus, they gave him leave to enter into the safe Town, having before retired themselves with all their Substance unto the higher Town, which in manner of a strong Castle commanded the lower. Here whilst Gritus with all carefulness fortified the place, and dispatched the Messengers unto his Friends and abroad for Aid; his Enemies with hideous noise and outcries approaching the Town, at their first coming attempted to have scaled the Walls and Rampiers thereof; which thing whilst they disorderly did, with greater fury than discretion, they were easily repulsed, and many of them slain by the Turks Janizaries and Harquebusers. After which loss, by the direction of Maylat their General, they withdrew themselves out of the danger of the Shot, and incamped on every side of the Town, hoping as the truth was, that their Enemies unprovided of Victuals, could not long hold the place, but of necessity either starve with Famine, or yield it up. In the mean time Gritus resolutely enduring all the calamities of a man besieged, fell sick, and so much the more for that he could hear nothing of any Aid which he expected from his Friends; for King John glad in his mind of the distress of the Overseer, or rather Competitor of his Kingdom; and also knowing that he could not without great discontentment of his Subjects oppose himself against such a multitude risen upon to just a cause; yet for fashion sake sent certain Troops of Horsemen to his relief; who not altogether ignorant of the Kings mind, made such halt, as men that purposed not to come in time to do him good. As for the Turks Sanzaks of Belgrade and Samanaria, they envying at his honour, flatly refused to depart from their charge, so relieve him with out express command from Solyman himself; and Lajous (before one of Gritus his chief Followers, but now a beholder of his distress) when he had a little before departed from him to procure him some relief, as he promised, did now in this extremity forsake him also. The Citizens in the upper Town (who a great while had stood looking on from above as men indifferent) perceiving the full rebellion of their Countrymen to be renegeed, and the difficulties wherewith the Turks were inclosed, afflicted them also from the high Town. Gritus thus beset on every side, offered unto the Transylvanians a great Mass of Money, to suffer him to pass forward into Hungary; but their furious minds more desirous of Revenge than Money, were not to be moved with any Gold. In fine, he sent rich Jewels to the Governor to seduce his Friend, to be ready at a certain hour when he would fall out of the Town, to receive him with certain Troops of Horsemen; so if it were possible to save himself and his Children. Gritus (whether it were upon a doubtful hope, or urged by inevitable destiny) falling out of the Town at the appointed time, with Solyman Commission in his hand, and missing of the Moldavian, fell upon Francis Scheden the late Bishop high Kinsman, and Medius his familiar Friend; who furiously running in upon him with tumultuous Speech, violently caught from his Head his rich Cap of Sables, and with his Horsemen took him, being weak with sickness, and making no resistance. His Followers, especially the Turks, inclosed on every side, were either slain or taken. But Gritus himself being brought to the Generals Tent, beset round with armed Enemies, and there examined, Why he had commanded the Voyages to be taken; earnestly retorted, That he never commanded any such thing, and that it was done without his knowledge. Which his answer served not his turn, all the People crying out against him with one voice that he should as a sacrifice be offered unto the Vayvods Ghost. Whereupon he was by Maylat delivered again to Gritus Francis Scheden to be executed, who without delay caused his Head to be struck off. The Nobility and the Vayvods Kinsmen (after the manner of that People) dipped some part of their Garments in his Blood, the longer to keep in mind the remembrance of the Revenge. This was the shameful end of Aloysius Gritus the Duke of Venice his Son, Solyman Deputy in Hungary, with whom he was in such credit as never was any Christian, abounding in Wealth and worldly Felicity; but climbing too fast up the civil scaled Ladder of Ambition, suddenly fell and never rose more. The Executioner dripping his dead Body, found about him to may precious Stones and Jewels as were valued at forty millions of Ducats. And not long after, Lajous fell for by the King to Buda, was traitorily examined upon torture concerning Gritus his Commission and purposes, and was in great danger of his life; but at last by the intercession of Sigismund King of Polonia, he was set at liberty, and so fled out of Hungary unto Sigismund his Court in Polonia, after he had long time wearied himself, and adventured his life in the Hungarian State. Decia the Author of this Tragedy, was by the furious People afterwards rent in pieces, and so perished.

The same time that Gritus went from Constantinople into Hungary, Solyman the Turkish Emperor dreading no danger out of Europe, took in hand two great Expeditions both at one time, the one by Land into Asia against the Persians, and the other by Sea into Africa against the Moors; promising unto himself in his inordinate desires, the Monarchy of the whole World in short time, if he might subdue these two great Nations whom he had already in hope devoured. But forasmuch as all cannot be told at once, which was at one time in divers places so far distant done, omitting for a while the Expedition made in person himself against the Persians, we will first declare what he did by his Lieutenants against the Moors. Haricadenus, firmaned of the Christians Barbarossa (who succeeding his elder Brother Horruccius in the Kingdom of Algiers in Africa, had by many Victories so enlarged the Kingdom before gotten by his Brother, that his Name and Power was now become terrible both to the Christians and wild Moors, and his fame grown great in the Turkish Court) was the chief Author and perfwader of Solyman to invade Africa. But it shall not be (I think) very far from our purpose here briefly to rehearse by what means those two Mytlenic Brethren, basely born, crept out of a small Galliot unto the Majesty of great Kings; that herein they which come afterwards may also admire the wonderful changes and chances of these worldly things, now up, now down, as if the life of man were not of much more certainty than a Stage Play.

These two Brethren, Horruccius and Haricadenus, born at Mytlenic in the Island of Lesbos, weary of the poor and base estate they led at home with their Father, a Renegade Grecian; stealing a Riddle Galliot, committed themselves and all the hope of their good fortune to Sea, where by chance they comforted themselves with Camaleis, a most famous Pyrat of that time; under whom Horruccius the elder Brother, for his forwardness began to be Captain, and growing in by many Perseverances, also strong with Gallies and Slaves which he had at sundry times taken; and at last comforting himself with Hasim Sinan the Jew, Salas, and other less Pyrats (which afterwards became became men of great fame and account) over whom he commanded as an arch Pyrat, came seeking after purchase as far as Mauritania. At which time Solyman King of Tunise-California, which now we call Algiers, was in Arms against his Brother Mechemeti, Competitor of the Kingdom; who sided by the Numidians, now commonly called Arabians, his Brother in great detour of his Estate. Solyman glad of the coming of Horruccius and the other Pyrats his Followers, with a great Mass of Money paid before hand, induced Horruccius and the rest to take upon them the defence of him and his Kingdom against his Brother; (especially by the means of his Harquebusers, as then no small terror to the wild Moors and Numidians) that in short time he would reduce that savage People, and set Solyman at peace in his Kingdom. Horruccius being a man of a sharp wit, and by nature ambitious, noting in the time of his service the Kings mild and simple disposition, void of all difficult; and that the naked Moors were no Soldiers, but a light and unconfront People, always at variance among themselves; and that the wandering Numidians living barely divided into many factions, were easily by reward to be won, or by force constrained; suddenly falsified his faith, and villainously misled Solyman the King, as he was bathing himself, mistrusting nothing less than the falseness of the Pyrat; and in the same hour murdering such as he thought would withstand his desire, and with Bounty and Cruelty overcoming the rest, so wrought the matter, that he was by general consent chosen King of Algiers. Thus of a Pyrat became a King, he was thence by Policy surprised Cirella (a famous City about fifty miles distant from Algiers) by his Soldiers sent thither in the habit of Merchants. After that, he by his Brother Haricadenus (no less valiant than himself) troubled all the Mediterranean Sea from Algiers with his Gallies, and all his Neighbours; himself by land with daily incursions, leaving nothing untouched, which might by force or policy be had; so that his power daily increased, men of service continually resorting unto him, as the chief man in all those parts. Not thus contented, he to enlarge his Kingdom, drave the Spaniards out of Bugia, a City famous both for the great Trade thither, and for the Mahometan School sometime there kept; at the taking whereof he lost his right Hand with a Shot, and instead thereof after used a Hand of Iron, wherewith he obtained many worthy Victories against his Enemies; for near to Algeria he drew up an Army of the Spaniards, with Diego de Vava their General. And shortly after, at such time as Hugo Mendez returning out of Italy with the old Spanish Soldiers landed in his Country, he enforced him again to Sea; where he with all his expert Soldiers either perished by shipwreck, or driven on shore, were slain or taken Prisoners by Horruccius, and thrust into his Gallies. At last having in sundry Battels overcome the King of Tremissia, Charles the Emperor his Confederate, and thrust him out of his Kingdom, he stirred up both the Christians and Numidians against him; so that coming to take Ors and Poppo (two strong Holds kept by Garrisons of Spaniards sent thither to aid the King of Tremissia) he was by them and the Moors at the first repulsed, and afterwards quite overthrow; where most part of his Army being slain, his Captains and greatest Officers, of his Friends fought to save themselves by flight over the desert Sands; and being himself hard purloined by his Enemies, scattered many pieces of Gold upon the Sands as he fled, thereby to have flattered their hasty pursuit; but they more desirous of him than of his Gold, followed to fast, that at last they overtook him, and without further delay struck off his Head, which was afterwards sent into Spain, and carried upon a Laurence through all the Towns and Cities along the Sea Coast; to the wonderful rejoicing of the People, unto whom he had in former time done great harm.

After the death of Horruccius, Haricadenus inferior to his Brother neither in Courage nor Martial Prowess, by the general content of the Soldiers took upon him the Kingdom of Algiers. He, made Heir not only of his Brothers Kingdom, but of his Virtues and haughty Thoughts, and of the surname also of Barbarossa, began forthwith to aspire unto the Empire of all that part of Africa; accounting what he had already gotten, too little and too base to answer his desires. Wherefore he entered into Arms, and became a terror both to the Moors and Numidians; holding Peace with some, and Wars with others, as best served his purpose; and with his Gallies robbed and spoiled the Coasts of Spain, Sardinia, and the Islands Baleares; Fortune so favouring him in all his enterprises, that he became both famous and fearful to his Enemies. He slew Hamet, a great Commander among the Numidians, and chafed Banchada and Amida, two of their greatest Princes, out of the Country; and with like fortune at Sea, overcame Hugo Mendez, a famous Spaniard, who fore wounded, had much ado to save himself by flight, when he had lost divers of his Gallies. He also in Battle at Sea overthrew Rodericus Portuensis, Admiral of Spain; in which fight the Admiral with seven of his Gallies taken, and the rest were both slain, and seven of his Gallies taken; in token of which Victory, he sent part of the rich spoil these taken, with the Admirals Ensign, as a Present unto Solyman; whereby he became famous in the Turks Court; but much more, after he had repulsed Auria from Cercania, and taken two great Genoway Ships which were coming to Auria loaded with Men and Munition; the loss whereof filled the City of Genoa with much sorrow. All things forcing thus according to his desire, and his name become no less terrible in Spain, Italy, Sicily, and the Islands of the Mediterranean, than it was in the greatest part of Africa; Solyman grieved with the loss of Corone, Pattara, and the Castles upon the Straits of Lepanto, taken from him by Auria, Himeras his Admiral being shamefully put to flight, by the Council of his Basseas, sent especially of Abraham the chief Basia, sent Embassadors unto him to Algiers; offering him the greatest honours of his Court, and to make him Admiral of all his Fleet, if he would forthwith repair unto Constantinople; for why, he was the only man in all mens judgments, who for his years and great experience at Sea, as well as for his invincible Courage and Glory of his late achieved Kingdom, was to be compared with Auria; and to be opposed against the Christian Fleet. Since a great man in Solyman Court, was with this Embassage sent, and speedily transported to Algiers by Mamagala, a famous Pyrat, then Governor of the Rhodes; who at his landing, was honourably received by Barbarossa, and audience given him. Barbarossa understanding the cause of his coming, was exceeding glad thereof, presently conceiving no small hope of obtaining the Monarchy of Africa, if he might once come to Solyman presence, and at large show unto him the state of Africa, and power flow unto him, and their continual discord of the Christians, with their continual discord among themselves. Wherefore without further delay delay committing the protection of his Son Agi (then about eighteen years old) and the Government of his new gotten Kingdom to Ramada and Agi, two of his high Kinmen and assured Friends, of whose Fidelity he doubted not; he with forty of his own Gallies in moist warlike manner appointed, set forward with Solymann Embassador towards Constantinople; where by the way he met with a Fleet of Genoway Ships bound for Sicily for Corn, which after a sharp and cruel fight he took and burnt. After that, landing by night in the Country of Elba, not far from Naples, he suddenly surprised Rhum a rich City; where loading his Gallies with the Wealth thereof, and carrying away with him all the Inhabitants into Captivity, he arrived at Constantinople the year 1522, where he was by the great Courtiers brought to Solymann, of whom he was joyfully received, if it were but for the Presents which he gave him; which were fair Boys and young Maidens sumptuously apparelled, Eunuchs, and wild Beasts of Lybia, as Lyons, Leopards, and such like. But after he had certain days discoursed at large with the great Baffes, of the State of Affrick, the strength of the Christians, and how the Wars were to be managed, he was afterwards by them fildomer sent for, and offering himself into their Company, was hardly admitted; for Envy (the inseparable Companion of growing honour) had quickly overtaken him in the Court, so that many men letted not openly to say, It had not been the fashion of the Ottoman Kings, to prefer Pyrats (the worst kind of Thieves) to the honour of their great Admiral; and that there wanted nor, neither ever would want men both virtuous and valiant in the Turks Court, which could with great honour maintain and augment the glory of the Turkish Empire both by Sea and Land; whereas he had against all right and conscience, by shameful Treachery intruded himself into another mans Kingdom in Affrick, and there persecuted the Mahometan Princes and People, being of no Religion himself, as one that was born of a renegat Greek, and from his youth lived as a mercilefs Pyrat, and common Enemy of Mankind. By which Speeches Barbaruffa perceived in how evil time Abraham Baffa his best Friend, and by whose means he was sent for, was absent from Court; who at that time was gone to Camogena, and wintered at Aleppo, with purpose (as Solymann Forerunner) with the first of the next Spring, to pass over Euphrate against the Persian. After long suit, and much expectation, Solymann answered Barbaruffa by Ajax and Cassim two of the great Baffes, That all the matter concerning him should be referred to the discretion of Abraham the chief Baffa, for that he was by his Council especially sent for into Affrick; wherefore if he did expect any thing, he by his Council should be satisfied; that according to his grave judgment all things might be ordered. Barbaruffa thus rejected into Syria, although he well perceived that it tended to his no small disgrace; yet in hope by surffiance to obtain another Kingdom, seemed contented with the answer, and resolved forthwith to take upon him that long and painful journey; which the old King lustily performed, and so passing by Land through Asia the less, and travelling over the Mountain Amann, then covered with deep Snow came in the dead time of Winter to Aleppo in Syria, where he was honourably received by the great Baffa, and heard at large, to his fo good contentation and liking, that he deemed him of all others the fittest to command the Turks Power at Sea; and to that purpose writ commendatory Letters in his behalf to Solymann; wishing him for his sufficiency to place him as the fourth with the other three Baffes of his Council. After Barbaruffa was again arrived at Constantinople with these Letters, and that it was known how effectually the chief Baffa had commended him to Solymann, it was a wonder to see how on a sudden the face of the Court was changed upon him, every man either for Friendship or Flattery began now to speak of his praises, and to extol his worthiness; who was now in all mens mouths but Barbaruffa? so great was the Power and Authority of the chief Baffa, that being accepted, yet was his approbation of all men accounted sufficient to prefer whom he pleased; and his Letters Laws to the rest of the Court. Barbaruffa had brought with him from Algeria, one Rofcetes the Elder Brother of Mulleffes King of Tunes, who wrongfully driven into exile by his younger Brother, had lived certain years at Algeria; but now by the perswasion of Barbaruffa was come with him to Constantinople, to crave aid of Solymann, against the oppression of his Brother. Him Barbaruffa oftentimes shewed unto the great Baffes, and in his discourses with them concerning the Conquest of Affrick, set him out as a most fit instrument for subduing of the Kingdom of Tunes, as a man whom the People more affected than they did Mulleffes the Usurper. After long deliberation and consultation had with the Baffes concerning the invasion of Affrick, Barbaruffa now admitted the words of Affrick Solymann, in these or like words perswaded him to that War, for the entrance whereunto we have thus far digressed.

Rofcetes.

What thing the Priests with loud voice use to pray for, at such time as the Ottoman Emperors enter into the Temple to pray, the same thing do I also pray unto thee most mighty Solymann, that thou shalt remember the Promises by Justice and Religion to have got for thee this Empire, wherein which, more magnificent and richer the Gods have not given to any; Fortune hath never deceived them that trod that way, and thou hitherto hast so traced their steps, that thou hast easily surmounted their Fame and Glory, administering Justice to thy Subjects; and inflamed with the hope of eternal praise, making continual War against the Enemies of thy Religion, the true office of a zealous Prince, by this means, as the Helgrade taken, Rhodes won, the King of Hungary slain in Battell, Germany twice harried and burnt, so that Charles, whom the Christians would make equal to thy self in power and valour, with the great aid almost of all the Christian Nations, terrified with the noise of thy Army, flunnetted battell. But forasmuch as Empires, be they never so large, or Victories be they never so glorious, can either justify the greatness of an heretical mind, or blot the same with glory; thou hast therefore sent before thee thy victorious Ensigns against the Persians and Partians, that these Nations who have wickedly fallen from our Rites, purified as it were by thy sacred Army, may be again reclaimed to the ancient Rites of our Religion. But be this unto thy greatness; most honourable to attempt, and glorious to perform; let it only be lawful for me now grown an old man in the midst of age and danger, to declare what in expedition, and briefly to open such things as I have by long experience learned to concern the augmenting of thy Fame and Empire elsewhere. Neither would I have you to take this as presumptuously spoken of me; for Fortune hath enough, yea more than enough favoured my designs, whom from a poor cottage and bare house, ye hath promoted to glorious Victories, great Riches, yea unto the Title and Majesty of a King. But unto these things the Gods could could give me nothing better, than to be called for of thee, and sent for, in Council to discourse of matters of greatest importance; wherefore my advice shall be unto thee faithful, and with experience confirmed; which although it be all that it formerly did men can do, yet in my found Body remains such strength, that I dare both promise and perform unto thee the best good service at all affairs both by Sea and Land. For unto this only course have I bent my self day and night from my youth, following the purpose and counsel of my valiant Brother Hortucius (who to extend the bounds of our Religion, persecuted the Christians both by Sea and Land) desiring nothing more, than that thy Fleet and Power might be joined with my Forces and direction, and so under thy good hap, to be either a Commander, or else commanded; forasmuch as it grieveth me not to be commanded by my betters. Of which my desires if the Gods shall make me partaker, the Spaniards shall shortly be driven quite out of Affrick, thou shalt hear that the Moors are gone over into Spain, to resolve the Kingdom of Granado; that Tunes and Numidia are at thy command; and not to speak of Sardinia and Coccyria, that Sicilia is ours; which once taken, we shall pass over into Italy, and on every side direct it with our Fleet being now weak and brought low by the discord of the Princes, and that part thereof both towards Sicilia and Macedonia ready to submit it self upon any condition, so it might cast off the Spanish yoke. Think not, that either thy strength or Unity is now in Italy, which was when thy great Grandfather Mahomet having taken Hydruntum brought a great fleet, not upon Italy only, but upon other the Christian Nations; also for by the good success of that War, which all the Christian Princes could hardly withstand, he had undoubtedly taken the City of Rome, and so according to right and reason, again united the Empire of the East and of the West, as they were before in their ancient glory. But he suddenly left the World, rapt to Heaven, that he might beget thee (according to the appointment of the fatal Destinies, and revolutions of the Heavens) this work of absolute perfection; yet my purpose is not, by putting thee in hope of so great and rare a Triumph, to interrupt or hinder thee for turning thy power into the East, against thy old and irreligious Enemies, deserving all extremities; for thy Navy shall be sufficient for me, whereof thou shalt have no need in thy Wars so far within Land; that whilst thou art conquering Asia, Africa the third part of the World may in the mean time be brought under thy subjection also. Where before all other things, Mulleffes is to be driven out of Tunes; a man of insatiable Covetousness, unfeared Lust, horrible Cruelty, hated both of God and Man; who having by Treachery slain eighteen of his Brethren, or that which worse is, cruelly burnt out their Eyes, doth so reign worse, as he hath left him neither Kinman nor Friend. For being so unthankful as perfidious, he hath murdered all his Fathers Friends, and with great travel had preferred him to the Kingdom, so to make short payment for so great deservings. With this Beast we must have to do, whom whilst no man loveth, all men wish to perish. The Numidians trouble him with daily invasions, whose injuries the infamous Council endureth with such shame and reproach, that it should seem he had rather to suffer them than revenge them. And yet the oftrenamed Daffard boldeth in Chaim many valiant Turks, and acknowledgeth not your Imperial Name, whereunto all men on every side fly for grace; and which is not to be suffered, exceedingly favoureth the Spaniards of Tripolis to the intent that Agis and Molles, two valiant Turkish Captains, may be driven out of the City. This wild Beast disarmed of his Claws and Teeth, we shall easily destroy, if it be but for that we have with us Rofcetes his Brother, whom the Numidians wish and long for; him might we use, if it be but for a shew, so shall the thing we desire, be without blood effused, as soon as we shall but prefer our selves before the Gates of Tunes. Then shall it be to our pleasure, to appoint whom you will have to govern the Numidian Kingdom; it shall be unto me glory enough, when the greater part of Affrick conquered, shall be peccably delivered into your hands; at your return with the Triumph of Peritia. But by the way as I return, I assure you upon mine own report, so to use the matter, that the Christians shall also have good cause to bewail their calamities; and if I hap to meet you at Auria, he shall have small cause to rejoice of his mischief be both done; for him alone I challenge to perfectness, as my proper and peculiar Enemy, both for his hands, upon the despatches I have at his fame, who once taken out of the way, the Seas shall be open only to you and your Fleet. And believe me, he that shall be able to command the Seas, shall easily also subdue the Kingdoms by Land.

But Solymann, who after the manner of wise Princes, used well to consider, and afterwards with ripe Judgment to resolve of such matters as he had with attentive ear hearkened unto; commending Barbaruffa for his forwardness in his resolve, for that time brake up the Council. Not long after, a Decree was made, according to Abraham the great Baffes advice, That Barbaruffa should be joyned as fourth with the other three chief Baffes of Solymann Council, and be made great Admiral; so that all the Islands, Ports, Solymann Empire should be at his command, and that it should be lawful for him to take up such Mariners and Souldiers for service at Sea, as pleased him in what place soever. This being solemnly proclaimed, Solymann with his own hand delivered him a Scepter and a Sword, willing him, by worthy deeds to perform what he had promised. After which, Ajax and Cassim the two great Baffes, with the Captain of the Janizaries, brought him with exceeding Pomp, from the Court to the Navy; at which time was carried before him all the tokens of his new obtained honour. And towards the maintenance of that War at Sea, he had delivered unto him out of Solymann Treasures, eight hundred thousand Ducats, and eight hundred Janizaries.

Barbaruffa sped of that he desired, staid not long after at Constantinople, but departing out of Helspontum with fifty Gallies and certain Gallions, shaped his course towards Italy, leaving Amurath (a Sea Captain) with twelve Gallies to transport Solymann and his Army, ready to set forward against the Persian, over that narrow Sea into Asia. Who after he had so done, overtook Barbaruffa at Ateneos, who holding on his course to Affrick, and suddenly passing the Strait betwixt Italy and Cicily, brought a great fear upon both the Countries, but passing by the Bay of Hippodamia along the Coast of the lower Calabria; where he set upon the Town of Saracene Lucidia called in ancient time Templa; which although it stood upon a Rock and was reasonably well walled; yet such was the violence of the Turks Assault, that it could not be defended but was taken, with so much more hurt to the Inhabitants, for that the Maior of the Town, to keep the People from flying away had locked up the Gates on the other side with his City, from the Enemy. From thence he with rich Spoil and many Prisoners went to Citarrion, where he had learned of his Prisoners, a Fleet of Gallies was in building. This Town forsaken of the Inhabitants for fear, he took without resistance, ransacked it, and burnt it, where he also fired seven Gallies Gallies not yet altogether finished. But after he was come with his Fleet as far as the Island Gapri, within the fight of Naples, such a terror was struck into the minds of all that dwelt along that Coast, That it was thought, if he had landed and gone directly to Naples, the Neapolitans would for fear have abandoned the City. But holding on his course, he came to Presbita, which he took and rifled; by passing by the Port of Cajeta (which he might easily have taken) he came to Splendia, a Town in the hiſtermoſt part of the Kingdom of Naples. They of the Town diſmained with the ſudden arrival of ſo great a Fleet, yielded the ſame without reſiſtance. The Enemy entering the Town, took twelve hundred Priſoners. Peligrinus a chief man amongst them of Splendia, was fled into the Caſtle; him Barbaruffa commanded to yield, which if he would preſently do, he promiſed to let him go free; but if he ſhould ſtand upon his defence he ſeemed in ſhort time to make him repent his fooliſh hardineſs, with the utter deſtruction both of himſelf and the Town. The fearful Gentleman without delay came out of the Caſtle, and fell down at his feet; who according to his promiſe gave him his liberty, and with rare courteſie reſtored to him his Wife, his Son and Niſce, whom he had taken Priſoners; who received them with many tears falling from their Eyes for joy.

The ſame night alſo two thouſand Turks came from the Fleet, through the rough and buſhy Mountains, to the City Fundi, ten miles diſtant from Splendia, in the uttermoſt Borders of the Kingdom of Naples, conducted as was thought by certain Italians of that Country; who a few years before taken at Sea, and overwearied with the heavy burthen of the Turkiſh Slavery, had revolted to the Mahometan Religion. But ſuch was the ſuddenneſs of their coming, and their celebrity in entering the City, that Julia Gonzaga a daughter of the Emperor, and the chief prize which they fought after, had ſcarce time to get to Horſe half naked, and ſo with much difficulty to eſcape into the Mountains. It is reported, that Barbaruffa (which thing he himſelf afterwards ſeemed not to deny) moved with the ſame of her incomparable Beauty and wonderful perfection, deſired exceedingly to have taken her as a Preſent for Solyman. The Citizens were for moſt part either ſlaved or taken Priſoners by the Turks, who loaded with the Spoil of the City, returned again to the Fleet. Another part of Barbaruffa's Fleet came to Tarracina, which the Turks took forſaken of the Inhabitants, who for fear were all fled into the Mountains, except ſome which for age or ſickneſs could not ſhift for themſelves, whom the Turks ſlew, and ſpoiled the Churches. Barbaruffa thus ſcouring along the Coaſt of Italy, and news thereof daily brought to the City of Rome, ſtruck ſuch an exceeding terror into the minds of the Citizens, that it was verily thought if he had come a little further to Offia, they would generally have forſaken the City. But he having well performed his promiſe made to Solyman for vexing the Chriſtians, and before reſolved of a greater matter he had to do; when he had ſtarrated at Pontia, paſſed over into Africk with ſuch celerity, that he was arrived there before it was thought that he was departed from the Coaſt of Italy. For Barbaruffa to deceive Mulleſſes King of Tunes, and to take him unprovided, had given it out, that he would burn and ſpoil the Coaſts of the Chriſtian Countries, eſpecially of Italy, Liguria, and Spain, in revenge of the harm done by Aurica at Corone and Pontia. Which thing Mulleſſes the rather believed underſtanding his proceedings upon the Coaſt of Italy. The Venetians having alſo at the ſame time at great charges prepared a great Fleet, did in ſome part leſſen Mulleſſes fear, That Barbaruffa would employ his Forces for Africk; for then what ſhould the Venetians have needed to have made ſo great and chargeable a preparation? But that which above all other things brought him into ſecurity, was for that he had by ſecret Eſpials certainly learned, that his Brother Rofeſes was kept at Conſtantinople, as a Priſoner at large, under ſafe keeping; which made him to think, that Barbaruffa's Forces were not prepared againſt him; for he knew that he could not be impugned, or his State more endangered by any other means, than by producing the competitor of his Kingdom, to whom his guilty Conſcience doubted, that both the Citizens of Tunes and the Numidians were for moſt part well affected.

This Mulleſſes of whom we now ſpeak, and whom hereafter we ſhall by occaſion often remember, was lineally defended of the ancient King of Tunes; who without interruption of diſcent, or mixture of foreign Blood, had by the ſpace of nine hundred fifty four years mightily ruled the great Kingdom of Tunes, from Tripolis to Bugia, alſo eight hundred miles along the Mediterranean, and into the Main as far as the Mount Atlas; and for the long continuance were worthily accounted the moſt reverend and mighty amongst the Mahometan Kings of Africk. His Father Mahometes, when he had with much glory, and more pleaſure, reigned two and thirty years, perceiving the end of his life to approach, had purpoſed to have appointed Maimo his eldeſt Son (whom for his haſty aſpiring he then held in diſtance) to ſucceed him in his Kingdom; but overcome with the importunities of his eldeſt Son's Wife, a Woman of a haughty ſpirit, who had by reward made a ſtrong faction in the Court for her Son Mulleſſes, he altered his former purpoſe, and appointed him his Succedor; by whom (as it was thought) the ſmall remainder of his own old years was ſhortned; Maimo the right Heir of the Kingdom in Priſon, preſently murdered; ſeventeen of his other Brethren unmercifully executed; and three other, Barcha, Baleth, and Sandis, with more than barbarous cruelty with a hot Iron of their right deprived; only Rofeſes the ſecond Brother, and Abdumetich, eſcaping the hands of their unnatural Brother, fled to Morbarka, a great Prince amongst the Numidians; whither alſo their Brothers malice perſecuted them, ſeeking by many practices to have taken them away, and at laſt for a great ſum of Money to have had them delivered into his hands. Which Money the Numidian received, but ſuffered the diſtreſſed Princes, as if they had eſcaped againſt his Will, to be further to another Numidian Prince a Friend of his, called Beniſſes; where Mulleſſes by like practices as before, fought to have deſtroyed them, or to have got them into his own power. Thus chaſed by their Brothers endleſs malice, from Prince to Prince, and place to place, they for their more ſafety fled at laſt to the City of Bijerata, far into the main Land; where Abdumetich as one weary of the World gave over, all, and betook himſelf to a ſolitary life, and became a melancholy Mahometan Monk. But Rofeſes courteouſly entertained by Abdalla Prince of that City, found ſuch favour in his fight, that he gave him his Daughter in marriage, and long time honourably maintained him as his Son in Law, with ſuch careleſneſs, that for fear of Mulleſſes practices, he was ſometimes perſuaded to eat any other Meat but ſuch as the Prince or his Wife had before taſted off. Mulleſſes at thus reigning and raging, and yet not contented with the death of ſo many of his Brethren, proceeded further, and murdered divers of their Children alſo. He cauſed alſo the Maniſet and Meſſur, men of greateſt Authority in all the Kingdom, his Fathers grave Counſellers, and his chief Friends, by whoſe means eſpecially he had aſpired unto the Kingdom, to be cruelly tortured to death, fearing their Greatneſs; or rather as ſome thought, grieving to ſee them live, to whom he was ſo much beholden, and therefore rewarded them with ſuch ſharp payment. And by the ſtigfation of Leuſſia his Mother, cauſed divers of his Fathers other Wives and Concubines to be shamefully murdered, enſeigning offence againſt his Father, as with an effeminate Prince, had for his pleaſure maintained two hundred Wives and Concubines in his Houſes of delight, by whom he had begot ſo many Sons Competitors of the Kingdom, that he had left him (as he ſaid) a laborious and endleſs piece of work, to deſtroy ſo great a brood.

Prince

Rofeſes aided by his Father in Law and the other Numidian Princes, to whom the name of Mulleſſes, both for his cruelty againſt his own Blood, and injurious dealing againſt his Neighbours, was become odious; paſſing over the River Bragada with a great Army, near unto Tunes met with Mulleſſes his Army, conducted by Dorax a valiant Captain, Brother to Leuſſia; where in a ſharp conflict he overthrew his Brothers Army, and enforced Dorax with them that were eſcaped out of the Battel, for ſafeguard of their lives to ſite into Tunes. Rofeſes purſuing the Victory, came and preſented himſelf before the Gates of the City, in hope that the Citizens (whom he knew for the moſt part to hate the uſurping Tyrant) would upon the fight of him, in right their King, with ſo great an Army, raiſe ſome tumult in the City, and let him in. There he lay by the ſpace of twenty days, ſtill expecting ſome innovation; in which time the more to alienate the minds of the People from Mulleſſes, and to ſhew how unable he was to protect them, he burnt and deſtroyed all the Olive and Fruit Trees, which grew moſt plentifully and pleaſantly all along the Country, from the ruins of old Carthage, to the Walls of Tunes; which was unto the Citizens, whoſe greateſt Poſſeſſions lay there, a moſt heavy and lamentable ſpectacle. But Mulleſſes had fo attempted their minds with fair ſpeeches and large promiſes of recompencing every man to the full, for all ſuch harm as they ſhould ſuſtain for his Brothers fury in the Country; and beſide that, had the City in ſuch ſtrong poſſeſſion by reaſon of his Soldiers, that the Citizens either would not or could not revolt to Rofeſes. The Numidian Princes weary of that long and vain expectation, according to the levy of that Nation, accounting it no ſhame after Victory once gotten to depart, began one after another to ſhrink away to their own dwellings, perſwading Rofeſes alſo to provide for himſelf while he had time, and to attend his better fortune. Wherefore, he ſeeming to be terrified by the Numidians, or circumvented by his cruel Brother, fled to Barbaruffa, then reigning at Algiers in great glory, where he was honourably entertained; and there remained until ſuch time as by his perſuaſion he went with him as is aforeſaid to Conſtantinople, to crave help of Solyman, by whom he was deſtined in ſafe caſtody; although it was in policy given out by Barbaruffa, that he was in the Fleet, and that he ſhould by Solyman's power be reſtored to his Fathers Kingdom at

This was the ſtate of the Kingdom of Tunes, at ſuch time as Barbaruffa with Solyman's great Fleet, contrary to all mens expectation, ſuddenly departing from the Coaſt of Italy, landed in Africk at Bijerata, a famous Port of the Kingdom of Tunes. They of Bijerata weary of the government of Mulleſſes, and of themſelves deſirous of change, as ſoon as they heard the name of Rofeſes, forthwith drove out their Governor, and received the Turks into the Town. For Barbaruffa had before ſent certain of Rofeſes's familiar Friends afore, which bare the People in hand, that he was in the Fleet, but not able to come yet on ſhore, for that he was (as they ſaid) Sea-ſick, and troubled with an Ague. Bijerata thus poſſeſſed by Barbaruffa, he preſently departed thence, and ſailing by Utica, thirty miles diſtant from Bijerata, and ſo keeping along the Coaſt, and paſſing the Promontory of Carthage, came before Galeata, a ſtrong Caſtle with in the Bay of Tunes, ſo placed upon a Strait, that it commanded all the paſſage by Sea unto the City of Tunes. Before this Caſtle, Barbaruffa in token of Friendſhip, diſcharged all his great Ordnance, which they of the Caſtle answered with like; but being required to deliver it up to Rofeſes, they ſaid it ſhould be always at his command that ruled in the City of Tunes. The News of Rofeſes's his ſuppoſed coming, flying ſwiftly by land from Bijerata to Tunes, and a great Fleet once diſcovered, ſet all the City on an uproar; for the Citizens were in great expectation of their new King, both for the love of Rofeſes, who had always ſhewed himſelf to be of a mild and bountiful nature; and alſo for the hatred of Mulleſſes, whoſe tyrannous and coercive Government they thought they had too long endured. Neither was he ignorant what report ran of himſelf, and how he had loſt the hearts of his Subjects, which was evidently to be ſeen in the eyes and countenances of the chief men of the City. And that which more increaſed their hatred, was for that he had not according to his promiſe to them in time of diſtreſs, made them any recompence for their goodly Houſes and Olive Gardens, deſtroyed in the Country by Rofeſes in the former Wars; wherefore at ſuch time as he came now out of the Caſtle, and in the greateſt Aſſembly of his People, began to perſwade them to play the Men, and to continue conſtant in their obedience, promiſing unto them ſuch reward as they knew he was never able to perform, they all departed, and left him alone; yea ſome of them under the colour of Friendſhip, and amongst them Abdabar, then Meſſar (which was chief Officer next unto the King) perſwaded him to give place to his hard fortune, and forthwith to ſite, for by chance at the ſame Inſtant it was in every mans mouth, that the Turks were even at hand; which thing cauſed Mulleſſes, forſaken of his Subjects, of himſelf fearful, and worthily doubting to be betrayed, to ſite in ſuch halt out of the City, that he left behind him both his Treſure and Jewels, which afterwards came into the hands of his Enemies. The ſtill that revolted was Abbeses, a man of great Authority; and Fineches, Captain of the Caſtle; both renegade Spaniards. Fineches profeſſedly after the flight of Mulleſſes, brought out Rofeſes's Wife and Children, whom Mulleſſes had long time kept in priſon, and to welcome their Father; placed them in the Kings Royal Seat. Abbeses alſo forthwith advertiſed Barbaruffa of Mulleſſes departure, and with what longing the People expected their deſired King; wiſhing him without delay to repair unto the City; and for a Preſent ſent him a goodly Barbarian Horſe, richly furnished, and divers others for his other chief Captains. Hereupon Barbarossa without longer stay set forward with five thousand Turks, which he had already landed, and coming to the City, was of the Citizens joyfully received. But after long looking, when they could no where defery Rofetes their fupposed King, and heard nothing but the name of Solyman and Barbarossa, doubled and redoubled by the Turks in their military acclamations, as they marched through the City towards the Caffle; they began to diffult, as the truth was, that in stead of their new King whom they so much defired, they had received the Turkish Government, which they utterly detested. Which fufpicion once confirmed by certain of Rofetes his Friends (whom Barbarossa had brought with him of purpose to delude the People) who grieved to fee the ruin of their native Country, fpared not for fear of the prefent danger to tell their Friends and Acquaintance as they went, That they did in vain look for Rofetes, whom they had left in bonds at Constantinople; it was a wonder to fee, how fuddainly the minds of the People were changed, how fpeedily they ran to their Weapons, and how furiously they affailed the Turks, now fearing no fuch matter, and were not as yet all got into the Caffle. The chief Leader of the Citizens in this tumult, was Abdalar the Meftiar; who but a little before upon the coming of the Turks, by augmenting the danger, and the unfaithfulness of his Subjects, had perfwaded Muleffes to flie; but now perceiving himfelf deceived of his expectation for the coming of Rofetes, and repenting of that he had done, fought by all means to drive out the Turks, and to recal Muleffes. And the more to animate the People, as he flood on high, from whence he might beft be heard, he cried unto them with a loud voice:

We are moft villainoufly betrayed (worthy Citizens) for Rofetes, whom we expected for our lawful King, lamenteth his misery in Chains, in Prison at Constantinople; and we, except we prefently play the men, and valiantly fight for our Liberty, shall for ever serve as Slaves to these foreign and mercilefs Pyrats. The present danger of our Estate telleth us, that we must prefently and without delay take the occasion offered. Wherefore let all men that mean not to serve as Slaves, and to be bought and sold as Beasts, take up Arms against the faithless Turks. I my self will be your Leader: let us therefore all with one consent, with heart and hand, recover the honest Treachery, defend our Country and Liberty with the ancient honor and liberty of the Numidians.

There was now no time to flay, every man had broken himfelf to his Weapons; Muleffes was again fent for, who yet flaid in the Suburbs, expecting what fhould happen; many of the Turks were flain before they were aware, or feared any thing; as at this time as was poffible one of the Bulwarks of the Caffle, which they knew was eafieft to be gained, where the Turks had fet up one of their Ensigns; and with the multitude of their Darts and Arrows to overwhelm the Turks, that they were glad to forfake the place, and to retire farther into the Caffle to a place of more ftrength; from whence and all alongft the curtain of the Wall, they without intermiffion difcharged their great Artillery and flail Shot amongst the thicket of the naked Moors, making of them a wonderful Slaughter. Barbarossa although he was a man of an invincible courage and great experience, all his life time well acquainted with desperate dangers (the dreadful fpects of afpiring minds) yet furprized with the fuddainness of the Affault, shut up in a place whereof he yet knew not the ftrength, and not provided of Victual for three days, was with the due confideration of thefe difficulties, not a little troubled; which his care was by the difordered fury of his Enemies, and known valour of his own Souldiers greatly diminished; efpecially when he faw his own men fill fighting, as men full of hope and courage, and the Moors as men half difmailed with the wounds and laughter of their Friends, ready to retire. Howbeit, by the coming in of Muleffes and Dorax, the Affault twice before given over, was again at both times renewed, with no lefs desperate Fury than at the firft, and the Turks hardly charged. In this dangerous Affault Halis of Maliga, a Renegade Spaniard, but a moft expert Souldier, turning himfelf to Barbarossa, faid,

If thou wilt serve thine honour, and hold this Fort, we must fall out upon this Enemy, which having never seen a Jet battle, but only acquainted with light skirmishes, will not be able to endure our charge at hand, but shall in a moment know the price of their foolish hardiness; who as Brain-fick men could neither endure the government of their cruel King, nor yet thankfully receive the authors of their deliverance and liberty.

This motion of the Spaniard, confirmed by the general approbation of the chiefest Captains, Barbarossa commanded Halis the Author of that Counsel, with certain other Captains and their Companions, at one instant to fall out at two Ports of the Caffle; which they fo refolutely performed, that in fhort time a wonderful number of the naked Moors lay dead upon the ground.

Abdalar the Meftiar himfelf, was there forth through with a Bullet and flain; whereupon the Affault was quite given over, the Moors retiring by Companies back into the City, and the Turks fill perfuing them; where in the Streets for certain hours, was fought a moft cruel and bloody Battel. At laft the Citizens overcome, forfook the open Streets, and betook them to the refuge of their Houfes; not fo careful of their King, as of themfelves, their Wives and Children. And Halis with the reft, wearied with the slaughter of his Enemies, and overcome with labour, heat, and thirft, returned with Victory unto the Caffle. It is reported that there was above 3000 of the Citizens flain that day, and thrice as many hurt. Muleffes thus discouraged, and utterly defpairing to recover the City, hardly escaped his Enemies hands by the good help of his Uncle Dorax, with whom he fled over the River Bugrada, and came in fafety to Constantina (called of old time Cyrras) the ancient Seat of the Numidian Kings, but then a part of Dorax his Dominion; where he was honourably maintained and protected until the coming of Charles the Emperor, into Africa. The night enfuing this Battel, and the flight of the King, was reftlefs both to the Citizens and the Turks, each of them for fear of other ftanding upon their ftrongest Guard.

The next day the Citizens discouraged with the los of fo many of their Kinfmen and Friends, and having no King now for whom they fhould fight, craved pardon of Barbarossa for their rash attempt, excufing it by the name of Loyalty to their ancient Kings; offering to fubmit themfelves unto him with all faithfulnefs. Which their offer he willingly accepted, knowing that he was not able to keep that place with his Souldiers three days, for lack of Victual; fo that all his hope and Victory gotten, might eafily be overthrowen and brought to nought, if the Citizens moved either with deperation or desire of Revenge, fhould join with the other Numidian Princes, and befiege him in the Caffle. Whereupon a general Peace was granted, and by folemn Oath on both fides confirmed, whereby the Citizens exprefly bound themfelves to the Obedience of Solyman, and to Barbarossa as his Lieutenant. All things thus fet in order in the City of Tunes, and new Magiftrates and Officers by him made, he laboured by all means to win unto him the Numidian Princes; which when he had eafily brought to pafs by Gifts and Rewards with thofe needy Princes, of themfelves prone enough upon light occasions to make or break the Bonds of Friendfhip, he fent Afenaga an Eunuch, and Halis the Spaniard, with the Janizaries, and certain pieces of great Ordnance, to take in the other Cities of the Kingdom of Tunes; which they in fhort time performed, being in all places peaceably received, only the City of Carocenna held out a while, yet afterwards for fear of further harm received the Turks Garriſon. But to leave Barbarossa King of Algiers and Solyman great Admiral, thus poffeffed of the Kingdom of Tunes; and Muleffes in exile at Constantina, until he be again reftored unto his Kingdom by Charles the Emperor, as fhall be hereafter declared, let us again return to the Wars at the felf fame time undertaken by Solyman in Perfion himfelf in Perſia, perfwaded thereunto (as we have before faid) by Abraham the great Baſſa. Of whom a few words, that they which fhall hereafter live, may in him as in others, fee in what flippery place they ftand, and what flail affurance they have, which forfaking God, run headlong after thefe worldly vanities, and fwelling with the Favours of great Princes, are in a moment when they leaft fear any fuch fall, fuddenly overthrowen, and become the miferable Spectacles of mans fragility in the height of their fupposed blifs.

This great Baſſa called of the Turks Ibrahim, of us Abraham, was born in a poor Country Village near unto Perga, a Town in that part of Europe where Barbarossa lived, who in his Childhood was taken from his Chriftian Parents, by fuch as by Authority did take up the Tribute-Children of the Chriftians for the Turkish Emperor. A Tribute of all Tributes moft grievous. He was of Countenance amiable, of Feature comely, active of Body, well fspoken, pleafantly conceited, and sharp of Wit; fo that he in fhorter time than was thought poffible, to the admiration of many, learned both to fpeak and write the Arabian-Tongue, and other Languages ufed in the Turks Court, and could skillfully play upon fundry kinds of Inſtruments. And being yet a Boy, ferved Scanderbafſa, a man of great Authority and Power, in the time of Selymus the Emperor, in whole Service he was inſtructed in the Mahometan Religion; but giving himfelf to all manner of curioſity and nature, he was wonderfully favoured by the great Lady his Miſtreſs, and by her commended to her Husband Scanderbafſa, as a fit Page to temper his melancholy and wayward difpofition, with his pleafant conceits and devices; wherein the Terrific Baſſa finding him to excel, gave him as a rare Gift to Solyman the Son of Selymus, his Grandfather Bazajet yet living; who took in him fuch pleasure, that the old Emperor caufed him to be brought up in the Court, in all Princely Qualities with Solyman (who was of like years unto him) as his Companion and Playfellow. Where he fo framed himfelf unto the young Princes difpofition in all points, that he was of him always exceedingly beloved, and afterwards promoted to all the Honours of the Court, and made one of the Baſſes; giving unto him in Marriage the only Daughter and Heir of Scanderbafſa his Maſter, then dead, with an exceeding great Dowry. And after that made him Governor of Caire; where he had not long remained, but he was again fent for to the Court, as the man which gave thereunto life, without whom Company Solyman was as one half dead. At length he made him Vijir, which is the chief of all the Baſſes, and Prefident of his Council, the greateſt Honour in the Turkish Empire next unto the Emperor himfelf. And to honour him yet more, he delivered him his private Signet, wherewith the Turkish Emperors never ufed to truſt any but themfelves; he might at his pleasure grace and difgrace whom he would, in Court or elfewhere. What he commanded was done, and whatsoever he did was taken for well done. He might without the Emperors knowledge give any Office, yea the Government of whole Countries and Provinces unto his Favours; his credit with the Emperor was fo great, that he did what he list, and no man durſt preſume to ask any reaſon why. And to fay all at once, he wanted nothing of the Majesty of an Emperor, but the name only; in thefe virtues, he was commonly called the great Commander of all the Emperors Forces. His houſe in Constantinople was of all other moſt ſtately, wherein was daily to be feen fuch a multitude of his gallant Followers, and fuch a world of Wealth and Royal Furniture, as that might be worthily compared with the Palace of a great Prince. Neither was he partaker of Solyman Counſels in his weighty matters of State only, but of his fofter Delights and pleasures, alſo; if he were prefent, all was well; if he were away, nothing pleaſed; to be ſhort, he fo poffeſſed this great Emperor, that men commonly faid, The Soul of Solyman lived in Abraham. Whereat many of the great Men of the Court ſecretly repined; but efpecially Solyman Mother, and Roxelana his fair Concubine, whom of all Women he held deareſt.

This great Commander, which might at all times be bold to ſpeak what he thought unto Solyman, fought many times in his private Difcourſes betwixt them two, to perfwade him to forbeare to uſe his Forces any farther againſt the Chriftians, over whom he had fufficiently already triumphed, and to turn them unto the Perſians, by whom he was daily injured. Alluding to him, that the Germans were a ftrong and Warlike people; who as they both in Language and Manners differed from the Hungarians, fo were they always at variance with them, and therefore much cared not though they were by him ſubdued; but if he ſhould begin to invade any part of their Country, he ſhould then ſoon fee that invincible Nation with their United Forces Engaged in Arms, ready to meet him through Reſtance. And to provoke Charles the Emperor (of all the Chriftian Princes the mightieſt) were not good, who of himſelf was able to bring into the field moſt powerful Armies of valiant Souldiers out of his own Dominions; beſides the wonderful Concourſe of moſt reſolute Men out of all parts of Chriſtendom, which would not fpare to lay down their lives at his Feet in that War; which was of them accounted most Religious. Yea what strength both of Horse and Foot might be raised and brought to the battle by the two Brethren Charles and Ferdinand, only might (as he said) even then be plainly perceived, when as they valiantly defended Vienna, besieged by us with great Power. Neither did Charles afterward, as it seemed, and as the Christians commonly vaunt, fear to have adventured the fortune of a main battle with you; who although I doubt not but he should have been overcome by you so great a Monarch with so puissant an Army, a thing peculiar to your own good Fortune; yet I cannot deny, but that the Victory against such experts and resolute Soldiers, so bravely armed, as their manner is, must have been bought with a great deal of our blood.

Theft; things in my opinion may reasonably persuade you to let the Christians alone, by Civil Wars to weaken one another, that so afterwards they may become a prey unto us without any danger of ours. So that in my judgment the Persian War is to be taken in hand, rather than the Wars in Germany, and especially for that you have sufficiently enlarged the bounds of your Empire Westward, which you have extended even unto Nations very far distant. So that it is now a great matter to defend so much as you have already gotten; and therefore partly for the difficulty for the defending thereof, and partly upon an honourable contempt, according to the infinite bounty of your heretical Inclination, have thought good to bestow whole Kingdoms upon strangers, yea half your Enemies. Wherefore how much more glorious shall it be now upon just occasion to seek for that which together with your own Conquests, you may therefore easily be united unto your own Empire: if you according to the example of your Grandfather and Father shall force your self to drive that accursed and abominable Race of Imael out of Asia. For it shall be a great glory unto the name of the Ottoman Kings for ever, if you shall after your wonted manner zealously respect the cause of Religion; a Work of incomparable Fame, if the Authors of a most detestable Superstition shall by you be chased quite out of Asia. For what more just or honourable cause can there be to make War, than to profess your self the Defender of the Divine Precepts of our great Prophet Mahomet, against the wicked and irreligious Impugners thereof? And by the way to revenge and utterly to destroy the Capital Enemies of your Ancestors; which was the last prayer of your Father Solyman. Can you endure them which Rule so insolently, that they account every one that is near them their Enemies and Prey, and dare also with their piling levies provoke your Self, being contented within the bounds of your own Empire, to peace both in Europe and Asia? and they (forsooth) speak as have by most horrible wrongs crept into the Royal-Seat of the most lawful and noble Kings descended of the blood of Ullin-Cassanes? who after their wonted manner still live by Rapine and Robbery? Believe me, Noble Emperor, if you shall upon a zeal to your Religion with your Victorious hand take away this stain and plague of Asia, there shall undoubtedly be erected unto you so glorious and magnificent a Trophy in the midst of Persia, as may be compared, yea preferred before the Triumphs of your Victorious Father Solyman. For it is not so much to have destroyed the Mamelukes (by condition Slaves) and the proud Sultans of Egypt and Syria, as to have subdued the Persians, famous in ancient time for their Martial Prowess; who so oftentimes vanquished by Alexander of Macedon, gave unto him the name of Great. Solyman, pricketh forward with many such Discourages, daily found in his ears by the Basia, began to yield to his perswasion. Whereof Abraham himself greatly rejoiced; for it was thought of many, that he did never in heart renounce the Christian Religion, but was only in outward shew a Turk, and in heart a Christian. Which was the rather conjectured, for that he marvellously favoured and protected the Christian Merchants, furthered by all means the Leagues of the Christian Princes with Solyman, and laboured always to turn his Forces from them upon the Persians. And the more to whet him forward, the Basia had cunningly insinuated into his acquaintance one Mulacbe of Damasco, a man in that time famous in Constantinople, for the opinion the people had generally conceived of his Holiness and the Art of Magic; using him as a Prophet to fill the ambitious mind of Solyman, with assured hope of prosperous Success, which thing the hypocritical Wizard, after the manner of such Deceivers, slyly performed, prophesying unto him all happiness in so Religious a War, and so much (as he said) pleasing God. This the Basiaes purpose was much furthered also by Ulemas a noble and valiant Persian, who having married the great to King Tamas his Sister, was revolted from him to Solyman, fearing to be called to account for the Extortion wherewith he had grievously oppressed the Countries whereof he had the Government; and being wonderfully countenanced in Solyman's Court by the great Basia, did after the manner of disloyal Fugitives perswade Solyman by all means he could to take that War in hand, discovering unto him the Power, State, and Strength of the Persian Kingdom, and how the Strength of the Persian Kingdom (which he said could well do) and plotting unto him the easiest way for the conquering thereof, offering also unto him the uttermost of his device. So Solyman filled with the vain hope of the Conquest of Persia, yielded fully unto the perswasions of the great Basia, and gave out his Commissions unto all parts of his Empire, for the raising of a mighty Army for the performance of so great an Enterprize; commanding all his Captains and Men of War to be ready at the City of Nice in Bithynia at a certain day appointed. Which his purpose, although it was mightily impugned by his Mother, and fair Roxelana his best beloved, as that which altogether proceeded from the Basia; the one alleging, with what evil success his Grandfather and Father had before him attempted that fame War; the other assailing him with her passionate affections; but both of them indeed repining at the credit of the Basia, and in their hearts maintaining, that so great a Monarch should at the pleasure of his Servant be led up and down the World to far from their Company; for which cause they did what in them lay to have overthrown the purpose of Abraham, and to have altered Solyman's former determination. But so strong was the Basiaes credit with his great Lord and Master, that all these great Ladies Devices and Prayers were as Womens affectionate passions rejected, and the Basiaes counsel (to which no small grief) in all things regarded.

The time appointed being come, and all things in readines, Solyman sent Abraham the Basia, and Ulemas the Persian, before him into Syria with a strong Army, to be ready with the first of the Spring to invade the Persian King. Which thing the Basia gladly took upon him, and coming into Syria, wintered with his Army at Leppo; whither Barbarossa came unto him for his Letters of Credence to Solyman, as is before declared. The Spring now being come, Abraham sent Ulemas the Fugitive Persian before him with the light Horsemen, the fore-runners of his Army, into Mesopotamia as his Guid, because the Country was unto him best known, following not far after himself with all his Army. And marching still forward in that manner, came at length without resistance unto the famous City of Tauris in Armenia the greater, called in ancient time Ecbatana, as is probably by some conjectured, a great and rich City, but unvalled and of no strength; where the Persian Kings, for the pleasantness of the place, and freeness of the Air, used commonly to be resident in the heat of the year. From whence Tamas the Persian King was as then absent, bused in Wars with Kezim-basla, a Prince of the Corsine Hircanians; so that the Citizens of Tauris destitute of all help, yielded themselves and the City unto the Basia at his first coming. Tamas, who understanding what was happened at Tauris, drew near with his Power, warily expecting to have taken the Turks at some advantage, and so by policy to have defeated his Enemies, whom he was too weak to meet with in plain battle. Which thing the wary Basia well perceiving, for more assurance by speedy Couriers advertised Solyman of the taking of Tauris, and of the Enemies purpose, requesting him with all speed to repair with his Army unto Tauris. Solyman was then come far on his way with a great Army, not by the way of Anagya, Sebastia, Amasia, the borders of Trapezonda, and so over Euphrates at Arsenga, into Armenia, as his Father Solyman had done before him, because that way was thought longer and more troublesome; but quite another way, on the right hand from Nice in Bithynia, so Icomium and by Calcaria Matalahia, where is the notable passage over the River Euphrates, hurrying along the Valleys of the Mountain Assaurus, from whence the Plains of Mesopotamia (then part of the Persian Kingdom) begin to open themselves; through which Country Solyman marched peacefully with his Army, paying the poor Country people for whatsoever he took; and so in four and fifty days march, came from Nice in Bithynia, to the City of Coin in Armenia the greater, which is supposed to be built in the ruins of the famous and ancient City of Araxana. But hearing such News as is aforesaid from the Basia, he doubled his march, and so in short time after came and joined his Forces with the Basia at Tauris. Tamas (who yet daily expected the coming of the Georgian light Horsemen) understanding that Solyman was coming against him with a World of men, thought it not good to abide the coming of so puissant an Enemy, but with delay to weary him out, that drew such flocks of multitudes of people, to cut off his people, and spent with long travel, wanting Victual, and falling into divers Difficulties; as it commonly chanceth to populous Armies in strange Countries, where the change of the Air, with the inevitable necessity always attending upon a great Army, most times causeth grievous and contagious Difficulties. Wherefore Tamas to shun the coming of Solyman, retired further off into Sulania, about six days journey from Tauris. Whereof Solyman being knowledge, departed from that rich City without doing any harm therein; following after Tamas into Sulania, to joyne battle with him if he could possible; leaving behind him for halt, a great part of his Carriages and Baggage, with five hundred Janizaries, and three of his Sanazaks with their Companies. The City of Sulania was in ancient time one of the Royal Seats of the Persian Kings, but ruined by the Seythians Tamurlane, retained no show of the ancient Majesty, but only in the Churches by him spared. Near unto this City

Solyman lay incamped many days, expecting that the Persian King (in revenge of the injuries to him done, and for the safeguard of his Honour) should at length come out of the Mountains, and shew himself in plain Field, and give him battle. Which was a thing far from Tamas his resolution, upon the due comparing of his own strength with his Enemies, that he retired in such sort, that Solyman could by no means learn what was become of him, or which way to follow him.

The Country near unto the City of Sulania, wherein Solyman lay incamped at large, is on every side environed with huge Mountains, whose tops are to be seen afar off, always covered with deep Snow; these Mountains were in ancient time called Nyphates, Caspus, Contrabaz, and Zagrus, taking their beginning no doubt from Caucasus the Father of Mountains; and joyning one to another, some one way, some another, do divide most large and wide Countries. Whilst Solyman in those vast and plain Fields mott to fight a battle in, expected the coming of Tamas, such a horrible and cruel Tempest (as the like whereof the Persians had never before seen at that time of the year) fell down from the Mountains (which was so much the more strange, for that it fell in the beginning of September) with such abundance of rain, which froze so eagerly as it fell, that it seemed the depth of Winter had even then of a sudden been come in; for such was the rage of the blustering Winds, striving with themselves as if it had been for Victory, that they swept the Snow from off the tops of those high Mountains, and cast it into the Plains in such abundance, that the Turks lay as men buried alive in the deep Snow; most part of their Tents being overthrown and beaten down to the ground with the violence of the Tempest, and weight of the Snow; wherein a wonderful number of sick Soldiers and others of the baser sort which followed the Camp, perished; and many others were so benumbed, some their Hands, some their Feet, that they lost the use of them for ever; most part of their Beasts which they used for carriage, but especially their Camels, were frozen to death. Yet Solyman himself was in great danger to have been overwhelmed in his Tent, all the Tents round about him being overthrown with the violence of the Tempest. Neither was there any remedy to be found nor so great mischiefs, by reason of the hellish darkness of that tempestuous night, most of their fires being put out by the extremity of the Storm; which did not a little terrify the superstitious Turks; as a thing accounted of them ominous. And that which troubled them no less than the miseries of the Tempest, was the fear of the Enemy, whose sudden coming they deadly feared; until that after so tedious a night, the Sun breaking out the next morning, with his cheerful beams revived many, before ready to give up the ghost for cold, and gave comfort unto them all in general, by discovering the open Fields clear of their feared Enemies. It was a dreadful thing to have seen what misery that one night had brought into the Turks Camp; the ground lay almost covered with Bodies of the dead, and many lived but so, as that they accounted the dead more happy than themselves. Many of the Turks vainly thought, that horrible Tempest was brought upon them by the Charms and Incantations of the Persian Magicians; whereas it was undoubtedly by the Hand of him who bringeth the proud devices of Princes to naught.

Solyman

Solyman troubled as well with the strangeness of the accident, as the loss he had received; after he had a little refreshed his discouraged Soldiers, rose with his Army, and took his way on the left hand into Affria; Ulemas the Perfian perswading him thereunto for many causes, but especially by putting him in hope of the taking of Babylon; for that Mabometes, a Friend of his, was Governor thereof. But he when the matter came to proof, was not to be won either by Promise or Reward, to betray the City. Wherefore Solyman resolved to take it by force; neither did his Fortune fail him therein; for as soon as Mabometes understood that Ulemas was at hand with the Fore-runners of the Turks Army, and that Solyman with all his Power was coming after, (who as he thought would never have come so far;) he not provided to withstand so mighty an Enemy, and not beloved of the Citizens, fled out of the City. Solyman coming, in short time after was of the Babylonians received without resistance. The City of Babylon, commonly called Bagdat, rose out of the ruins of the old City of Babylon, so much spoken of in holy Writ; from whence it is not far distant, standing upon the River Tygris, which not far beneath falleth into the River Euphrates. In this famous City is the Seat of the great Caliph, the chief Arabian Prince, whom the Mahometan Princes have in great Reverence, and hath an old Prerogative in the choice and confirmation of the Kings of Affria and the Sultans of Egypt; of which Caliph, Solyman according to the old superstitious manner, received at his hands the Ensigns and Ornaments of the Affrian Kings, and with great bounty won the hearts of the people; and thereupon resolved to spend that Winter, by billowing his Army in divers places of that fertile Country. The other Cities of Affria and Meopotamia also, namely Caramidia, Meredimm, Orfa, and Asencsa, hearing that Solyman had without resistance taken Babylon, yielded themselves and received his Garrisons. Yet the same thereof was so great, that Embassadors came unto him as far as Ormus, a City by the mouth of Euphrates where it falleth into the Perfian Gulf, famous for the great Traffique out of India thither; suing unto him for Peace. Thus the ancient City of Babylon, with the great Countries of Affria and Meopotamia, sometimes famous Kingdoms of themselves, and lately part of the Perfian Kingdom, fell into the hands of the Turks, and became Provinces of the Turkish Empire, in the year 1534. Where Solyman after he had spent that Winter in great Joy and Triumph, according to the manner of the Turkish Government, placed a great Commander, which they by a proud Name call the Baglerbeg, (which is as much as to say, the Lord of Lords) and under him divers others for the Government of these Countries, by parts, which they call Sannacks, who are ever at the Command of the Baglerbeg. Whilst he thus wintered at Babylon, he caused Alexander Zelika (which is to say, Alexander the Noble) his great Treasurer for the Wars, to be hanged, for that he had unsuccessfully dealt in his Office, and confiscated all his Goods.

Tamas hearing that Solyman was gone to Babylon, returned to Tauris; of whose speedy coming the Janizaries and other Camps there left by Solyman understanding, fled in half out of the City, leaving all such things as were committed to their custody, for a prey unto the Perfian Soldiers.

1535. Solyman's Army being mightily increased by the coming unto him of the great Baffa of Caira, with the Sannacks of Arabia, Judea, Syria, and Comagena; by the perswasion of Abraham and Ulemas, the Spring now well come on, departed from Babylon again towards Tauris, with purpose either to draw Tamas to battle, or else to his eternal infamy, before his face to sack that his regal City. But Tamas advertised of his coming, and knowing himself too weak to give battle, forsook the City, and fled into the Mountains of Hircania; destroying all the Country before him as he went, and carrying away the Inhabitants, leaving nothing to relieve the Turks Soldiers, if they should pursue him. Solyman understanding that Tamas was again fled, sent Ulemas with all the choice Horsemen of his Army to overtake him if it were possible, and to fight with him. But when he had followed him two or three days Journey, and still found the Country desolate, and the soldiers finding neither Forrage for his Horses, nor Relief for his Men, and saw no hope to overtake the King; he began as a provident General, to fore-cast the extremities like to befall in his return through those desolate Countries with the Enemy at his heels; and thereupon in time retired back again to Solyman, declaring unto him what had happened. Who fretting in his mind, that the Perfian King was not to be drawn to battle, marched forthwith to Tauris, and without resistance, the Citizens submitting themselves unto him; whose lives spared, he gave that rich City for a prey to his Soldiers, who left neither House nor corner thereof unransacked, abusing the poor Citizens with all manner of Infolency; every common Soldier without constraint sacking himself with whatsoever best pleased his greedy desire. So that Tamas had in this City a most lately and Royal Palace; so had also most part of the Nobility their sumptuous and rich Houses, which by the commandment of Solyman were all razed down to the ground, and the greatest part of the best Citizens and beautiful Personages of all sorts and condition, at his departure thence carried away Captives. Solyman contenting himself to have done the Perfian King this disgrace, in spoiling his rich and Royal City, returned again towards Meopotamia, destroying the Countries all the way as he went, killing the very Beasts and Cattel, thereby the more to impoverish the Perfians, wishing to leave nothing unto them but penury and misery. He was scarcely past Coin and the Caldean Rivers (famous for his Fathers Victory against Hymal) but that certain Troops of Perfian Horsemen were in the tail of his Army, and had taken away some of his Baggage, and slain divers of the sick and straggling Soldiers, and with their often Skirmishes did not a little trouble his whole Army. Besides that, it was noised through all his Camp, That Tamas himself was coming after him with a greater Power of Horsemen, taken up in Hircania, Albana, Parthia, Media, and Armenia, and would be at their backs before they could get out of Armenia; for which cause he appointed the two great Baffas of Caira and Syria (for so they were called) and Ulemas the Perfian, with 18000 good Soldiers to follow him in the Rearward of his Army, to receive and repress the sudden Assaults of the Perfians, if need should require; and so still kept on his March, until he was come to Amida, now called Caramidia, an ancient City of Meopotamia. In the mean time Tamas the Perfian King was returned to Tauris with a mighty Army, in hope there to have suddenly surprised his Enemy, furnished with with the pleasures of so rich a City; but finding him gone, and beholding the miserable spoil and destruction he had made the City moved with indignation, he resolved to pursue him whither he would be gone, and was now on his way as far as Coin. Where understanding that Solyman was gone so far before, that he was hardly to be overtaken; and finding the noble Gentlemen in his Army unwilling in their heavy Armour to undertake such a pursuit, as could not be performed without the wonderful toil of themselves, and most assured loss of their goodly Horses; alleging that they were provided to fight a battle, and not to travel so long a Journey (all which, Tamas now that his choler was over, knew to stand with good reason) he changed his former determination, thinking it best there to stay and not to follow the pursuit of his Enemies any further; until that Delimenes one of his Noblemen (always more forward than the rest) offered with five thousand chosen Horsemen to overtake some part of the Turks Army, and to do on them some good service. Which his offer Tamas gladly accepted, commanding him greatly for the fame, promising him most honourable Reward; and so in half sent him away.

He forthwith taking the well known and nearest way, used such Expedition, that he was in hope to overtake the Rearward of the Turks Army (marching as he now before him) about the foot of the Mountain Taurus, as he did in fell out at a place called Bethlis. This Bethlis is a famous Town in the Confines of the Perfian Kingdom, where it bordereth upon Meopotamia, standing in a pleasant Valley, by which runneth a little River falling out of the Mountain Antitaurus; and had a Cattle kept with a Garrison of Perfians. In this Valley the two Baffas of Caira and Syria (conducted by Ulemas) thinking they had now been past all danger of the Enemies pursuit, staid with the Rearward of their Army to refresh their wearied Soldiers, upon certain knowledge, that Solyman with the rest of his Army was already come in safety to Amida in Meopotamia. And therefore lay as men secure, without any suspicion of the coming of the Perfians, whom they had not so much as heard any thing of in long time before. But Delimenes using most faithful and diligent Espials of that Country people, by that time he was come within one days journey of Bethlis, understood certainly where the Turks lay, weary of their long travel, as men without fear, keeping little or no Watch in their Camp: Whereupon he determined in the dead time of the night following to assail them in their Camp; and by secret Messengers gave knowledge thereof to his coming, and of this his purpose, to the Captain of the Cattle of Bethlis; requesting him at an appointed hour upon sign given, to be ready to fall out with his Garrison upon that side of the Turks Camp which was towards the Cattle. Which his venturesome designment was so furthered both by the darkness of the night, and the abundance of rain which fell at the same time, as if it had been wished for; that he was got with all his resolute Followers within the Turks Camp, before they were aware of his coming; where the Perfian Soldiers as Wolves amongst Sheep, did such speedy execution amongst the sleepy Turks, that the two great Baffas and Ulemas had much ado to get to horse and save themselves by flight. And such was the fury of the Perfians, and the greatness of the sudden fear increased by the darkness of the night, that the Turks not knowing which way to turn themselves, or what to do, were slain by thousands, some sleeping, some half waking, some making themselves ready to fight, and some to fly, few of all that great Army escaped the Sword of the Perfians. Of the five great Sannacks which were in the Army, three were slain, and one taken. Eight hundred Janizaries, laid down their Harquebuses and other Weapons, and yielded themselves upon Delimenes his word. The fierce Mountain people also, who in former time had suffered great injuries of the Turks, after the death of Aladules their King, had now joyined themselves to the Perfians, and to whose share all the Baggage of the Turks Camp fell for a prey. Which sight then well have been of aid to the Turks, which the Poet speaketh of the night wherein Troy was sacked:

The slaughter of that night was so great, that it is of the Turks until this day accounted amongst their greatest losses; and the Victory so welcome to the Perfians; that in Memorial thereof they kept that day (which was the thirteenth of October) as one of their Solemn Holidays for many years after. Delimenes returning all bloody with the slaughter of the Turks, and loaded with their Spoils, was of Tamas joyfully received, and honourably rewarded.

This Overthrow reported to Solyman by the two great Baffas and Ulemas, as men that had hardly escaped ship-wreck, so daunted his proud conceits, that he resolved in himself to return home, and no further to prosecute that unfortunate War; the event whereof, his Mother (as he said) had more truly foretold, than had the cold Prophet Mulearabe; but secretly in mind displeased with Abraham the great Baffa, by whose perswasion he had taken in hand that dangerous Expedition. By the way as he went he was met at Iscania by Barbarossa and Sinan Baffa firmated the Jew, a man for his skill at Sea in reputation next to Barbarossa. These two great Personages lately come from Algiers to Constantinople with the remainder of his Fleet, met him so far by Land, to shew their joyfulness for the Conquest he had made of Meopotamia and Affria, and to excuse themselves for the loss of the Kingdom of Tauris; which won by Barbarossa in the beginning of the Perfian War, was before the ending thereof again wrung out of his hands by Charles the Emperor, and restored to Mulestafa, as shall be hereafter declared. They with great humility declared unto him the whole process of that War, and with what Success they had endured the force of Charles the Emperor himself in Person; shewing plainly unto him, that there wanted neither valour in the Soldiers, nor direction in them the Commanders, but only Fortune, which as it mightily reigneth in all mens actions, so especially in matters of War. Solyman graciously accepted of their excuse, and courteously took them up, prostrate at his Feet, commending them for their valour in their evil hour, in a Plot so well by them laid, more than he did the Victory of others, got by good Fortune, not grounded upon any good reason; willing them to be of good cheer, saying, That that he would in short time find occasion for them to recompence that disgrace, and again to shew their approved valour. After long travel he came to the Strait of Bosphorus, where Abraham the Baffa going before him, had in token of Triumph caused the Shore all along the place where he should go aboard the Gally provided for his Transportation, to be covered with Perfian silk for him to tread upon; from whence he sailed with much Triumph over to his Palace to Constantinople.

The Countries of Affria and Meopotamia possessed by the Turks.

Envoy, the fatal and cruel Companion of Princes immoderate favours, had with her prying Eyes quickly discovered, in Court Solyman changed countenance upon the great Baffa, and began now to frown her gally Face. They which before were most ready to do him all Honour possible, were to have laid their hands under his Feet, fought now by all secret means to work his Disgrace and Confusion. But of all others, the two great Ladies, Solyman's Mother and the fair Roxelana, ceased not by daily Complaints to incense Solyman against him; the Mother, for that he had by his perfavation, contrary to her mind and her superstitious Observations, drawn her Son into the dangers of the Perfian War; and Roxelana, for that he most honoured and fought the Preferment of Mulapha, Solyman's eldest Son by another Woman; where as the above all things laboured by all subtil means to prefer Bajazet her own Son to the Empire, after the death of Solyman's Father; which her designment was perceived to be much croffed by the Credit which the Baffa had with her Solyman, and therefore did what she might, both to bring him out of Favour, and to work his Destruction. But that which most impaired his credit with Solyman, was the common report raised of him by his Enemies, That he being in heart a Christian, did in all things favour the Christians, (a thing most odious among the Turks,) and had in that cause craftily served Solyman to take in hand the unfortunate Perfian War. And that which more increased the suspicion, was, That he about that time had caused one Mark Nicholas a Venetian Merchant (who had not without suspicion of some, oftentimes came unto him with Letters and secret Messages whilst he lay at Babylon) to be taken in the night, and murdered at Constantinople, and cast into the Sea, because he should not discover any thing that might be hurtful unto him. Abraham thus brought in disgrace with Solyman, was (after the manner of the Turkish Tyranny) bid to a Solemn Supper, in the Court about the fourteenth of March, after which time he was never more seen. It is reported, That after Supper Solyman fell into a great rage with him, charging him bitterly, That he had misgoverned the State, inverted his Treasures to his own private use, and as a Christian, had secretly favoured the Christian Princes his Enemies; for proof whereof, Solyman with stern Countenance shewed him, his own Letters, which had by chance been intercepted: oftentimes asking him in furious manner, If he knew not that Hand, if he knew not that Seal. All which the Baffa lying prostrate at his Feet humbly confessed, and with many Tears craved of him pardon. But his hard heart was not by any prayers to be moved; for the same night as he was sleeping upon a Palace in the Court, overcome with heaviness, an Enchanted his Throat with a crooked Knave, which Solyman for that purpose had deliv'ed unto him with his own hand. He was murdered sleeping, because Solyman had in former times of his favour solemnly sworn unto him, That he would never kill him whilst he lived. By which Oath, the great Mahometan Priest held. He was not so bound, but that he might kill him sleeping, for as much as men sleep deprived of sense, so for that time not to be accounted as living, but as dead, mans life consisting altogether (as he said) in lively actions. It is reported, that after Solyman had looked upon the dead body, and bitterly cursed the fame, he caused a great weight to be tied unto it, and so cast it into the Sea. His Treasure and Goods, which were almost infinite, were the next day all seized upon for the Emperor, and a small portion thereof appointed for his poor Wife to live upon. His death was no sooner known, but that the vulgar people devised of him infamous Songs; and slanderous Reports, as of a Traytor most justly condemned; and in further despatch, with mire and stones defaced the Trophies of the Hungarian Victory, which he had in a stately manner erected before his sumptuous House in Constantinople. This was the woful end of Abraham the great Baffa, who whilst he stood in favour with his Prince, was of all others accounted most fortunate, wanting nothing but the name of the great Sultan; but after falling into disgrace, became the scorn of Fortune, and the lamentable Spectacle of mans fragility. He was murdered the fifteenth day of March, in the year 1566.

How the Kingdom of Tunes was by Barbarossa (the Turks great Admiral) taken from Muladies, we have already told; but how the fame was again taken from him by Charles the Emperor a little before the return of Solyman out of Persia, remaineth now to be declared. It was commonly reported, and not without just cause feared, that Barbarossa, possessed of the Kingdom of Tunes, and supported by the Power of Solyman, would the next Summer, not content himself with the Spoil of the Coasts of Spain, Sardinia, and Italy, as he had in former time, but with all his Forces invade Sicilia, the Granary and Storehouse of Italy, and from thence attempt to Conquer the Kingdom of Naples, which it was thought he in his immoderate desires had longed much after. To repress this his barbarous Infamy, and to work the safety of the Christian Kingdoms (much subject to the Rapines of the Turkish Pirates) Charles the Emperor resolved in Person himself with a puissant Army to pass over into Africa, whilst Solyman was yet buried in the Perfian Wars, and by force of Arms to dispossess the Tyrant of his new gotten Kingdom of Tunes. For the accomplishment whereof, he caused Soldiers to be levied in all parts of Spain, and came down to Barcelona, with sight thousand Footmen, seven hundred Horsemen, far looner than was by any man expected; amongst whom were many of the Nobility of Spain, with their Followers most gallantly appointed; but especially Ferdinand of Toledo, Duke of Alva; whose forwardness in that honourable Action, with the desire he had to revenge the death of his Father Garcias, slain before by the *Moor*s at Granapols, gave great hope even then unto his Countrymen, That he would in time prove a worthy Chieftain, as indeed he afterward did.

In the mean time Andrew Auria, the great Admiral, unto whom only for his approved fidelity and long experience the Emperor had fully communicated what he had with himself before purposed, had with wonderful diligence and celerity rigged up a great Fleet of Ships and Gallies to furnished with all manner of Warlike Provision, as might well have sufficed a great Army; whereunto he joynted also his own Fleet of seventeen Gallies and three Gallies, wherein he had embarked the Flower of Genoa and Liguria, who with exceeding cheerfulness had voluntarily offered themselves to follow him their old General in that Sacred Expedition. With

Andrew Auria the Emperor's Admiral.

With this great Preparation Auria came to the Emperor at Barcelona. Thither came also Lewis the King of Portugal's Brother (whose Sister Isabel, Charles the Emperor had married) with 25 Caravels, Ships with the Portugals used in their Indian Voyages, amongst whom was also one huge Galeon; all Ships well appointed and fit for Service, wherein were embarked 2000 Portugals, beside Mariners; there also arrived sixty Sail of tall Ships sent out of Flanders and the Low-Countries; wherein were a great number of condemned persons, whose lives were spared that they might serve in the Gallies. Unto this War Peter the Third of that Name, then Bishop of Rome, sent ten Gallies under the Command of Virginus Ursinus, the great Master of Malta sent thither his Fleet also. At the same time that all this preparation was in making in other places, that worthy Chieftain Alphonso D'Austria Vassius, whom the Emperor had appointed General of all his Forces at Land, had by the Emperors Commandment taken up five thousand new Soldiers in Italy, which were led by Hieronimus Tutavilla, Count of Sarno, Frederick Caracci, and Augustine Spinola, all famous Captains. The old Spanish Garrisons which lay in Lombardy, the Emperor commanded to be straitly looked unto, that none of them should leave their places to go into this new Expedition, but to remain there till under their General Antonius Leva; which worthy Captain although he would fain have had him with him, as of all his great Commanders the best; yet he thought it good to spare him, both for that he was much troubled with the Gout, and also for that it was necessary (as he thought) to leave such a valiant Captain with his Garrisons in the Country, for near unto the French and Swissers, whom he durst not so well trust as to disunfranchise that Country either of so great a Commander, or of the wonted Garrisons. At the same time Maximilian Eleutherius, an old Commander, came to Vassius with eight thousand German, over the Tridentine Alps to Milain, and so to Genoa; amongst whom were divers noble Gentlemen, who then as voluntary men served of their own charges. With these *German*s and the five thousand Italians, Vassius embarked himself at the Port called Portus Veneris, in Liguria; having before perwaded them, with patience to endure the tediousness of the Sea, and to comfort themselves with the hope of the Victory in Africa; where they should fight in the Quarrel of God, and for the Emperor, who did never forget his religious and valiant Soldiers. So sailing along the Coast of Italy, he came to Naples, where the Vice-Roy and divers other of the Nobility had of their own charges, every man according to his devotion or ability, built or furnished some Gally, some more, for that Service. It was wonderful to see with what cheerfulness the Gallants and lusty Youths of Naples, and all that part of Italy, came and offered themselves unto Vassius; so that it seemed there was none left behind in Naples; for he had with singular courtesie won the hearts of the old Souldiers and lusty Youths of that Kingdom, that both the one and the other thought it a most honourable thing to adorn, the one the before deserved Pensions, and other their first entrance into Maria Auria's, with the participation of so noble a Victory. But whilst every man was thus busied in ferring forward, certain mutinous Souldiers (weary of the Sea, and fearing the dangers of so long a Voyage) began to cast many Perils, to find fault with their final Wages, and to discourage the multitude; perwading them with seditious

Speeches to forsake their Colours, and to run away; for redress whereof, Vassius caused the Authors of that Mutiny to be taken and thrust into Sacks, and in the sight of the whole Fleet to be cast into the Sea. So Vassius departing with his Fleet from Naples, came in few days to Palermo in Sicily. The Emperor also looting from Barcelona, came to the Port of Majala in the Island of Minorca, and from thence to Corsica in Sardinia, whether Alphonso Vassius was a little before come with all his Fleet out of Sicily. Not long after, the Emperor, now that all his Forces were come together, passed over from Sardinia into Africa, and with a fair Westerly Wind put the Port of Utica, which is of the Seafaring men called Tunus. In the entering whereof, the Admiral Gally, wherein the Emperor himself was, by great mischance struck upon a Sand, and there stuck fast; which so much troubled the Emperor, for that his Father Philip had by like mishap been like to have been cast away upon the Coast of England, as he was failing out of the Low-Countries into Spain; however, by the good direction of Auria he was quickly got off the Sand again, and entered with the rest, to the great rejoicing of the whole Fleet. So profreely departing again from Utica, and sailing along the Coast, he doubled the Promontory of Carthage, yet famous for the ruins of that proud City, and came to Anchor before a Castle, which of a Well beneath it, is called by the name of Aquaria; or the Water-Castle. The *Moor*s, who from the Hills of Utica, or their Watch-Towers, had taken view of the Christian Fleet, and of the Courle it held, advertised Barbarossa, that the Christians were coming against him with an innumerable Fleet; for there was of one sort and other almost 700 Sail, whereof 82 were great Streamers, which gallantly garnished with Flags and Gallies, made a shew of more than indeed they were, and wonderfully terrified the Enemy. But that troubled Barbarossa most, that he was by Messenger upon Messing certainly informed, that the most mighty Christian Emperor Charles was in Person himself in the Fleet, with such a world of people, that it should seem he had left none in Spain and Italy that were able to bear Arms. Which News was brought by certain Mahometan Slaves, who getting loose in the Gallies, had in the night swome alledge, and reported the certainty of the Emperors coming; for the proud Turk, a great Contemner of the Christian Forces, never thought that the Emperor would have adventured his Person unto the dangers of the Sea, and chances of War, especially in an unknown, barren and forishing Country, but would rather have attempted to do something by his Lieutenants; or else by Auria his Admiral seek to surprize some bafe places along the Sea-coast, but not to come directly for the regal City of Tunes; in which opinion he was chiefly confirmed by Alphonso, a Gentleman of Genoa, who taken at Tunes, was kept as Prisoner at large in Tunes; of whom Barbarossa had learned many things concerning the State of Italy, the manner of the Christians, and strength of the Emperor; craftily feeding him with the hope of liberty, if he would truly declare unto him such things as he desired to know. Wherefore now in his rage he caused him to be brought before him, and charging him bitterly, that he had craftily and perfidiously told him lies for truth, concerning the Emperor, and therefore commanded him to be forthwith executed. When he had thus with the unworthy death of a guiltless Christian, somewhat mitigated the grief of his light belief, he forthwith began to cast with himself how he might best withstand his puissant Enemy. And first of all calling to counsel his Sea-Captains, in whom for their approved valour he reposed, that most confidence, he shewed unto them, that they as valiant men acquainted with the dangers attending upon honourable Actions, were not to doubt of the Victory, forasmuch as he saw it as good as already gained; for the same reasons for which he had before perswaded himself, that the Emperor (if he had not been half mad) would not have undertaken so desperate and doubtful a War.

la recognizeth his Soldiers.

For who is there (said he) that knoweth this Country (not to speak of our own Forces) which would not reasonably think our Enemies should in short time know the price of their ambitious desire and rash attempt? which in a most unseasonable time of the year, the days being now at the longest, and the Sun in his greatest strength, are come to fight in a Country scorched with heat, and altogether without water; where the very sand which riseth with every blast of Wind, flying into their Eyes and Faces, shall no less trouble them than their Enemies? Shall we think that they, which as I hear for most part are fresh-water Soldiers, and furnished with heavy Armor, can easily march forward, or retire, or yet keep their ground, as the divers occasions of battle shall require; when as the deep and hollow burning sand up to the mid leg, will not suffer them to keep any order of Array? How shall they be able by any means to abide the force of our Turkish footmen, or the often charging of the nimble Numidian Horsemen? And if they be so many of them as they say there is, where can they get Victual to feed such a multitude, if we do but protrait the War? Assuredly (most valiant and courageous Chieftains) we shall erect a most rare and incomparable Trophy in this Country of Africa; when as Charles the rich and great Emperor of the Christians shall either here be slain in battle, or else fall into our hands as a most rich prey. For mine own part, I will notably provide, that you shall want neither Weapons, Victual, or Aid, during the time of this War: I will open the old Armories, breach my Store, and bring forth my Treasures. The Numidian Princes now our Friends, I will without delay certain with great pay, and such Presents as shall be to them most welcome. As for the Citizens of Tunes, you know how easily they are to be kept in Obedience, and brought on against the Enemy for a small pay, and hope of reward. But this one thing is it that I most earnestly require of your approved valour, That you most valiantly defend the strong Castle of Guletta, as the most assured defence not of this City only, but of the whole Kingdom; and especially of our Navy which there lieth in safe Harbor; for that place will our Enemies with all their Forces first assault. Wherefore, as worthy Men never to be vanquished, keep that for Solyman and me, so that it being valiantly attempted by our Enemies, and resolutely defended by you, the Christian Emperor there failing of his purpose, and shamefully foiled; shall now begin to despair, not of the taking of the City of Tunes, but of his own return and safety.

When he had thus said, the Sea-Captains answered with one consents. That they would most willingly and cheerfully perform whatsoever it should please him to command; and in confirmation thereof, promised him not to do any thing which belongeth not most valiant and resolute Men. Amongst these Sea-Captains, Simeon of Men, a Jew, who had lost his right Eye, was both for his age and long experience in Military Affairs, of greatest account; next unto him was Haidimus of Cilicia, for his fierceness in fight framed of the Italians; Cacadiabelo, and Sale of Ionis, which two had before, in a great Battle at Sea, slain Rodericus Portenque great Admiral of Spain, and taken his Son Yago Prisoner, and seven great Gallies; after these, was Tachetochi of Lusitania, and Giaffer, a valiant Captain of the Janizaries; all which were notable Pyrats, and then Men of great fame. The strong Castle of Guletta standeth in the bottom of the Bay of Carthage, upon a point of the Land, where the Sea by a narrow Strait runneth on the East side of the Castle into the Lake of Tunes, which being in a manner round, is about twelve Italian miles over. But now that Castle is parted from the Main on the West side also, by the Sea that way let in; which chargeable Work was by Barbarulfa begun, but given over again by him; perswaded by some, That the Sea coming in that way, would in short time fill up the Lake with sand; but was afterwards for all that, perfected by others. So that now it standeth the manner of an Island, in the mouth of the Lake, divided from the firm Land by two narrow Strait passages; the one on the East, and the other on the West; yet so, that it commandeth both. This Castle Barbarulfa had before strongly fortified both with Men and Munition, as the Key of that Kingdom; but now upon the coming of the Emperor, he put into it his most expert and resolute Captains before named; well knowing that in the defence thereof rested the safety of his Navy which then lay within the Lake, as in a most sure Harbour; and also the greatest hope he had for the holding of the City of Tunes, whereon depended the whole State of that Kingdom. The Emperor lying at Anchor with all his Fleet near unto the shore, gave general Commandment, That his Soldiers should with as much speed as was possible, be landed with the long Boats; which was to orderly done, that the Moors terrified with the hideous cry of the Soldiers, making toward Land, and not able to abide the showers of small Shot, were easily beaten from the shore, whither they were come down in great multitudes, and so suffered the Christian Soldiers to land quietly. The first that landed were the Spanish Companies, after them the Italians, and last of all the Germans, whom Vasilius General of the Army caused presently to encamp themselves; bravely commanding, that no man should straggle from the Camp farther into the Land, until the Horsemen and great Artillery were all landed. The Emperor himself bearing Victory in the cheerfulness of his Countenance, landed also. In the mean time certain Companies were sent out by the General, to view the places nigh hand, and to fetch out the Cisterns and Fountains of fresh Waters thereabout, which sometime served the famous City of Carthage; with whom the Moors, but especially the Numidian Horsemen, a swift, subtle, and painful kind of Soldiers, oftentimes and in many places suddenly skirmished; and though they were but naked men, yet taking all the advantages they could of the places to them well known, with their Arrows and Darts furiously assailed them unawares, and overloaded with Armor, sparing no mans life that fell into their hands. Among whom was Hieronymus Spinula a Ligurian Captain, who overthrowing by a Numidian Horseman, had his Head cut off, and carried away by the same nimble Horseman, before he could be rescued. The like misfall befell Fredericus Carelius a noble Gentleman, who going with Vasilius to view the places thereabouts, was slain by his side suddenly slain with a small small flock. All which nimbleness and fierceness of the Enemy, could not for all that stay the Emperor, but that he would needs with a small Troop of Horsemen, in Person himself take view of the places thereabouts, even in the fight of the Numidian Horsemen, which were in every place to be seen pricking up and down the Country in Troops; although he was many times requested by his grave Counsellors, to leave that Service for his inferior Captains, and not to expose himself to so great danger both of his Person and of the common Folly. Vasilius had now brought on the Army near unto the Castle of Guletta, still calling up a rolling Trench as he came nearer thereunto, thereby to keep his men out of the danger of the Enemies shot; which work was not done only by the Pioneers and Gally-Slaves, but by Soldiers of all sorts; yea many of the Captains themselves laid their hands to the Spade and Mattock; for why, the Emperor was there a continual Beholder, and cheerful Commander of every mans labour and forwardness, and the busy Enemy was ever ready to take the advantage, if any thing were by negligence omitted, oftentimes falling out even unto the very Trenches of the Christians, there giving unto them proud words of defiance. When the Army was to be martialled, and every Commander to be appointed to the place of his Charge in this Siege of Guletta; the Count of Sarve (a man famous both for the honour of his house, and for the good Service he had lately done against the Turks) being requested of Vasilius the General, to have the charge of the Mount nearest unto the Castle, which as it was a place of most danger, so was it also of greatest honour. Whereat the old Spaniards (after the manner of their proud nature) much repined. Upon the top of this Mount, the Count set up his rich Tent in the eye of the Enemy, and there lay with the Italian Companies over whom he commanded. He had not there long, when Sale, one of the Turks famous Pyrats, with certain Companies of the Garrison-Soldiers, fellied out of the Castle directly upon the Mount whereon the Count lay; and by making shew as if he would desperately have assailed the fame, raising a great Alarm against the Italians; yet so as after certain Volleys of Shot discharged on both sides, he began to retire as if he had been thereto constrained. Which thing the Count perceived, being a man of greater courage than direction, in great rage with bitter words reproved certain of the Captains, whom he perceived not so forward in pursuit of the Enemy as he would have had them; and in his fury ran down from the Mount, the rest for shame following him, and overtaking the Enemies few divers of them. The crafty Pirat now seeing the Count drawn out of his strength into the plain ground, and perceiving himself strong enough to encounter him, suddenly turning himself about, laid unto his Soldiers; The advantage you wished to have of your Enemies is now offered, they are now in your danger; wherefore now show your selves valiant men, and suffer not one of these proud fresh-water Soldiers to escape alive or unwounded. Which he had no sooner said, but they presently made a stand, and so hardly charged them from whom they but even now seemed to fly, that the Italians were able longer to endure the fight, betook themselves to flight. The Count himself with Belingerus his Kinsman, fighting valiantly in the foremost of his Companies, was slain; many others indured the same fortune; others flying back again to the Mount, were slain there by the Turks; who resolutely entered into the Trenches with them so far, that they carried away with them the Place and Riches of the Counts Tent. Neither was there any of the Spaniards which lay nearest unto them, and might easily have rescued them, that would once stir out of their places to help them; for it is reported, that they were nothing sorry for the overthrow of the Italians, forasmuch as the Count had so arrogantly craved of the General the most honourable place, which he so evil held. His head and right hand were cut off, and sent by Sale to Barbarulfa. This Overthrow much grieved the Italians, whom Vasilius comforted with cheerful Speeches, imputing all that loss, neither to the valour of the Enemy, or cowardice of the Italians; but only to the rashness of the Count, whom he said worthily to have paid the price of his inconsiderate forwardness. But the Spaniards he sharply reproved as merciless men, which upon so light an occasion had given cause for the Italians to have them in distrust. The Turks in the mean time by the often shooting off their great Ordnance, shewed the joy they conceived of this Victory.

It oftentimes so falleth out, that whilst men laugh at their Neighbours harms, their own is not far off; and so it fell out with the Spaniards; for Tachabes another of the piratical Captains, shortly after falling suddenly out of the Castle in the dawning of the day, was got up to the top of the Trenches wherein the Spaniards lay, before they were aware of his coming, and there lay down as they lay asleep, some idly thinking of no harm, others as they were arming themselves; and with their sudden Cry, caused the rest which lay near unto that place, shamefully for fear to fly out of their Trenches; where the Turks taking such trash as they there found, and having slain and wounded many, amongst whom was one Mendofa a Captain, and carrying away with them the Ensign of Sarmatus which stood upon the top of the Trench, returned with Victory. The alarm raised in the Army was such, as that the Emperor himself came running to the place in his Armor, severely reproving them of cowardice, which had forsaken the place and grievously offended with them which had kept such negligent watch against such an Enemy, as was not for wiliness, agility, and courage, to be lightly regarded of the best and most expert Soldiers. This disgrace of the Spaniards did not comforted the Italians, to see the old Soldiers no less overcome in their negligence, than they had been in their unadvised forwardness.

This Tumult appeared, Vasilius called into his Tent the Colonels and chief Captains of the Spaniards, and spake unto them in this manner:

Friends (said he) elsewhere always valiant, who together with me, have by your invincible prowess gained unto our Emperor many most glorious Victories; why can you now at this time to have need to be taken called upon, and to be put in remembrance of your wonted and approved valour; for as far as I can see, the remembrance of your ancient Fame, is in you grown altogether cold, your hands are become faint for fear; and that which I am sorry and ashamed to say, you are grown I know not how, altogether out of order, and heartless, showing no courage for the subduing of these naked Pyrats. Yesterday (as many joy you smiled at this unadvised and unbecomingly forwardness of your friends, which they bought dear; but to day they worthily laugh at your degenerate carelessness; negligence; so that it concerneth you in Honour, to blot out this so foul and publick a disgrace, by some notable and worthy Exploit. Wherefore I exhort you, and

and I straightly charge and command you, that with all speed you prepare your mind, and weapons, for the achievement of some new honour: so that if the proud Enemy shall again presume to come forth and assault your Trenches, you shall forthwith break out upon him, and beat him back again even to the Gates of Guletta. Perhaps good fortune will so attend your valiant and resolute pursuit, that you may together with your disordered men, enter some of their Rampiers, wherein we see their whole hope consists; which if shall otherwise fall out, then is hoped, yet shall you by this your notable devotion wonderfully content the Emperor your Sovereign, and me your General, and withal, cover your late dishonour.

Whereunto they all answered, That they would so bear themselves against the Enemy, as that he should not desire greater courage or contempt of danger in men desirous of honour and commendation.

The Turks
sally again
out of Guletta.

It was not long, but that the Turks encouraged with their former success, after their wonted manner failed out again, conducted by Giasfer Captain of the Janizaries, a man of exceeding Courage and Strength of Body; who with the Janizaries and certain Companies of Moorish Archers, about the noon time of the day issuing out of the Castle, assailed the uttermost Trenches, hoping in that broiling heat to find the Christians in their Stations negligent and unprepared; wherein he was nothing deceived; for the Spaniards that burning hot time of the day, kept such negligent Watch, that Giasfer with his Janizaries and Archers, was got up to the top of the Rampiers, and there discharged their Shot and Arrows upon the Christians in their Trenches, before they were well aware of his coming. But upon the striking up of the Drum, certain Companies of Light horsemen brake out from two places in the army, one infant, as Yafiu had before commanded; whom he seconded with a Company of Halbadiers, keeping in readiness his Squadrons to rescue his Harquebussiers, if they should be enforced by the Enemy to retire; and in that order expected the event of the skirmish, which was most valiantly maintained on both sides. For the Janizaries, although they were enforced to give ground, yet (as men not used to flee, and for the honour of their order) withstood the Christians with no less resolution than they were by them charged; until that Giasfer their Leader, desperately fighting among the foremost of the Janizaries, was at once shot in with two Bullets, and slain; whose dead Body the Janizaries labouring to carry away, induced a most cruel Fight, many being on both sides slain upon his dead Carcass; yet at length they were enforced to flee, and so fiercely followed by the Spaniards, that they of Guletta, when they had received in the foremost, that out almost a fourth part of their own men, for fear the Christians should together with them have entered the Castle. Didacus Abila, one of the Spanish Ensign-bearers, advanced his Ensign upon the top of one of the Enemies Rampiers, and was there slain, but his Ensign fared by one hope to the Christians; that the Castle would without any great loss be gained; for being near unto it, they perceived it not to be so strong as they had supposed.

The Emperor having spent a few days in consultation about his farther proceeding, and preparing of things for the Siege, resolved without further delay with all his Forces to assault the Castle, perwaded thereto by many reasons; first, by the cheerfulness of his own Soldiers, and the Courage of his Enemies fore daunted in the last skirmish, which he was loath they should again recover by the coming of new Supplies; besides that, he was informed, that divers Companies of the Numidians were coming to Tunes, entrained by Barbarossa; whose strength was like daily to encrease; but that which moved him most to hasten the matter, was, for that his men began to grow fickly in his Camp, being all the day time scorched as it were with the fervent heat of the Sun, and well near starved in the night with cold and exceeding Dews wherewith they were commonly wet to the skin; neither was there either good Water, or fresh Victual by any means to be had in that place, and barren Soil, for the relief of the food, other than that was brought out of the Fleet; for all the Water thereabout was most unpleasing and exceeding brackish, so that both sick and whole were glad when they could get a Crab to quench their extreme Thirst; although the Emperor did what he might to remedy these extremities, and much relief was in good time sent both from Sicilia and Naples; the Bisk also in the Ships especially in the Spanish Gallies, was grown hoary and unwholesome. Wherefore he began to place his Battery about the fifteenth of July, which was defended all along with Gabions, and Casks filled with Sand, for that the Country Soil in that place yielded neither Earth nor Turf to do it. Auria appointed to batter the Castle by sea, divided his Gallies into three Squadrons, which, orderly succeeding one another, should by turns beat the Turkish great Ships in at Anchor, and out of their Forcibles thundered with their great Ordnance. And Yafiu at Land had divided the Army into three Battels; Spaniards, Italians, and Germans, every station by themselves, in such sort, as that they might indifferently be partakers both of the danger of the Assault, and of the glory of the Victory. There was never from place in the memory of man (since Guns, that fatal Engin were first invented for the destruction of mankind) afflicted with greater force, greater preparation, or industry. The great Ordnance in manner of a great Earthquake, so terribly roared and thundred, that the Earth seemed not only to tremble and quake under mens Feet, but even by and by to rent in funder and swallow them up; and the Sea which was even now quiet and calm, began to rise aloft, and to rage and foam as if it had been in a great Storm; at which time the Air became thick, and the Skie darkened with the smoke of the great Artillery: from the break of the day until noon, the roaring Cannon and Culverin never ceased; so that the Vamures were beaten down, the Castle made assailable, and the Walls so shaken, that in many places the Turks Cannoniers, together with their Cannon lay buried in the ruins thereof. Which thing perceived, the Christians were before appointed to give the first Assault, upon signal given by the Emperor, presently upon the ceasing of the great Artillery assailed the Breach, and others with their scaling Ladders scaled the Walls; which was done with such Courage and resolution, that the Turks when they had done what they possibly could for the defence of the place, by casting down Darts, Wild-Fire, and such like things upon the Christians as they were climbing up; at length as men despairing longer to hold the place, and overcome with a greater Fortune, turned their Backs and fled. Sinan and the rest of the Captains by a wooden Bridge, fled out at the further side of the Castle, into the Main, and along the left side of the Lake by Land to Tunes, not looking behind them for haile; which was most part of his men followed him also. The rest were either slain or driven into the Lake, where seeking to save their lives by swimming, they were either slain in coming to Land, by the Spanish Horsemen, or else in their swimming shot at pleasure by the Harquebussiers, so that all the Lake was as it were covered with the dead bodies of the Turks and Moors. The Emperor with finite Shot thus gained the Castle of Guletta, with all the warlike Provision therein, and with it all Barbarossa his great Fleet and strength at Sea, which for the more safety had before put into the Lake; which as it was unto the Emperor a thing most pleasant, so was it unto Barbarossa and his Pyrats the greatest grief and loss possible, having at once lost all their power at Sea, which but a little before was no small terror to all the Frontiers of the Christian Countries and Islands in the Mediterranean.

Barbarossa troubled and terrified with so great loss, with a stern and scornful Countenance received the Jew, and the rest of the Captains fled from Guletta, reviling them bitterly in his rage, and calling them faint-hearted Cowards, which had in so short a time given over so strong a place. Whereunto Sinan answered for them all, in this sort:

The Jews
answer of Sinan the first unto Barbarossa.

Hairadin (said he) so long as we were to fight with armed men, we did as thou wilt knowest, and our Enemies cannot deny, what well befamed us and thy magnificent Fortune. But when we are to withstand the Devil and his infernal Furies, which came against us with Flames of Fire, and Earthquakes, things far exceeding error and danger; it ought not to seem strange unto thee, if we sought to escape the uncatchy Fury of the immortal Enemies of mankind, to do thee service in thy better Fortune, in defence of this City and Kingdom. Neither do we account it any disgrace to have escaped that danger, as men that mind again to fight; out of which thou, a most ancient and expert Commander (if I may frankly speak unto thee the truth) if thou hadst been there present, wouldst have accounted it no dishonour, but very good discretion to have escaped in safety.

Barbarossa repressing his fury, began in a more temperate manner to request them every one particularly, as valiant and courageous men to stand fast unto him in that War against their Enemies the Christians; telling them, that he well hoped, that after the great supply of the Moorish Footmen and Numidians, which the Enemy should (which were now at hand) the Enemy should not long rejoice of the taking of Guletta. After that, he forthwith converted all his study and endeavour, to prepare such things as were needful for the War, bringing forth his Treasures, and bountifully bestowing the same amongst the Moors and Numidians, thereby to confirm the Friendship of such as well affected him, and with his new bounty to win the hearts of such as yet stood doubtful.

In the mean time Muleaffes the exiled King, with a final retinue of his Friends and Followers, came from the farthest part of Numidia, into the Emperors Camp; the Emperor sitting in a Royal Seat in the midst of his Pavilion, whereunto Muleaffes was admitted, with a Mitre upon his head, in a Garment of green and blew changeable Silk; he was of a tall and manly Stature, of Colour tawny, but so Squire-eyed, that he seemed spitefully to look upon them whom he beheld; whom after he had killed the Emperors right hand, and had set himself down with his Legs gathered close under him, upon a Carpet spread upon the bare ground, after the manner of his Country, he by an Interpreter spake unto the Emperor as followeth:

Thou art come in Arms into this Country, and art now almost Conqueror of the same (thrice mighty as a Numidian Emperor) provided thereunto not by any desert of thine own, for that our different Religion (so required); yet most high God, whom both thou and I do with like Devotion worship, take revenge of the most perfidious and cruel Tyrant and Pyrat, the mortal Enemy of mankind, whom I forsook as good as already conquered, now that Guletta is taken, and his Navy spoiled. So that I hope he shall in short time by thy revenging hand, at once receive the just Gouern of all his former Villanies; which shall be so much the more to my comfort, for that I hope the Fruit of thy rare Felicity and glorious Victory will redound in great part to me, being referred by thee into my Fathers Kingdom, which I as a poor child Prince most humbly request of thy Justice and Bounty. For it shall be unto thee a thing most honourable and profitable, if thou shalt receive into thy protection me, a King Royally descended of a most ancient Progeny, strengthened with the great Alliance of the Numidians and Moors. Neither do I refuse either to pay thee Tribute therefore, or to acknowledge my self Vassal unto thee the Christian Emperor. Of which my Fidelity there can be no greater assurance, than the thankful remembrance of so great a benefit received; which shall never remain ungrateful of me and my Posterity, even for that especially, that I do self and abhor the name of an unthankful man; and do well by experience find, how much my fate may be confirmed, and the minds of my People to me assured, by thy Garrison so near at hand in Sicilia and Sardinia.

Whereunto the Emperor answered, That he was come over into Africa to be revenged of the injuries which Barbarossa had many times done upon the Frontiers of his Dominions, and to root out the Pyrats, of all others most mischievous; which his good purpose had by the goodnoes of Christ his Saviour taken so good effect, that he doubted not in short time by the taking of Tunes to obtain a perfect Victory; which once gained, he would then kindly grant him all things which should stand with the convenience of his Affairs, and the use of his Victory; so that he would not falsifie his Faith, which he might justly suspect, if he reposed not a special trust, that the remembrance of such a benefit would for ever remain in his heroic mind; and was further assured, that the same power which should restore him his Kingdom of course, could also take it from him again, if his unthankfulness should so deprive.

Muleaffes in the presence of the Emperor used such a gravity and grace in his speech and gesture, as well declared, that he had nothing forgotten his former estate; but towards the General and the other great Captains he used all manner of Courtesie, so that he rid up and down with them gallantly mounted, managing his Horse, and charging and discharging his Lance with such agility and skill, as showed him to be a very good Horseman, and of great activity. At other vacant times he would subtly reason with learned men, after the manner of Averois, of the nature of things, of the Motion of Heaven, and Power of the Stars. By the Emperors commandment

he had a Tent appointed for him, and honourable allowance for his Diet. Vafius and the rest of the chief Commanders of the Army used him with all honour, and at such time as he was desirous to see the Camp, courteously brought him into all places of it, that he might himself see what Mounts they had in short time cast, what abundance there was of great Artillery, what strong Watch and Ward was kept, what a number there was of brave and warlike Souldiers of divers Nations, differing much one from another in Language, Countenance and manner of Furniture; and further demanded, Whether that puissant Army which the Emperor had brought over to his great good, were in his Judgment sufficient to subdue the Enemy? Where above all things Mulefais wondered at the number and order of the great Ordinance; and next unto that, at the wonderful plenty of things to be bought and sold in the Market place, and at the modest quietness of the Souldiers in buying the same. Not long after, the expert Captains by diligent enquiry learned of him many things well serving for their better proceeding in that War, especially of the disposition and strength of them of Tunes, of the situation of the City, of the nature of the Walls, and fortification of the Castle, of the Wells and Cisterns in the Suburbs, and what Strength the Moors and Numidians were of, which Barbarossa had entertained. In conclusion, he assured them (as afterwards it fell out) that Barbarossa would never trust to the strength of the Walls, which would easily be overthrown with the great Artillery; but would in a great bravery with Ensigns displayed bring all his Forces into the Field, of purpose to terrify the Christians with the sight of the multitude of his rascall Souldiers, and to break their array with his Numidian Horsemen, who with hideous and terrible cries, after the manner of that Nation, would fall to assault the City, and that all this would never bring into the Barril his Turkish Footmen (in whom he reposed his greatest confidence, and whom he desired most to spare) but would as a craty and subtil Turk, by oppoing of the Moors, whom he held in small regard, try by their blood what might be done without the danger of his own men. But as he told them, nothing could be more strange unto the Moors his Countrymen, or that they were more afraid of, than in a bat fought to fight with that Enemy, whose squadrons coming orderly on in glittering Armor with long Pikes, might scorn and easily overthrow the naked Archers of the Moors, and the unarmed Numidian Horsemen; and that our men should find nothing more grievous or troublesome, than the scorching heat of the Sun, and the Thirst rising thereof, which might easily be remedied by plenty of Water, which by Slaves and small Boats might easily be brought in Casks and Bottles from the Fleet along the Lake, and so distributed amongst the Army; although not far from the Walls of the City were certain old conduit Heads which would yield them great Plenty of Water, if the malicious Enemy did not to his own hurt and others, poison the same. These things orderly reported to the Emperor, confirmed the hope he had before conceived of the desired Victory; so that wholly bent thereupon, and carefully foreseeing all things, he relieved forthwith to depart from Guletta, and with all his power to besiege Tunes.

But whilst he was preparing things necessary, ordering his Souldiers, and discovering the Enemies purposes, his Souldiers had dayly divers skirmishes with the Numidians; so that once the skirmish was like to have come to a just Battel;

which began in this sort: The Moors had planted certain Field-Pieces amongst the Olive-Gardens, wherewith they shot continually into the Camp for removing whereof, the Emperor leaving the Italians, with certain Companies of the old German and Spanish Souldiers, for the keeping of his Camp and Trenches, went forth with his Horsemen and the rest of his Army; finding before him Montegius, General of the Spanish Horsemen, who for most part were but raw Souldiers, such as were of the Noblemen ordinary Servants and Footmen, not before acquainted with the Wars. These light Horsemen with divers Fortune skirmished a while with the Enemy; but when they saw themselves to be hardly charged, and Montegius their General grievously wounded, they turned their Backs, and in the fight of the Emperor shamefully fled to the Men at Arms, which were coming after them. The manner of the Enemies Fight was, to give at the first a fierce and desperate Charge, and upon the counter given, of purpose to retire, avoiding thereby the first daunt force of their Enemies, and by and by to turn again upon them with a fresh charge. The Emperor seeing the Flight of his light Horsemen, came on courageously with his Men at Arms; by whose coming in and valiant encounter the Turks and Moors were put to flight, and the Field-Pieces wherewith they had before annoyed the Camp, taken. In this Skirmish the Emperor in person, as he took forward in his armed Troops, gave the sign of Battel himself, by crying with a loud voice, Saint James, Saint James, whom the Spaniards take for their Patron; and so charging the Enemy, performed the part not only of a courageous Chieftain, but of a resolute and valiant Souldier also; refusing with his own hand Andrew Pontius a noble Gentleman of Granada, whom unhorsed and forewounded, the Emperor was ready presently to smother, had not the Emperor by his coming in saved him, and deserving thereby the Oken Garland, which the Romans by the name of Civica Corona, gave as an honour to such as had in Battel saved a Citizen.

About the same time it fortuned, that thirty thousand Moors came upon the suddain to have surpris'd a little Tower standing upon a Hill near unto the ruins of old Carthage; wherein the Emperor had placed certain Souldiers for the keeping thereof, because it was near unto his Camp. Before these Moors went a Numidian Priest, who bellowing out certain superstitious Charms, cast divers Scrolls of Paper on each side the way, wherein he cursed and banned the Christians; and now they had with Fire and Smoke brought the Christians in that Tower to great extremity, when the Emperor himself coming to their rescue with certain Companies of Horsemen and Footmen, flew the conjuring Priests with others, and put the rest to flight. The discomfiture of the Spanish Horsemen caused many men to think, that if the Emperor should come to a just Battel with the Enemy, he should find his Horsemen too weak, both for that they were but few in number, and not to be compared with the Numidians. For which cause, and divers others, the Emperor certain of the Emperors grave Counsellors, but none of the best Souldiers, wished him not to proceed further in that dangerous War, but with speed to return out of Africa, for as much as he had won honour enough by the taking of Guletta, and the surprizing of the Enemies Fleet; whereby he had to his immortal praise, and the common good of Christendom, delivered all the Frontiers of the Christian Countries in the Mediterranean, from the danger and fear of those most cruel Pyrats; besides that the Flux began to rage in his Camp, whereof in many of his Souldiers fell sick and died dayly. Whereas on the contrary part, the mighty Numidian Princes, such as were Mulefais old Enemies, were reported to come in dayly to the aid of Barbarossa. These unfeared Speeches the Emperor thought good to repress betime, reasoning against the authors thereof with great gravity, as against men who with more fear doubted of the success of things, and the event of the Victory, than befet them, whom for their constant resolution, and good opinion conceived of their direction, he had chosen to be of his most secret Council.

Saying, That he desired not of them that they needed, and dishonourable labour, wherein they should show themselves more careful of his person than of his honor; forasmuch as those things which they now alleged should have been said before the War was taken in hand, now by good hap half ended, before he ever passed over into Africa. For he might (as he said) have rested quietly in Spain, and have easily neglected and rejected the injuries done upon the Sea Coast, and the complaints of his Subjects; but he was (as they well knew) for most urgent causes come thither; where as he was resolved to satisfy the expectation of the world with a notable Victory; or if God should otherwise appoint, there to end his days with honour. Wherefore he would them to cease further to flatter him that was now dismayed, or to possess the minds of his valiant Souldiers with a vain forbidding fear, and with respect to his mind; together with him their Chieftain, against the next day to expect what the fortune of the War should appoint for the full accomplishment of that War. For he was (as he said) (let down to give the Enemy Battel; or if he refused the same, to batter the Walls of Tunes, not doubting but that God would stand on his side in so good and so goodly a quarrel.

The Emperor leaving a sufficient Garrison in the Castle of Guletta, commanded the Breaches to be repaired, and the great Ordinance there taken to be laid upon Carriages, which before after the old rude Sea fashion lay bound in great unwieldy pieces of Timber, with Iron Rings fastened thereunto, and could not handily be handled or removed to or fro. After that, when he had caused the Country to be viewed all about, which betwixt the Olive Groves and the right side of the Lake giveth a direct passage unto the City of Tunes; he set forward with his Army in so good order, that he did march as ready to fight, for fear of the Policies and sudden Assaults of the Enemy. On the left hand marched the Italians next unto the Lake; on the right hand the Spaniards near unto the Olive-Groves, which in the manner of a great Wood ran along the Country, from the ruins of Carthage, almost to the Walls of Tunes; in the midst betwixt both marched the Germans; next unto them followed the great Ordinance; and after it, the Carriages of all the Army. In the Vanguard was Vafius, whom the Emperor had made General of the Army, and especially for that day; in the Rearward was the Duke of Alva with certain Troops of chosen Horsemen; in the middle of the main Battel was the Emperor, and by his side Lewis his Brother in Law the King of Portugal's Brother. The Italians were conducted by the Prince of Salerno, the Spaniards by Alonso an ancient Captain, and the Germans by Maximilian Eberstein. But the Emperor in his Armor could not to ride from Squadron to Squadron, with cheerful countenance and full of hope, recounting unto them the former Victories which they had gotten for him; and telling them, that he did that day expect of them a most honourable day service, forasmuch as they were to fight against the naked Enemies of the Christian Religion; wherefore they should with resolute minds set down themselves to endure the Weight of the Armor, the painfulness of the March, the heat of the Sun and thereof; and the tediousness of the Thirst arising thereat; until they might joyntly Battel with their Enemies, where they should undoubtedly by the goodness of God (in whom they fought) obtain the Victory; in the mean time they should with patience overcome all difficulties, comforting themselves with the undoubted hope of a most rich Prey, which they were to expect of the Spoil of a rich City. Whereunto every Squadron answered with a great shout, that he should not trouble himself with those matters which he had before rehearsed, but to assure himself, that they his Souldiers would most patiently endure all extremities, and not deceive the expectation he had conceived of their wonted valour, but by valiant Fight to make him Emperor, not of Africa but of Asia also.

Now Vafius had withdrawn two Companies of Harquebusers out of the Spanish Squadron, to skirmish with the Moors, who continually followed in the tail of the Army; whom, by these Harquebusers and certain Troops of Horsemen deputed to that purpose, the Duke of Alva notably repulsed in the Rearward.

The Army was now come unto the Cisterns of fresh Water, which Mulefais and others which well knew the Country, had before told them of, as soon as the Souldiers almost fainting under the weight of their Armor, with the scorching heat of the Sun, and extremity of Thirst, despaired afar off, for they desired they had quench their Thirst, forthwith forsook their Colours, and disorderly ran as fast as they could to those Cisterns; Vafius the General, to the utmost of his power labouring in vain both by fair means and foul to have thaid them; who saw by that disorderedness of the Souldiers, a great advantage offered unto the Enemy, which then was not far off. But when the General could neither with words or blows prevail any thing with them, the Emperor himself was glad to halt thither, with his Prefence and Authority to have kept them in order; yet such was the force of their intolerable Thirst, that neither the sight of the Emperor, nor all that he could do, could remedy the disorder; some fainting in the Sand for lack of Drink, and some other for greediness ready to burst their Bellies at the Fountains; so that the Emperor was fain with his Truncheon to beat them away. Amongst the rest, one Sallustius Cicero of Arpinum, a famous Captain, died at the Cistern side with drinking too much. This extremity for want of Water seemed justly to have hapned unto them, forasmuch as Vafius the day before had by general Proclamation through the Camp, commanded that every Souldier should carry with him a Bottle of Wine or Water at his Girdle; although he caused so much Water as he conveniently could, to be carried in great Casks for the common relief of the Army, whereof the Germans had the greatest part; some almost ready to give over for Thirst, were glad to get a draught of cold Water of their Fellows which had it, for two Ducats.

This disorder being as with much speed as was possible reformed, and the Army again brought into order, the Emperor held on his march towards the Enemy; for Barbarossa with a wonderful multitude of Horsemen and Footmen, and a number of Ensigns (the instruments of vain fear fiar and foolish bravery) gallantly displayed after the manner of the Moors, was come about three miles from the City, and with certain Field-Pieces (as Muleffes had been told) went about to have broken the Battel of the Christians; which Pieces after they were oftentimes discharged, yet did they but little or no harm by reason of the unskillfulness of the Cannoniers. Vafius in like manner, and for like purpose had commanded the great Ordnance to be brought into the Front of the Battel; but perceiving what time and toil it required to have it done (for that it was drawn but by strength of men, and the Wheels of the Carriages sunk deep in the devouring Sand, and the Shot and Powder which the Mariners and Gally-Slaves carried altogether upon their Shoulders, came but slowly on) he suddenly changed his purpose, and told the Emperor, That he thought it not best to stay for the great Artillery in that cheerfulness of his Army when every man desired Battel, but to commit all to the Valour of his resolute Men, and his own good Fortune, which ever favoured his noble attempts; left whilst he lay (said he) too long upon our great Ordnance (which do not always serve to great purpose in sudden Battels) our Enemies gather Courage in the time of this our unnecessary delay; and this exceeding cheerfulness of our Soldiers (the most sure token of undoubted Victory) by deferring of time grow cold. Whereupon the Emperor, who was Battel, and filled with good hope, joyfully answered; Vafius, if thou to think it good (which I also like well of) in Gods name give the signal. That shall I by and by do (said he) but first it is reason that you which sway and command a great part of the World, learn at this time to obey him, whom to his great charge and shame, you, laying aside the Imperial Majesty of your self, have for this day made General and Commander of his mighty Army; wherefore (said Vafius) I will now use my Authority, and command you, first I may not to request you, to depart from this place, and to get you into the midst of the Battel near unto the Ensigns; left by some unlucky Shot, the whole estate of the Army be brought into extreme peril by the danger of one mans life. Whereat the Emperor smiling, willed him to fear no such thing; saying moreover, That never Emperor was yet slain with a Gun. For all that, he departed out of the place as he was commanded, and went into the middle of the Battel. Whereupon the signal of Battel was by the sound of the Trumpet, and striking up of the Drum, presently given, and the Enemy (with more haste than the extrem heat of the day required) furiously charged by the Emperors Horsemen, who to avoid the danger of the great Artillery, made all the haste they could to come to hand blows. In the foremost of these Horsemen was Ferdinand Gonsaga, a most valiant Nobleman, who then served the Emperor without charge; he being somewhat before the rest, at the first onset slew with his Lance a great Captain of the Moors, and presently with his Sword to troubled them that were next; that he opened a way for them that followed him, to rush into the Enemies Battel. The Harquebussiers also discharged to fast upon the Enemy, that three hundred of them lay dead upon the ground before the joining of the Battel; which the rest of the Footmen seeing, forsook their great Ordnance and fled back to Barbaruffa. Who long endured not the force or sight of the Christians; but grinding his Teeth for sorrow and grief of mind, turned his Horse, and with his Turks retired into Tunes. For now that his designs had in the beginning taken so evil success, he thought it not best to adventure all in one Battel; knowing right well, that the Emperors Army could not long endure the inconveniences of the intolerable heat and want of many things, especially of fresh Water; which fed him with hope, that he should out of these his Enemies distresses pick some fit occasion of advantage, if he could but a while defend the City of Tunes. The Numidians and Moors, who in great Troops and Companies had always hovered about the Emperors Army, without doing any thing worth reporting, retired themselves into the Suburbs, Gardens, and other places near unto the City.

The Emperor glad of the flight of his Enemies, which were thought to have been in number an hundred thousand, encamped with his Army that night in the same place where they before lay; determining the next day to batter the Walls of Tunes. In the mean time Barbaruffa, surprised with an exceeding fear, and distressed with many cares, and now become more cruel than himself, had in his mind purposed a fact full of exceeding and inhuman Cruelty; which was at once to have killed all the Christian Captives in the Castle of Tunes; fully resolved to put the same in execution, had not Sinan the Jew dissuaded him from that most execrable fact; protesting him a practise to be unbecomingly for a man of his Valour, famous for his many Victories, and carrying with him the Majesty of a King; wherefore he would shortly after wonderfully repent him for doing so shameful a fact; the doing whereof, What was it else (as the Jew said) but a manifest demonstration of his extreme fear and desperation? which two things were most dangerous to him, that was to maintain so doubtful a War, and would much deface the glory of his former life; wherefore he should be content to bear, that by the fame of such a most horrible fact, he did not provoke Solymán heavy displeasure against him, who devoid of all human Cruelty, had used both to detest and revenge such outrages. Wherefore he should suffer the Christian Captives to live bound in their fatal Chains, so long as it were their Fortunes; who being well kept, and unarmed, might shortly after serve him to good purpose, and could no way without most certain danger move themselves, if they should unadvisedly lift after their unlucky Liberty; for by them, the expected Victory could neither be given to the Enemy, nor taken from him, or yet so much as hindered. At which speech the Tyrant was affamed, and so sparing the lives of the poor Wretches, went out of the Castle, into the greatest Church of Tunes, whither he had caused to assemble all the chief men of the City, to tell them what he would have done for the defence of the City, and now by perdition to encourage them to fight; from whom, as men by him holden in distrust, he had but a little before the coming of the Christians, taken all manner of Armor and Weapons.

Whilst Barbaruffa was thus busied, the most joyful and happy day appeared to those miserable captives, by fortunes change no less black and dismal to the Turks and Moors. For a glorious purpose of the cruel Tyrant could not long be covered or kept secret; for that a constant report of a danger so imminent, was run through the whole Castle, even into deep Dungeons; by the compassion of certain manumitted Slaves, who detesting the savage Cruelty of Barbaruffa their Master, and touched with Devotion had in Heart returned to their old and true Christian Religion; incouraging by secret Speeches the chief of the Captives with whom they were acquainted, to lay hand now upon their liberty. Amongst these well minded Men was one Franca a Spaniard, whom Barbaruffa had from his youth brought up as his Minion, having him always in great Esteem by the name of Memo; and another called Vincencius Catevus of Dalmatia an Eunuch. These two adventuring a most memorable and godly attempt, for open the Prison doors, and gave Instruments unto the poor Prisoners, ready to take the occasion offered; who boldly starting up, broke off their Chains and Gyres, and so by the great goodness and mercy of God, about six thousand poor naked Christians, armed with dust came first in hand, but especially with stones, brake forth suddenly upon the Turks that were in the Castle. Ramadas a renegade Spaniard Captain of the Castle, stirred up with unexpected and terrible noise of so many Prisoners breaking their Irons, with a few Soldiers whom he had suddenly called unto him, ran to the Castle Gate, where one of the Prisoners (a lusty young Man of Sicilia) had with one of the Bars of the Gate struck down one or two of the Wardens, and having broken the Gate, was become Master thereof; him Ramadas slew, and opening the Gate, made way for himself and his few followers, with whom he went to Barbaruffa, to carry him the news of that his hard mischance. But the Christians now loosed from their Bands, and having suddenly slain divers of the Turks, possessed themselves of all the Castle, brake open the Armory, and so seizing upon the Kings Treasure, Armor, and Provision, from a high Turret gave signs of Victory to the Christian Army by smoke and false fires made with Gunpowder; and lastly by displaying of Sarmatus his Ensign, which (as we have before declared) was by Tahamusa taken from the top of the Trenches at the Siege of Gadara. These signs although the Christians in the Army could not well perceive, as being too far off; yet by the Fugitives which came oftentimes out of Tunes to the Emperor and Muleffes, they were both persuaded, that some great Tumult was risen amongst the Enemies. Wherefore the Emperor first two of his Captains with their Companies, who going as near as they could to the City and the Castle, should discover what the matter was. In the mean time, Barbaruffa almost mad for anger, in his fury blaspheming his vain Gods, and bitterly cursing and banning the Jew, for dissuading him from killing the Captives, came to the Castle Gate, with tears standing in his Eyes pitifully requesting the late Christian Captives (which then stood upon the top of the Walls and the Gate, with Weapons in their hands) that they would forthwith let him in, faithfully promising them their liberty, with a general and free Pardon for all that they had done. But they mindful both of their former and present Fortune, and moved with just hatred, cast stones at him, and with many opprobrious words rejected his request; so that he enraged with sorrow and madness, shot at them with his own hand, and seeing all past remedy, and the City not possible now to be kept, shamefully betook himself to flight. After him followed the Turks in number seven thousand, with purpose to flie to the City Hippona, now called Bona, famous for the Bishoprick of that reverend Father and great Divine Augustine. For there (as in a most free Harbour) had Barbaruffa left fourteen Gallies in the Lake near unto the City, to serve his turn whatsoever mischance should happen; but the Tackling, Sails, Masts, and Ordnance, he had laid up in the City, the first by which were kept with a Garrison of his own.

The Emperor understanding that Barbaruffa with his Turks was fled, came with all his Armies of the City were ready to submit themselves unto him, and to deliver him the Keys of the City; only requesting of him, that he would keep his Soldiers incamped without the City, and not to seek the utter spoil and ruin thereof; promising, that the Soldiers should want nothing that was there to be had. Muleffes also careful of the safety thereof, earnestly intreated the Emperor in the Citizens behalf. But he, although he was of his own honourable disposition ready enough to have granted what they requested; yet for that he did, not without cause, doubt of the Moors Fidelity, and that the payment of the Money which they of Tunes had by Muleffes promised for the payment of the Soldiers wages, was by them craftily delayed, expecting still the uttermost devour of Barbaruffa, he could not by any means be persuaded to promise them any certainty of their safety; moved also for to do by the discontented Speeches of his Soldiers, who spared not to say, That they should be hardly and unkindly dealt withal, if after so long travel and so much pains taken both by Sea and Land, they should be defrauded of the reward of the Victory, fish nothing but only the hope of the present spoil did relieve and feed them, being poor and miserable, having scarce Clothes to cover their nakedness, and their Bodies spent with long labour and thirst; so that the Moors of Tunes, Enemies of the Christian Religion, and the perpetual receivers of most horrible Pyrats, might worthily rejoice of the Christian Victory; and the Conquerors themselves for ever bewail their own calamities and miseries. Whilst the Emperor stood thus in doubt what to resolve upon, Vafius with a small Company to the Castle Gate, and was with wonderful joy received by the Christian Captives. But as he was viewing the Wealth and Provision laid up in the Castle, a Ligurian Captain discovered unto him where certain Treasure lay hid; for Barbaruffa had there cast into a Well thirty thousand Ducats sowed up in Bags, which Vafius getting easily out, obtained them of the Emperor of Gift, as he whose good service had well deserved them. The Castle thus won by a most rare chance, and the Captives taking the spoil thereof, the Soldiers could no longer be stayed, but that they entered into the City by heaps, running after the spoil into every part thereof; the Citizens fearing no such matter, and calling in vain upon the faith of Muleffes the old Soldiers at the first entrance flew away the spoil; but the Germans desiring more to glut themselves with the Mahometan Blood, filled all places with dead Bodies, without regard of Sex or Age, so that the prophane Temples of their vain Prophet, swam with the Blood of them that were flod into them. What furious execution continued until such time as the Emperor moved with the pitiful request of Muleffes, caused proclamation to be made, That no Man should upon pain of Death hurt any Citizen, or take any Prisoners; yet for all that, it could not otherwise be, but that many young Men and Women were by the Mariners (which were come to the spoil of the City) carried away to the Fleet.

Muleffes for a little Money redeemed divers which he knew, out of the hands of such as had taken Prisoners; amongst others, one of his Wives, whom he sometime held dearest, was ransomed for two Ducats. The Emperor entering into the Castle, commended the Captives, who were the occasion of that speedy Victory; and giving to every one of them Money, for their liberty, promising unto them Shipping and Provision to bring them home every Man into his own Country. Unto the two manumitted Servants of Barbarossa, which were the Authors of breaking the Prison, he gave Money and Apparel, and afterwards learned of them many things concerning Barbarossa his purposes, and secret disposition. In the spoil of the Castle, Mulicelli lamented the loss of three things especially; first, the ancient Arabian Books containing the interpretation of the Mahometan Law, and the Acts of the Kings his Predecessors; the loss whereof, Mulicelli at the hearing of P. Jovius, out of whom this History is taken) said (as he reported) that he would most gladly, if it had been possible, have redeemed with the price of a City: Then the precious Ointments and Perfumes, with the wonderful force of Ambergrize, Musk, and Civer, worth much Gold; all which, Barbarossa as a rude and rough Man had made no reckoning of. And last of all, the rare and rich Colours for Painting, which lying by heaps, were by the ignorant Souldiers, seeking for that might yield them present Money, foolishly neglected and trodden underfoot, serving no Man to good. In this Castle were found divers Head-pieces and other Armour of the Christians, namely of the French, who with Lewis their King, had about three Hundred years before besieged that Castle; which Armour had been until that time kept by the Moors in remembrance of that Victory against the Christians.

Barbarossa in the mean time came to the River of Bagrada, which the Moors call Maidred, which he easily passed over, though he was pursued by certain Numidian Horsemen, whom Mulicelli had raised of his old Friends, and of the Followers of his Uncle Dorax, and sent them to pursue the Turks; but Barbarossa so marched with his Harquebussiers and Archers placed in the rearward, that the Numidian Horsemen durst not come near him, and so in safety came to Hippa, as he had before purposed. Yet in passing the River Bagrada, he lost Haydim of Smirna, that famous Pyrat; who being a fat Man, and wearied with the heat of the Sun and painfulness of the Journey, drank too much, that he died presently upon the bank of the River. When Barbarossa was come to Hippa, he rested his Men two days; then calling them together again he comforted them with good words; perceiving them, that whatsoever mischief had happened, they should impute it not to the valour of the Enemy, but to the treachery of the Slaves; exhorting them, as valiant Men patiently to endure that storm of Fortune, and by some notable exploit to win again his Favour; for he was again determined to put to Sea with the Fleet he had, and to go presently from thence to Algiers, where after he had with new Supplies increased his Power, and augmented his Fleet, and better advised himself, he would take an attempt in hand answerable to their desires, and not unbefitting his own credit and estimation.

It is reported, that never vanquished and beaten Captains was with a more cheerful acclamation answered by his Souldiers, than he was at that present; they all with one consent, most willingly requesting him to command whatsoever pleased him, which they would never refuse to undertake, were it never so heavy or dangerous, so that they might be brought to some notable exploit. Barbarossa using this exceeding cheerfulness and forwardness of his Souldiers, did with wonderful celerity weigh up the fourteen Gallies which he had sunk in the Lake, and forthwith rigged them up, and furnished them for all affairs; and upon the very brink of the Lake cast up a Mount of earth, whereon he placed certain pieces of Artillery for defence of the Harbour, not vainly conjecturing, that the Christian Fleet would in short time come thither to impeach his going out; pointing therein as it were at the purpose of the Emperor and Asia his Admiral, who were of opinion, that by sailing part of the Fleet thither, those Gallies might be drowned in the Harbour with the great Ordinance, before they could be rigged and made ready. Unto this piece of service Asuria appointed one Adam, a Captain of Genoa, a Man of no great skill in matters at Sea, but yet of great wealth and credit, and the Admirals kin Kinsman; he with certain Gallies and fourteen Gallies, set forward towards Hippa, promising unto himself a most certain and easy Victory, hoping to purchase unto himself great Honour of the unprovided Enemy; for that he thought to have taken Barbarossa busie in setting forth of his Fleet. But after he was past Biserta, and came near to Hippa, he was certainly advertised, that Barbarossa had with incredible celerity rigged up his Gallies, and fortified the Harbour, by planting great Ordnance upon the Mount he had there raised. With which news he wonderfully troubled, changed his purpose, perceiving by the other Captains of the Gallies, in no case to adventure to fight with him, because the Spanish, Sicilian, and Neapolitan Gallies were but weakly manned, many of the Souldiers being for greediness of the Spoil gone ashore without leave at Tunes; so that he should at great disadvantage fight with the Turks, being more in number and desperately bent. Wherefore he upon good advice presently changed his former purpose, and returned to the Fleet for more Aid. (as it was afterwards known) flood a good while in doubt, whether he should in hope of Victory pursue those Gallies, forasmuch as they were in number no more than his own, or else to persist in his former purpose of going to Algiers. Unto which opinion all the under Captains inclined, being altogether ignorant of the weakness of the Christians; and to letting slip a fair occasion, leaving a small Garrison of Turks in the Castle, he departed from Hippa and sailed along the Coast to Algiers. When Adam was returned again to the Fleet, and had done nothing, many of the Christian Princes were wonderfully offended, that by the negligence of some who were hardly to be commanded, and by the unskillfulness of others who without leave were gone ashore, so fair an occasion of the desired Victory, was neglected. For this thing only wanted unto the Emperor rare felicity in that War; for if those few Gallies had been taken from the cruel Enemy, or sunk in the Sea, there had been no means for him to have escaped; being verily thought, that the Numidians in number infinite, and deadly Enemies unto the Turks, would with often Skirmishes out of their known places of advantage, have so cut him off in his long and painful travel by Land, that they would altogether have made an end both of him and his followers before he could have come to Algiers. Asuria angry both with himself and those whom he had put in trust, and yet not out of hope to overtake his Enemy, with his own Gallies and some other of the best Ships went to Hippa; but finding Barbarossa gone, he took the City, and overthrew the Walls thereof; but in the Castle which he by force took: from the Turks, he placed placed Alvorus Gometius with a sufficient Garrison, and so returned unto the Emperor. Thur Gometius, although he was a most valiant Captain, yet became so infamous for his avaritious dealing both with the Enemy and his Friends, that for fear how to answer such things as he knew would be laid to his charge, he became the infamous Executioner of himself. The Castle was afterwards by the commandment of the Emperor, raised down to the ground, for that it was not without a marvelous charge to be kept. After that, a Council was holden concerning Adula, whom the Emperor placed again in the Kingdom of Tunes, there to Reign as his Ancestors had done before him; paying him yearly by the name of Tribute, two Falcons, and two Numidian Couriers; with condition, that he should for ever honour the Emperor, and be a Friend unto all Christians, and an utter Enemy unto the Turks. Besides that, that he should from time to time defray the charges of a thousand Spaniards and more, to be left in Garrison in the Castle of Guletta; by holding whereof, the Emperor kept as it were the Keys of that Kingdom at his Girdle. The Emperor having thus honourably driven Barbarossa and the Turks Pyrats out of Tunes, taken from them their Gallies, delivered the Christian Countries (all along the Sea Coast into the Mediterranean) of a great fear, and restored Adula again to his Kingdom, failed into Sicilia, where he was in great Triumph received at Panormia and Adelfa, from whence he passed over to Rhigium in Italy, and from thence by Land to Naples. Thus was the Kingdom of Tunes taken by Barbarossa and the Turks; and by Charles the Emperor recovered again out of their hands the self-same time that Solyman was in Person himself in Wars against the Persians; whom Barbarossa accompanied with Sinan the Jew after this overthrow met at Iscium in his return out of Perfia, well accepting of their excuse, as is before declared.

Solyman as well of his own ambitious disposition, as following the manner of the Ottoman Kings, desirous by all means to encrease the glory of his Name, and to enlarge his Empire, determined with himself to take away from the Portugals all their Traffick into the East Indies. It grieved him to hear, that the Christian Religion should begin to take root amongst the Pagan Kings, which had not long before received the Mahometan Religion; Besides that, he was credibly informed, that the Portugals in these late Wars he had against the Persians, had aided them with certain Harquebussiers, and also had sent them Work-men to shew them both the making and use of great Artillery. But that which moved him most of all, was for that the Portugals by their Traffick into the Indies, had cut off all the Trade of Merchandise into the Gulf of Arabia, whereby the Riches of the East were wont to be transported unto Caire, and so to Alexandria, from whence they were afterwards by the Venetian Merchants and others dispersed into all parts of Europe; but now were carried by the great Ocean into Portugal, and from thence conveyed into all parts of Christendom, to the great hindrance of his Tribute and the influence of Egypt. For these causes, and at the instance of Solyman Bassa an Eunuch, born in Epirus, and then Governor of Egypt; Solyman caused wonderful preparation to be made, for the building of a great Fleet in the Red Sea, to go against the Portugals. All the Timber whereof was cut down in the Mountains of Cilicia, and Shipped in the Bay of Attalia in the bottom of the Mediterranean, from whence it was by Sea transported to Pelusium, and so up the River of Nile to Caire; where after it was framed and ready to be set afloat; together, it was with infinite labour, and no less charge, carried by Land with Camels through that hot and sandy Country, from Caire to Suetia, a Port of the Red Sea, called in ancient time Arifome. From which place, eight miles distant from Caire, the ancient Kings of Egypt, seeking by vain and wonderful works to eternise the memory of themselves, had with incredible charge cut through all that main Land; so that Vessels of good burthen might come up the fame from Arifome to Caire; which great Cut or Ditch, Seftria the rich King of Egypt, and long after him Amos Pharaoh, purposed to have made a great deal wider and deeper, and thereby to have led the Red Sea into the Mediterranean, for the readier transportation of the Indian Merchandise to Caire and Alexandria. Which mad work, Seftria prevented by death could not perform; and Pholomus otherwise perished by skillful Men, in time gave over for fear least by letting in the great South Sea into the Mediterranean, he should thereby as it were with another general Deluge have drowned the greatest part of Grecia, and many other goodly Countries in Asia, and with exceeding charge, in stead of Honour, have purchased himself eternal Infamy. Yet by the singular industry of Solyman the Eunuch, who with severe commandment enforced all the people of the Countries thereabouts to the furtherance of the building of that Fleet; he had with wonderful celerity in short time new built eighty ships and Gallies at Arifome, and furnished them with Men, and all things else needful for so long a Voyage. At which time, he upon a quarrel pick without cause, but not without the good liking of Solyman, most injuriously confiscated the Goods of the Venetian Merchants at Alexandria and Caire, which he thrust the Mariners into his Gallies as Slaves. With which Fleet in most Warlike manner appointed, Solyman the Bassa, accompanied with Aljam-Beg, commonly called the Admiral of Alexandria, a most famous Pyrat and an excellent Seaman; far forward against the Portugals, and sailing through the Red Sea, and so Eastward by the Gulf of Perfia, came at length as far as the great River Indus; where with all his power he Assaulted Dum a Castle of the Portugals situate upon the mouth of that great River; but in conclusion, after he had many days besieged the Castle both by Sea and Land, and tried the utmost term of his strength, he was so repulsed by the Portugals, that he was glad to forsake the Siege, and leaving his great Ordnance behind him for lost, returned back again to Aden, a City of great Trade in Arabia Felix; where discouraged with the little success he had against the Portugals, because he would be thought to have done something, he altered the King of that rich City to come unto him, upon his faith Faith before given for his safe return; but as soon as he had him aboard, he like a perjured wretch hanged him up at the Yards-arm of his Admirals Gallies, and so surprising the City, enriched himself with the spoil thereof. The like barbarous cruelty he used at Zelph, another famous Port of Arabia, where the Pilgrims of the East do commonly Land when they after the manner of their false Prophet at Mecca do visit the Temple of place together with his nobility he cruelly murdered, contrary to his Faith given; and so travelling himself by Land to Mecca, as if he had been some devout Pilgrim, sent back his Fleet by the Moor to Suetia, having performed against the Portugals nothing at all.

At the same time Solyman by the perswasion of Lutius and Alix (the Baffes of greatest authority about him, now that Abraham was dead) turned all his Forces from the Persians, as Men agreed with him in the chief points of his Mahometan Superstition, with purpose to convert the fame upon Italy; whereunto he was earnestly solicited by John Forrest the French Kings Embassador, then lying at Constantinople of purpose to incite Solyman against Charles the Emperor, assuring him that he was not of such power, as at one time to defend Apulia against him, and the Dukedom of Melfa against the French King, who (as he said) was determined that Summer to invade that part of Italy. And to further the matter, about the same time one Troilus Pignatellus, a noble Gentleman, sometime Commander in Charles the Emperors Army, but then exiled out of Naples, fled unto Solyman; and forsomuch as he was a Man of name, and like to do him great service in the invasion of Apulia, and which knew the Country well and promised unto him good success in that War, was by Solyman honourably entertained amongst his Murfaracs; which is a certain Company of Horsemen for their approved Valour, chosen out of all Nations; having the free exercise of their Religion whatever without controulment, and are only bound to attend upon the Person of the great Turk when he goeth to War. The cause of his revolt was, that the Viceroy of Naples had executed Andrew his Brother, one of the Knights of the Rhodes. But being now grown into great favour with Solyman and the Baffes, and oftentimes called to counsel in the preparation of that War, cutting off all natural love of his Country, ceased not by all means to persuade Solyman to invade the same; assuring him, that the People of Apulia and Salerno, oppressed with grievous Tributes exacted by the Emperor's Officers, would at the first revolt, especially if they saw any of the French Nation to cleave unto. And that which moved him more than all the rest, the ancient Turks told him into what a fear all Italy was trucken, at such time as Achmetes the Baffa having taken Hydruntum, had undoubtedly conquered not only the Kingdom of Naples, but the City of Rome also, and all the rest of Italy, had now the untimely death of Abraham his great Grandfather interrupted the course of that Victory. Which perswasions wrought such effect in Solyman, that he, once fully resolved for the Invasion of Italy, made such expedition both by Sea and Land, that he himself in Person was come with two hundred thousand Men unto Aulona, the most convenient Port for Macedon for the transporting of his Army, before it was thought in Italy that he was set forward from Constantinople, where he had not long staid, but Lutius Baffa his Admiral, accompanied with Barbarulla, sailing along the Coast of Peloponnesus and Epirus, and so passing by Coreya, where Hieronimus Pisaurius, Admiral of the Venetian Fleet lay with his Gallies (after mutual salutation done after the manner at Sea, by shooting off their great Pieces in token of friendship) put into the Haven of Aulona also. Solyman not purposing to close any time, and having John now in his sight, commanded Lutius and Barbarulla to pass over with the Fleet unto Oranto, and to prove the minds of the people; that if the first enterprise tell out well, he might presently follow after with all his Army. With them went also Troilus Pignatellus, as forward to the destruction of his Country, as any of the rest. He knowing that the great Cities of Hydruntum and Brendusium were kept with strong Garrisons of

Charles the Emperor; leaving Hydruntum on the right hand, directed the Turks to a Town upon the Sea Coast, eight miles off, called Caprunum near unto which standeth a Castle upon a Hill then belonging to Mercutinus Catinaris; who being a Man unacquainted with Wars, and terrified with the suddain coming of the Turks, and periwaded by Troilus, yielded up his Castle, upon condition, that the Turks should offer no violence or injury unto him or his, either in body or goods. Upon which condition the Town of Caprunum was also delivered unto him. But the Turks, especially the greedy Mariners, being got into the Castle and the Town, moved neither with the intreaty of Troilus, nor the commandment of Lutius and Barbarulla, rifled the Town and Castle, and carried away with them Mercutinus himself, with all the flour of the people, to their Gallies as Prisoners. But Lutius ashamed of such faithless dealing, presently set Mercutinus at liberty again. At the same time also, Solyman had by night sent over certain Troops of light Horsemen, in great Palanders; which running all along the Sea Coast from Tarentum to Brendusium, carried away with them both the People and Cattel, and whatsoever else came in their way by the space of forty miles. So that all the Country of Salentinum, now called Otranto, was filled with fear and danger; and had not there stayed, but was like enough to be overwhelmed all Italy, by the coming over of Solyman with his whole Army, had not the rashness of one Venetian Captain by unexpected chance turned that Tempest from the Italians upon the Venetians themselves.

Alexander Contarinius, a valiant Captain of the Venetians, meeting with certain of the Turks Gallies, which would neither vail their top Sails, nor in token of reverence to the Emperor, charge any of their great Ordnance, as so duty they ought to have done in those Seas where the Venetians commanded; offended with their proud insolency, fiercely assailed them, and in light funke two of them; wherein Ufameus Governor of Calipolis, a Man of no small reputation among the Turks, was reported to have perished. Which outrage done by Contarinius in a most unfit time (to the great hurt of the Venetian Estate, as it appeared afterward) was imputed to his own private grudge which he bare against the Turks, for that they intercepted a Ship of his as the was coming out of the East Countries laden with rich Merchandise; so that it was thought, that he to please himself in revenging of his own private injury, regarded not what in that dangerous time might ensue therefore to the common State.

A little before the coming over of the Turks into Italy, Andreas Auria the Emperors Admiral lying at Melfa in Sicilia, understanding that Solyman was come with his Army to Aulona, and that his Fleet was arrived there also, put to Sea, directing his course towards the Islands of Cephalenia and Zacynthus, hoping (indeed as it fell out) to meet with the tail of the Turks Fleet; for there according to his expectation he chanced upon divers of the Turks Viduallers, whom he easily took. The Mariner he charged with his own Gallies for Slaves, and furnishing his Fleet with the Vidual which was not for him provided, fired the Ships. Whilst Auria was thus beating to and fro in the Ionian Sea, it fortuned that Solyman sent Junius his chief Interpreter, a Man whom he made no small account of, with two Gallies on a Message to Lutius his Admiral. This proud Turk coming near unto Coreya, where the Venetian Admiral lay with his Fleet, offered scornfully to pass without valuing, whilst his pride tending to the disgrace of the Venetians, certain of the Venetian Captains not enduring, fell upon him with such fury, that the Turks were enforced to run both their Gallies on shore upon the Coast of Epirus, near unto the Mountains called Acerocraunus, where having escaped the danger at Sea, they fell almost all into the hands of the cruel Mountain people, living for the most part by Theft, and waiting for Wrecks, as Hawks for their prey; by these means the Turks were first of all they had, and Junius himself with much ado redeeming himself out of their hands, returned to Solyman. Auria falling along the Sea Coast, chanced upon these Gallies, and finding them fore bruised, fell fire on them.

For these unkind parts, the Turks were wonderfully offended with the Venetians, and grievously complained of them by Solyman; although the Venetian Admiral laboured by all means he could to appease Junius, and to excuse the matter, as a thing done by great oversight on both sides. Upon these small occasions, the Turks fought to break off the League with the Venetians; which fell out so much the sooner, for that about the same time Auria failing up and down the Ionian Sea, and diligently looking into every Harbour to intercept such as fringed from the Turk Fleet, happened by night to light upon twelve of Solyman's great Gallies near unto Aulona, all filled with his Janizaries and choice Horsemen of the Court, the best Soldiers of the Turks, who had by Land sent their Horses to the Camp by their Lacks, and were coming themselves with the Janizaries by Sea. Auria falling upon these Gallies, had with them a cruel and deadly Fight for they as resolute Men, without regard to die, or yield to their Enemies, with invincible courage maintained a most bloody Fight against Auria with his thirty Gallies excellently appointed, until such time as most part of them were slain, and the rest were wounded; who seeing no remedy, but that they must needs come into the hands of their Enemies, threw their Scimiters overboard, because those choice Weapons should not come into the hands of the Christians. In this conflict, Auria lost also many of his best Soldiers; yet having got the Victory, and possessed of the Gallies, he anchored near unto Coreya, there to take view of his own harms and the Enemies; but whilst he rid there at Anchor, he was advertised, that Barbarulla was coming against him with eighty Gallies. Wherefore knowing himself too weak to encounter so strong an Enemy, he departed thence, and returned again to Melfa to repair the Fleet. Solyman thoroughly chafed with the loss of his Gallies and best Soldiers, and with the double injury done unto him by the Venetians, fell into such a rage, that he cursed Barbarulla, as one who in these Wars had done him no good service; and thundred out grievous threats against the Venetians, saying, He was under the colour of an ancient League, by them deceived and greatly abused, and that they were secretly considered with Charles his Enemy, and had for that cause (as they had always) helped Auria with intelligence, and all things necessary, receiving him into their Harbours, and by their Espies giving him knowledge of the order of his Fleet, that so he might at his own advantage surpris the Gallies, as he had already done. Unto which fire, Junius his Interpreter, Barbarulla, and Alix, laid new Coals, more and more incensing the Tyrant, who was of himself sufficiently inflamed; perwading him by all means they could, to break the League with the Venetians. Wherein Junius sought to revenge his own private injuries; and the other two also their great profit and credit, gaped after the Spoil of the Islands near hand, especially of Coreya (now called Corfu) Zacynthus, and Cephalenia, all subject to the Venetian Seignior; finding the Wars in Italy more dangerous and difficult than they had before imagined. For the French King came not then into Italy, as was by them expected; and it was commonly reported, that Henry Talentum Viceroy of Naples, having put strong Garrisons into the Towns along the Sea Coast, was coming himself with a great Army; beside that, the Horsemen sent over from Aulona, ranging about in the Country of Salentinum for Spoil, were many times cut off by Scipio Sammetus a noble Gentleman, there Governor for the Emperor. Wherefore Solyman changing his purpose for the invasion of Italy, in his mad mood proclaimed War against the Venetians; and rifting with his Army from Aulona, and marching along the Sea Coast until he came over against Coreya, he encamped near unto the Mountains called Acerocraunus, where the fierce and wild People inhabiting the high and rough Mountain of Chimera, a part of the Acerocraunus Mountains; by the instigation of one Damianus a notable Thief, and very perfect in the hand and difficult passages amongst the Rocks, and Woods in those desolate Mountains, conspired to attempt a most strange and desperate Exploit, which was, by night to spoil Solyman in his own Pavilion. These beggarly wild Rogues living for most part by Murder and Robbery, altogether without Law or any manner of Religion, in hope of so great a prey, and to become famous in killing one of the greatest Monarchs of the World in the midst of his strength, gathered with for many days his Soldiers; were not afraid of any danger, how great soever, hoping in the dead time of the night to fall into the Camp undiscovered, and there to oppress Solyman sleeping in his Tent. Which (as was by many afterwards supposed) they were like enough to have performed, to the astonishment of the World, had it not been by chance discovered; for when they had put all things in readiness for that purpose, Damianus ringleader of these desperate brave People, by secret ways stealing down the broken Rocks of those huge Mountains, and coming very near unto the Camp to view the standing of Solyman's Pavilion, with the order of the Turks Watch, was by the cracking of a Bough espied by the Janizaries, where he stood in a Tree prying all over the Camp; and being there taken, and afterward put to torture, and confessing what he had intended, was by the commandment of Solyman torn in pieces. Whereupon he forthwith sent a great part of his Army up into the Mountains, which hunting after these wild People, as if they had been wild Beasts, slew many of them, and by Solyman's appointment did what they possibly could to have quite destroyed them, as an infamous People, Enemy to all Men.

When Solyman had thus fully revenged himself upon the barbarous Nation, he purposed to invade the Island of Coreya, now called Corfu, a part of the Venetian Seignior; sending before Barbarulla with his great Artillery, whom he had but a little before called out of Italy with his Forces. Pisaurius the Venetian Admiral in good time perceiving the Tyrants purpose, strengthened the Garrisons in both the Castles of Corfu, with new supplies of good Soldiers sent out of the Gallies; and knowing himself unable to encounter with the Turks great Fleet at Sea, withdrew himself farther off from the Island, into the Gulf of the Adriatic, to the intent to join his power with Joannes Veturius, who kept that Sea with another Fleet of the Venetian Gallies, and so with joined Forces to defend the Venetian Coasts against the Turks; whom he thought himself strong enough with the great Armies of Agem and of Arria, whose coming was daily expected. Solyman lending a great part of his Army out of the Main, into the Island, burnt and destroyed the Country Villages, leading away a wonderful number of poor Country People into most miserable Captivity. Aiaz the Bassa, and Barbarossa, in two small Pinnaces came as near unto the City of Corfu as they possibly could, to see which way they might most conveniently lay Siege unto it; but perceiving the great strength thereof, being wonderfully Fortified and thoroughly Manned, they advertised Solyman, that it was a place impregnable. Alysius Ripa, and Symon Lemius, two Senators of Venice, were then Governors of Corfu; who not without cause standing in doubt of the great strength of the Turks both by Sea and Land, caused the City Suburbs (which were very great and sumptuously built) to be plucked down, for fear that the Turks surrounding themselves in them, should more easily besiege the Town. This was a woful and lamentable thing to behold, when as at the same time a Man might have seen the Magnificent houses of the Venetian Merchants, built in time of long Peace, both for profit and for pleasure in every place of the Island, set on fire by the Turks. But the regard of the publick State in so great a danger, made all those goodly things which went to wack, to be lightly accounted of in comparison of the life and liberty; for as much as those lost things might with new charge be again in short time recovered.

The two Venetian Governors aforesaid, fearing a long Siege, and not provided of Victual to suffice such a multitude as were got into the City, for any long time; used a heavy and sharp remedy, by turning a great number of weak People and Children unable for service out of the City; of whom many, especially Children, died in the Town-ditches in their Mothers arms, under the Walls of the City, not daring to go any further for fear of the Enemy, who had fast by, in places convenient cast up great Mounds, and planted his Ordnance against the City. Only the Castle called St. Angelo, standing in the middle of the Island, about fifteen miles from the City of Corfu, being valiantly defended by the Inhabitants against the Assaults of the Turks, happily saved above three thousand poor People, which fled thither from the fury of the Turks, who in all other places of the Island had made all desolate. The Turks the more to terrify them of Corfu, taking a Hill not far from the City, covered the same with their Tents, and from the Rock called Manipurus, shot with their great Ordnance into the Town; some of them in the mean time standing close in the ruins of the Suburbs, did with their Harquebuses kill or wound them which appeared upon the Walls. The Gallies also did oftentimes out of their Prows discharge their great Pieces against the City, to the greater terror than hurt of the Defendants. Solyman perceiving that he did but lose his labour in besieging the City (as he was told at the first by his great Captains, Lusca, Aiaz, and Barbarossa) determined now to raise his Siege, and to return to Constantinople, greatly affraid that he should no longer find, as he had in Italy, nor at the Siege of Corfu. But when he was about to have departed, it was told him how unfaithfully some of his Souldiers had dealt with them of Calrum in Italy, who yielding themselves upon the Turks faith to them given for the safeguard of their liberty and goods, were nevertheless most injuriously spoiled of all that they had, and carried away into bondage. Which fact, as tending to the dishonour of his name, and the deterring of others from yielding, Solyman took in great part, that for amending thereof, he caused the Authors of that fact to be put to death, and the Captives of Calrum to be diligently sought out and sent home again into their Country; well deserving therein the commendation of a most just Prince. The Turks left the Siege of Corfu and departed out of the Island about the twelfth of September, in the year 1537, carrying away about sixteen thousand of the Island people into perpetual Captivity. So Solyman rising with his Army, marching through Acarnania and Ætolia, returned through Macedonia to Constantinople; having in this his expedition done great harm both in Italy and Cyrcra, but yet nothing encreased his Empire or honour.

Before his departure, calling unto him Lusca his Admiral, he commanded him also to return with his Fleet to Hellepontus; who passing by Zaenphur, and landing some of his Men in the night, took divers of the Country people Prisoners. But understanding that the City it self was both strong and well manned, he departed thence to Cythera, where unfortunately attempting to have taken the Castle, and disappointed of his purpose, he made what spoil he could upon that Island, and with eight hundred Prisoners returned unto Ægium to Ægina, a rich and famous Island, and well peopled both with Mariners and other Inhabitants. Approaching the life of the Messenger sent before unto the Governor of the City, attempted first by fair means, and afterwards by threats, to have had the City yielded unto him; and not so prevailing, but perceiving them to stand upon their defence, he landed his Men, and gave the signal of battle. Which they of the Island refused not, but manfully met him, and at the first encounter slew many of his Men. Where with the Admiral grievously offended, and still landing fresh Men, even with his multitude oppressed them of the Island, being but in number few and weary of long fight; and so enforced them to retire into the City.

To be revenged of this injury, the Bassa caused certain pieces of great Ordnance to be landed, and a Battery planted against the City; by force whereof he had in short time in divers places assaulted the Walls, and then with all his power assaulting the Breaches, forthwith took the City, which after he had rifled, he burnt it down to the ground, raised the Walls, and put the Men every Mothers Son to the Sword. As for the Women, he gave them without respect unto the lust of his Souldiers and Mariners, whom afterwards together with the Boys and young Children he shipped into the Country near unto Athen, to be from thence conveyed unto Constantinople, into most miserable servitude.

Ægina thus utterly rased, he with much like force and cruelty rased upon them of Peru and the other Islands thereabouts, killing the old Men and such as made resistance, and thrusting the rest into his Gallies. Shortly after he came to the Isle of Naxos, where all the Island people were for fear of his coming fled out of the Country into the City; where landing his Men, he made havock of whatsoever came to his hand. And in the mean time sent a Messenger unto the Duke, to will him to yield himself and his City unto the obedience of the Turkish Emperor Solyman. Which

The Bassa of the Turk sent by Lusca into the Duke of Naxos.

Naxos is a small tributary unto the Turk.

Lusca's Bassa disgraced by Solyman and retired.

Which Messenger admitted into the City, and brought before the Duke, in blunt and plain terms, without further circumstance, delivered his Message thus:

If thou wilt without more ado, yield thy self, thy City, and Territory, to the Constantinopolitan Emperor, thou shalt deserve his favour, and I save thy self with that thou hast. But if thou, otherwise advised, shalt now refuse this Grace, thou shalt never hereafter have the like offer, but for ever unto thy self, thy Wife, and Children, thy Citizens, and Subjects in general. Here is presented a most mighty Fleet, with most valiant and victorious Souldiers, furnished with all the habiliments of War requisite for Battle or Siege. Be warned by them of Ægina, Paros, and other thy neighbour Princes of the Islands. Thy hap is good, if thou be not misadvised, and (warned by other Mens harms) willingly refuse to remedy thine own; and when thou mightest be safe, wiltfully cast away thy self.

Thus said, he was commanded by the Duke to stand aside, and a while to expect his answer; who with the chief of his Subjects there present, but much troubled, and all full of heaviness and sorrow, consulted what answer to make. But after they had according to the weightiness of the cause, and necessity of time fully debated the matter, it was with general consent agreed, That forasmuch as they were not themselves of power to withstand so furious an Enemy, neither to expect help from others, they should therefore yield unto the present necessity, with, otherwise threatened unto them utter destruction, and reserve themselves unto better times. Whereupon answer was given unto the Messenger by the Duke, That he was ready to yield himself unto Solyman as his Vassal, and of him as of his Sovereign to hold his Seignior for the yearly Tribute of five thousand Ducats. Of which offer the Bassa accepted, receiving in hand one years Tribute. So perceptible it was that notable Island yielded unto the Turkish obedience the 11 of November, in the year 1537, from whence Lusca the proud Bassa, loaded with the rich Spoil of the Country and Islands he had passed by, returned to Constantinople with his Fleet. Not long after, this great Bassa (then in credit and authority next unto Solyman himself) fell at odds with his Wife, Solyman his Sister; for that he, after the unnatural manner of those barbarous People, kept in his house a most delicate Youth, in whom he took more pleasure than in his Wife. Which he, being a Woman of great Spirit, not able to endure, and knowing her Husband by marrying of her, to have been from base degree advanced unto the highest Honours the Emperor her Brother could heap upon him; in great rage reproved him with most bitter words, saying, That he had married him to be of him beloved, and used as his Wife, and not contemptuously abused by his Mistresses. Wherewith the Bassa moved, gave her a Blow on the Ear, and caused her and a bold and unquiet Woman to be shut up in her Chamber. But she not brooking such abuse, came weeping to Solyman her Brother, and complaining of her Husband, requested to be Divorced from him who made no better reckoning of her. And with her complaint so incensed Solyman, that he took from him his Seal, and thrust him out of all his honourable Promotions; and had undoubtedly put him to death, had not the remembrance of his old love and friendship staid his fury; yet having utterly disgraced him he banished him the Court, unto Alcedonia, where he spent the remainder of his life: like a poor peasant Man; of whom Boissardus thus writeth:

Que tibi cum molli res esset pollute Cyredo: Cum caket in Thraciis regia nympha tuas? Ex huius fortuna loco te cecidit in altum Ex alto major scepitmina venit.

On dainty Boys, though filthy Man, why doft thou fix thine eye; Whilst Princely Dame of Royal Blood doth in thy Chamber lie? From base estate, to honours height blind Fortune did thee call, And for thee up with Princes great, to work thy greater fall.

Solyman thus fallen out with the Venetians, as is aforesaid, to intangle them at once with Wars in divers places, commanded his Lieutenants in every place bordering upon any part of the Venetian Seignior, to vex and molest them with all hostility, which they did accordingly. In Peloponessus, Cassine besieged Mamflum and Epilauris, two strong Cities of the Venetians; Barbarossa landing his Men in Dalmatia, surprised the ancient City of Borau belonging to the Venetians, carried away the Citizens, and rased the City; Obrovium another City of the Venetians in Dalmatia, called in ancient time Argentum, with the Castle of Nadin, were taken by Uffers, Solyman Lieutenant in Illyria. The Venetians thus invaded on every side, required them again with the like; Pisaurius and Veturius the Venetian Admirals landing their Men, besieged Scardona a City of the Turks in the borders of Dalmatia, which they took by force, put the Turks to the Sword, and overthrew the Walls of the City, because it should be no more a refuge unto the Turks; they also sent one of their Captains called Gabriel Ribes to besiege Obrovium; who upon the coming of Amurath one of Uffers his Captains, cowardly fled, and in flight lost most of his Men; for which his Cowardice, Pisaurius caused his head to be struck off aboard the Admiral Gallies; And Camillus Ursinus, appointed by the Venetian State Governor of Falava a strong Town upon the Frontiers of their Territory in Dalmatia, took from the Turks the Town of Ofrovizava, which he burnt down to the ground; he recovered also Obrovium, which was a little before lost; which by the commandment of the Senate he utterly rased, as a place not well to be kept against the Enemy.

The same Autumn that Solyman having wasted Cyrcra, he returned to Constantinople and the Venetians held Wars with the Turks for the Towns and Castles in Dalmatia; King Ferdinand received such an overthrow at Esek by the Turks, as a greater or more shameful unto the Name of the Christians was hardly in that Age seen; if the loss of the choice Souldiers and Captains of four great Nations, with the shameful flight of the General be well considered. After the Battel of Mohatz, wherein King Leopold was lost, the Turks having gotten the Victory, kept unto themselves that part of Hungary which is called Poffga, because thereby they had a safe passage from Belgrade further into Hungary. The two great Rivers of Savus and Dravus running almost with equal distance from the West, taking with them divers other smaller Rivers, before they fall into the great River of Danubius Eastward, do on both sides inclose this Country of Poffga, being a rich and plentiful Country, and a wonderful well peopled; it bordereth upon the Provinces of Croatia and Serbania, which in times past were at continual Wars with the Turks Garrisoned there by in Illyria and also in Bosnia.

At that time one Mahometes, a most valiant Captain of the Turks was Governour of Belgrade; to whom for his approved valour and wisdom Solyman had committed the keeping of those Frontiers, and the protection of the Kingdom of Hungary in the behalf of King John. He the year before had so used the matter, that what by force, what by policy, he had taken from the Christians above thirty small Castles in the Country, (which was sometime part of the Patrimony of the Despot of Rosetta) and had joined them to the Regiment of Bosnia. One of these Castles amongst the rest called Exek, for the commodious situation thereof he strongly fortified, as that which might give him passage over the River Dravus into Hungary; from whence he sent infinite preys out of King Ferdinand's Country near unto him. Yet was there at that time a certain League betwixt Solyman and Ferdinand, which notwithstanding after the old custom of those Countries for the exercise of the Garrison Soldiers, did bear with the taking of Booty, and light Skirmishes, without any Breach thereof; so that it was done without any great Power or Field-Pieces; which wrong named Peace, Matthias and other Kings of Hungary had of long time used with the Turks, doing them with their nimble light Horfemen, no less harm than they received. But the Germans now using no such light Horfemen, but serving upon great Horfes, and charged with heavy Armor, received great hurt by those light Skirmishes; the Turks with their light Horfes easily flourishing their charge, and again at their pleasure charging them afresh, when they saw the heavy German Horfes almost weary and spent; by which means the German Horfemen were oftentimes by the Turks light Horfemen overthrowen, and to either slain or taken. King Ferdinand did not well brooking these continual injuries, and grieved in mind at the League which Solyman had to his profit made with him at his going into Perfia; finding the same both unprofitable and hurtful to himself, determined to take up Arms, with purpose that if he could drive the Turks out of the Country of Poffaga, then forthwith to pass over Dravus, and to go directly to Vienna against King John. It fell thus in his mind, how that Kingdom was taken from him by Solyman; and that more was, as it were in disgrace of him and the House of Austria, bestowed upon a stranger, which had neither right thereto, nor was any way lawfully defended. Yet were there some which would him, not rashly to enter into Arms against so mighty an Enemy, as was not to be imagined by the united Forces of all the Christian Princes of Europe. For they feared, that Solyman so provoked, would not put it up, but for the hatred he bare against the Christians, and for his honour, seek more cruel revenge; as he had of late done against the Venetians, with whom upon a light occasion he had broken an ancient League, for sinking one or two of his Gallies; for which he would admit no excuse or satisfaction. All this Ferdinand knew to be true, yet all the People of his Dominions lay to earnestly upon him to take that War in hand, that they said plainly, they would never bear Arms more against the Turks, if he omitted that occasion. For they of Carinthia, Stiria, Croatia, and Noricum, subject to the invasion of the Turks, and daily receiving great harm, thought the Turks might easily be driven out of Poffaga, as much as Mahometes had no great power, nor like to have any greater, Autumn now almost spent.

So King Ferdinand, with the wonderful rejoicing of his Subjects, caused Soldiers to be taken up in all parts of his Kingdom, sending for most of his Nobility and best Captains, as to a religious War, and in a very short space had raised a good Army; yet supposed of greater strength than numbers, as confiding most of select Men. The Footmen were for most part Germans, to whom were joined as Wings certain Companies of Italians, Harquebussiers, whom Lewis Lodovius, a valiant Captain, and General of the Footmen, had raised in Italia, and those parts of Italy which lie near unto the Alps. The Horfemen were of Bohemia, Silesia, Moravia, Stiria, Carinthia, and some also out of Hungary, all concluded by their several Captains, all these Horfemen were in number eight thousand, but the Footmen were sixteen thousand strong, with great force of Artillery of all sorts. This Army for the expertness and valour of the Soldiers, was thought sufficient to have met the greatest Army of the Turks in Field, if it had been conducted by a politic General, and (as he had at other times been) forthwith to have won one John Cazianer, a Nobleman of Croatia, whom as one of great experience, and famous for the late defence of Vienna, King Ferdinand had made General of his Army. For Ferdinand by the advice of his best Friends never used to adventure his Person unto the danger of any Battle, especially against the Turks, by whom many Christian Kings had in former time been vanquished and slain; but performed all his Wars by his Lieutenants; which he was thought to do not so much for want of courage, as moved with the fatal misapprehension of many Christian Kings. Mahometes Governour of Belgrade understanding of this preparation made against him, sent for divers Companies of the Garrison Soldiers which lay upon the Frontiers of the Turks Province; therabouts; and was especially holden by Ulf, Governour of Bosnia, who of all Solyman's Lieutenants in Europe, was able to bring into the Field most good Horfemen; he sent him Amurathes a famous Captain with a great Company of gallant Horfemen, unto whom were joined certain Companies of Footmen of the wild and mountain People of Dalmatia, untrained for pay; which rough and rude kind of People were governed and kept in order by certain Companies of Janizaries drawn out of the Garrison Towns as far as Belgrade and Samandria; after whom followed many out of Servia and Rosetta, some for pay, some for prey. The Turks Receiver liberally paying to such as were willing to serve, two months pay before hand. Neither wanted he the aid of the Hungarians from Buda; so that the Turkish Governours on every side putting to their helping hands, Mahometes had in short time gathered such an Army, as for number and strength was not much inferior to King Ferdinand's, and resolved to expect the coming of his Enemies at Exek. Cazianer was now come as far on his way as Caprunza, a Town upon the River Dravus; having before well and conveniently provided for the victualling of his Army, if they whom he put in trust, and had taken the matter upon him, had with the speed and diligence performed their charge; for they were the chief Men of all the Country, who all followed the direction of Simon Bishop of Zagabria, who inflamed with zeal above measure, or else for want of judgment deceived, had promised to serve the whole Camp with plenty of Victuals, at a very low rate. Which thing the Country by Waggon, some by Boats along the Rivers, many difficulties now arising, was not able to perform; which was not to be remedied by reason reason of the nearness of the Enemy; and also for that Mahometes with small Gallies in both Rivers, and his Troops of Horfemen pricking up and down the Country, did either flay the Country people from bringing of Victuals, or else allured them for a greater price to bring it to his own Camp, where they received ready Money. Cazianer setting forward from Caprunza, hardly came in ten days to the Castle of Veruccia, which is about forty miles distant from Caprunza; being enforced to make short marches, by reason of the troublesome carriage of some great Pieces of Artillery for battery. The winter fort began even then to mislead the want of Victuals, both for the reasons before alleged, and for that such Victuals as was looked for, came not, although they marched very softly; so that they were then enforced to spend such Victuals as they had provided, not for the beginning, but for the difficulties of a long protracted War. Wherefore Cazianer wrote sharply to the Bishops of the other which had taken upon them the charge of providing Victuals for the Army; commanding them to use all possible diligence and speed, and not to let the hope of a notable Victory to be lost through their negligence, for want of Victuals, rather than the valour of the Enemy. In the mean time Cazianer thought good there to stay, and to expect the coming of the Victuals, sending before him Paulus Bachius with a thousand Hungarian light Horfemen and certain Companies of Italian Harquebussiers, as far as the Castle of Zopia, to the intent that he might of such Prisoners as he could take, learn something of the Enemies purpose. The Turks in the Castle of Zopia desiring the coming of Bachius, and thinking the whole Army of the Christians had been at hand, set fire on the Castle, which they thought might on the Camp, and by Boats fire down the River Dravus. Yet after all their haile, Bachius took some of them in their flight; of whom Cazianer learned that which he before knew by his own Espies, how that Mahometes and the Turks lay encamped at Exek, with a full resolution to give him Battle. Cazianer setting forward again, till keeping along the River Dravus, came in eight days to the Castle of Walpo; where by the way he was glad to stay seven days at the River Cassus, which falleth into Dravus, until such time as a Bridge was made for the transporting of his Army, for that the River was not to be waded over; in which time Cazianer entred oftentimes into counsel with the other Captains, what course to hold for the better proceeding in that War. Where divers Men were of divers opinions; some said, It was better to leave Exek, and to besiege a little of the Enemies there by, called Villesh; others more wary than the rest, were of opinion, That it were better there to stay until the rest of the Aid and Victuals, which they daily expected, were come. But the greater number, which also prevailed, urged the first determination, of going directly to the Enemy at Exek, for that longer delay would but breed further danger; and there was in the Camp (as they said) both strength and Victuals sufficient for obtaining of the Victory, if they would make an end of their needless Consultations, and not protract the War until Winter were come on; where they did nothing else, but cause the Soldiers to think that they were afraid to meet the Enemy, and secretly to steal away back again into their Countries; whereas if they would like resolute Men march on forward against the Enemy, who at other time trusting most unto his multitudes, and now having no great power, would never abide the fight of the Christian Army, bringing with it so much Artillery, but would forthwith forsake the place, and never show his face; for such as the Christian Men at Arms would (as they said) easily break through and overthrow the naked Turkish Horfemen, if they durst abide the Field. The young Soldiers, who as yet had never made proof of the Turks manner of fight with such cheerfulness like of this resolution, that they thought two days staying, a long delay of so ready and easy a Victory. Wherefore it was resolved upon, presently to far forward, and thereupon the Army was Mustered; where, upon view taken, there was found to be ten thousand Horfemen (for divers Troops of Germans were come to the Camp, after the time of the first setting forward of the Army); a more gallant Company of Horfemen, both for the strength of their Horfes, and goodly furniture of the Men, had seldom been seen in an Army so suddenly raised. But the Footmen, selected out of all the Provinces, were greatly diminished, being now in number scarce eight thousand strong; for many were sick in the Camp, others weary of the long Journey, lingering behind, were slain away; and generally all they which were left, mowed with dirt and mire, by reason of the deepness of the rotten way, wet through with Rain, and almost starved with Cold, and thereto pinched with the cold weather, were thought unable to endure the hardness of the present War. After that commandment was given, That every Soldier should carry with him three days Victuals; and proclamation made, That no Man should upon pain of death take any Turk Prisoner, although he yielded himself, or charge himself with any spoil before the Battle were fully ended; forthwith the Captains would afterwards divide the Spoil of the Enemy among the Soldiers. This proclamation thus made through the Camp, they set forward towards Exek; and the third day they came to a certain Valley, about three miles from Exek, where they encamped. The next day a Company of Turks stewed themselves, which was by the great Ordinance repelled. The day following, the Enemy sallied out of the Town and skirmished oftentimes with the Christians; in which Skirmishes many were slain on both sides, but more wounded of the Christians, for that the Turks had poltically mingled certain Janizaries, Harquebussiers, and Archers, with their Horfemen; who, used to that manner of fight, were galled the Christian Horfemen. For which cause the General forbade all such light Skirmishes, as purposing to keep his strength whole against the general day of Battle; commanding his Captains to place the great Ordinance as might most annoy the Enemy, if he should show himself by Troops within the danger of the Shot; which was so well performed, that the Turks falling first, received thereby great hurt, the deadly shot flying through the midst of their Companies. The same day Symon Bishop of Zagabria came into the Camp with his Horfemen, and a certain provision of Victuals, weary by the fear of the want before conceived, was well eased. Mahometes perceiving that the Christians were no longer to be drawn to those harmful Skirmishes, but that he must bring his Men in danger of the great Shot; to annoy them by another means, sent many small Boats, manned with Harquebussiers and small Pieces of Ordinance, unto the Lake near unto the Camp, so to keep the Christians from watering their Horses, and with those small Pieces that sometimes into the Camp. Near unto the Valley where the Christians lay, was a Hill, whereupon stood a Village, wherein were placed certain Companies of Turks, to Skirmish as occasion should serve with the Christians; for placing of whom the whole Army was put in order of Battel, and the great Artillery bent upon them, that they should not with their light Skirmishes, after the manner of the Turkish fight, trouble the order of the Army. Which thing the Turks perceiving, and that they were not able to hold the place, let fire on the Town, and retired to Ezek. The Christians keeping on their march, came to the top of the Hill, from whence they might see Ezek stand about two miles off in a fair Plain, near unto the Bank of Drauen all which low ground betwixt the Hill and Ezek, was so full of danger, that it was thought a matter too full of danger, to attempt that way to batter the Castle, and expose the Army to the inevitable fury of the Enemies shot. Wherefore they decaying a rising ground on the further side of the City equal with the top of the Walls, they thought it best to remove their Camp thither, and on that side to plant their Battery against the City. But to come to that place was thought a matter of no small trouble; for they must first compass three miles on the right hand through a Forest by a foul and troublesome way, before they could come to the place they desired; for the Army was not so great, as to besiege the City round; wherein were not (as is reported) above sixteen thousand Men; neither was there such store of Victuals in the Camp, but that the Army was like soon to feel the want thereof, without a continual supply, which would hardly be had, the Enemy till bestering every passage, and with their light Horsemen scouring about all the Country, of purpose to keep them from Victual. For, which cause, some were of opinion, That it were best for them there to stay where they were, until such time as both more Aid and better store of Victuals were come unto them; but others of contrary mind, said the Enemy was but barely stored with Victual himself, and therefore could not long hold out; which they said they understood by certain Christian Fugitives; and that Mahometes had put his chief substance into certain Boats, to be conveyed down the River, as purposing to flee, and would not hold out the Siege above three days; as for the Forrest, they thought it would well enough be passed through, if they would courageously set forward; beside that, the time of the year suffered no delay, Winter coming to fall on, that except some notable thing were done quickly, they should be entorced by the very time of the year to return with them, without doing any thing. This opinion was best liked of, as more honourable and better becoming Men of Valour, than to lie still in one place whereupon the next day the Army removed, and in good order marched through the Forrest. Which thing Mahometes quickly perceiving, presently sent forth a thousand light Horsemen, and certain Companies of the Janizaries and Harquebussiers, to trouble the Christians in their passage; who by a nearer and well known way overtaking the Army, suddenly charged the Rearward, wherein the Italians and Bohemians marched. The Bohemians quickly fled, and the Italians with much ado endured the charge; but being relieved by the Carinthian Men at Arms, they notably repulsed the Turks and put them to flight. So the Army with small loss pursued the Forrest, and came to the place they desired; where, after they had encamped themselves, and in good order placed all things needful to the Siege, they in feemly order offered unto the Enemy Battel; but he seeing himself within the Town, that at the Christians with his great Ordnance; and they to requite him, with two great Pieces which they had placed upon the riling of a Hill, thro' through both the Walls of the Town and the Butwerk also, to the great terror of the Defendants. The Christians in the mean time having flood almost all the day in order of Battel in sight of the Enemy, vainly expecting when he should come forth to give them Battel, returned at night into their Camp; for Mahometes upon great consideration kept in his Soldiers, although they were most desirous to fight; understanding right well of the want of Victual in the Christian Camp; and beside that (as the Fugitives reported) being frantically commanded by Letters from Solyman, that he should not upon pain of a most shameful death forsake the place, but to defend it to the last. Now the Christians desirous of Battel, being thus delayed and deceived of their expectation, had in a few days spent the small store of Victual they had, and began to feel a general want; and there was there any apparent means how they should be relieved, so that every Man began to fear some general mischief to ensue. When Balthazar Pamphilus, a noble Hungarian, and a Captain of great experience, sitting in Council with the rest, entered into this Speech.

*Captains (said he) we do all that we do, unadvisedly; for whilst we consult as large how we may overcome our Enemies, the strength of our Army is in the mean time so weakened for want of Victual, that the Soldiers are neither well able to stand on their Legs, nor to hold their Weapons in their feeble Hands; and generally, even they which are of greatest courage begin now to quail, and despairing of Battel, feel that they must miserably and shamefully perish for want of Victual. In my opinion, we ought first and above all things most speedily to provide for this want, which so grievously pinches us, and presently to remove hence unto the Castle of Hermantide, that with the provision thereof, which is not like to be little, we may refresh our whole Army; and so relieved, to proceed further as occasion shall require.*

This Castle was about ten miles distant from Ezek; whereinto many of the Turks had conveyed their Wives and Child, and chiefest substance, being kept with a small Garrison of twenty Turks. Fast by the Castle was a pretty little walled Town, without Plankers, after the manner of the old fortifications, which Town and Castle Balthazar said would easily be taken. This his Council was well liked of all Men, and he himself sent with certain Companies of Soldiers to take the Town. Wherein fortune so favoured him, that it was at his first coming surrendered unto him; but when he had it found not therein any such store of Corn or Victual as he had hoped for; yet he took there certain Vessels of Wine, to the great relief of the weak Soldiers. Upon the next day the taking of this Town, the Camp removed from Ezek about ten a Clock in the night, but so disorderly, that the Soldiers scarce knowing their own Ensigns, seemed rather to have fled for fear, than marched for spoil; yet the Turks for all that moved not out of Ezek, misdoubting some deceit, and loth to attempt any thing rashly in the night. When the Army was come to the Town, the Captains took order, that the Victual there found, was equally divided amongst the Soldiers, and the next morning Battery laid against the Castle; which those few Turks valiantly defended half a day, and then by composition yielded it. But when the Castle was taken, there was found in it but two Barrels of Meal, and other two of Millet. Then might a Man have seen the

Captains themselves hanging their Heads, as men stricken with a sudden fear, who instead of a great Prey and Victual to have feared many days, found nothing but a few Women and Children, and scarce so much Victual both in the Town and Castle, as would serve the Army two days. Yet they dissembled the matter, and fed the Soldiers with hope of better store, after the Bridge were once repaired, that they might pass the River of Bodry, which ran by the Town; which Bridge the Turks had before (for defence of themselves broken, by plucking up of certain Piles and taking away of the Planks; wherefore the Carpenters being set on work, and every man putting to his helping hand, the Bridge was with continual labour in three days repaired. The fourth day, the Waggon and smaller Pieces of Ordnance passed over the Bridge, and after them six of the great Pieces for Battery; but the Bridge overcharged with the seventh, which was of wonderful weight, and much greater than the rest, began to break; so that the Captains were enforced to break that fair Piece of Ordnance, and by pieces to carry it away, that the Enemy should not get so great a Spoil. All things being thus well passed over, the Piles were again cut down, and the Planks struck off, to the intent the Enemy should not that way pursue them; and other way there was none, but to fetch a compass about the great Lake which was many miles about. Here the Captains began to consult, whether it were best to break that great Piece of Ordnance, that so they might more speedily march away, or not. Of which opinion was Cazimem himself, promising of his own charge to new cast them. As for the scaling Ladders, and other such like things provided for the Siege, they burnt, because they should not come into the Enemies hand, or trouble themselves in their march. But most of the Captains were of opinion, that it was not best so dishonourably to break those heavy Pieces, the greatest ornaments and defence of their Country; but to hold on their march through Pollage, until they came to Javanche, where they should find great force both of Corn and Wine; which Town with the Castle of Gara lay by it, stored with all kind of Provision, they said would easily be taken before the Turks could possibly come so far about the Lake from Ezek; and that it were a great frame, to return without doing any thing. Cazimem was persuaded, set forward, and with great toil (by reason of the deepness of the way and heaviness of the great Ordnance) came by night to Javanche, which was but three miles off; where the Turks having with incredible celerity passed a long journey, arrived at the same time out. Near unto this Castle was a little Town, out of which all the Turks were fled; the Townsmen being Christians, opened the Gates and received in the Soldiers; who there filled themselves abundantly with Wine, and could hardly bedriven out thence by their Captains to the Camp. The same night the Turks burnt the same Town, and whatsoever the Christians had therein left; and every man brook him to his Armor in the Camp, for the Enemy was now at hand; and in the dawning of the day began hoely to skirmish in divers places with the Christians, but especially in that quarter of the Camp where the Bohemians lay. Where being grievously hurt upon them with a Troop of his best Horsemen, and enforced them to flee; but the Turks after the manner of their Fight, quickly returning again, and relieved by the coming in of their Fellows, beset the Bohemians on every side, and flow many of them. Rafsch

the General fighting most valiantly, was there slain with his Followers. The Christian Captains purposing to retire home, placed on each side of the Army four Ranks of Waggon for defence on both sides; in the Vauward were placed the weak and sick men, yet so, that in the Front of the Army were certain Companies of lusty tall Soldiers; but in the Rearward was placed the greatest strength both of Horse and Foot. The Army thus marching as it were on both sides in trench, as it oftentimes met with woody Hills hindering their way, so did the fame fly leave the Christians, that the Turks could not well afford them in their march, both before and behind. Which thing Mahometes perceiving, sent before certain Companies of Janizaries and nimble Footmen, which knew the Country and the passages well, with certain Faucons and other small Pieces to take the Straits whereby the Army was to pass, and so to gaul them in their passage, and when they could keep the place no longer, to flee back to another, and so from place to place; and in the open places he had his Troops of light Horsemen, which were ever busy in one place or another of the Army: By which means the Christians in their March received much harm, which grieved them the more, for that no great power of the Turks was any where to be seen together, but stragling Companies; which as they were commanded, sometime would come on with a fierce charge, and by and by retire again, and with their Arrows and Falcon Shot, from places of advantage afflict them. At one of these stragles somewhat bigger than the rest, Podun Bachan one of the Hungarian Captains, in whom the Soldiers generally repoted their greatest trust, was slain with a Faucon Shot, with divers other of the valiant Hungarians; who seeing there a greater number of the Turks than they had seen in other places, thought to have done some good service upon them; his death brought a general fear upon the Bohemians, which was much then and at other times, without him they never had any good success against the Turks. Yet in that skirmish, the Hungarians, to revenge the death of their Captain, did with such force repulse the Enemy, that they caused him after he had lost many of his men, to run away and leave his small Field-Pieces behind him. But such was the weakness or cowardice of the Christian Footmen, and the agility of the Turks, especially the Janizaries, that with their fire out of the Woods, slaid the Hungarian Horsemen from the pursuit of their Fellows, and recovered their small Field-Pieces before they could be carried away by the Christian Footmen; wherewith they did again forerun the Army, and still trouble it as before. The Christians beset with these dangers, and almost spent for want of Victual, seeing no means to relieve their weak Bodies, nor any hope to combat their fainting Spirits, did generally fear some extreme calamity to ensue; and so much the more, for that it was reported, that Mahometes still expected fresh supplies from Belgrade, Samandria, and Nicopolis; and many of the Hungarian light Horsemen stole away from them, as careful of their own safety; neither did they see any comfort in the dismaid Captains, who at other times were wont with cheerful and courageous words to relieve the Soldiers, if they saw them any thing discouraged. But when they were come into a fair open Field near unto a Town called Gara, they were advertised, that the Enemy had in the Woods before them, whereby they were to pass, cut down great Trees crofs the waies, so that neither their great Ordnance nor Waggon, nor yet their Horsemen could possibly pass that way but that they must needs break their order.

This once bruted through the Army, filled them with all heaviness and desperation, and so much the more, for that Ladislau Morus, and others which knew the Country well, said there was but two ways to escape; the one through the Woods about ten miles place to Walpo, which by reason of the Trees cut down cross the ways by the Turks was not to be passed, but they must needs leave behind them their great Ordnance and Carriages; the other towards the Castle of Zenthuerebeth, which was in Ladislau Morus his Country, certain miles distant from Gara; by taking of which way, the Enemy by reason of the heaviness of the passage, must of necessity be enforced to give over his pursuit. Yet for all that, it was in Council resolved upon, to take the way through the Woods of Walpo, for that there was Victual enough, and in the Castle of Walpo was kept Money sent from King Ferdinand, sufficient to pay the Soldiers for all that Winter. And to leaving the great Ordnance behind them, and burning the Powder and whatsoever else could not well be carried on Horseback, to fit forward with all speed: As for the Trees they said, they would be well enough removed, and the way opened by the Pioneers and Waggoners; wherefore every Captain was commanded to have his Soldiers in readiness to fit forward upon the sign given, which was by the sound of a Shalm or Hoboy; which when it should be given, was referred to the discretion of the General. There were many which wonderfully disliked of this resolution, and said openly, that the Enemy was fewer in number than their Horsemen, and pinched almost with like want of Victuals besides; that the Turks durst never in just Fight encounter with the Christian men at Arms, but like Theeves alight them upon a fuddain at some advantage, and by and by were gone again; and that they should fear forward in the night, many would be lost in the Woods; and Valor in the dark could not be known from Cowardice; besides that, the Turks (as they said) lay to night, that it was not possible to depart without their knowledge, especially if they should burn the Powder, or break their great Ordnance. For which causes, they thought it better to fight a Battle with them, and not to believe the false reports of new Supplies come unto them, and that God would undoubtedly give them aid, which were ready to lay down their Lives for their Religion and Glory of the Christian Name. After all this, they began to consult what was now to be done with the sick and wounded Soldiers, which were before carried in Waggoners or among other Baggage of the Army; it was like that so great a multitude of sick and wounded men, understanding what was decreed concerning the departure of the Army, would as miserable forsaken men, fill the Camp with lamentation and mourning; which it was thought would be also increased by the weeping and wailing of them which should never afterwards see their Brethren, Kinsmen, Fellows, or Friends, so miserably and shamefully left behind and forsaken; the noise whereof, must needs come to the ears of the Turks, which lay within a small Gun-shot. Wherefore it was determined, that these sick and wounded Soldiers should be carried upon the Waggon and Cart-Horses; and that such as were not able to stay themselves, should be hidden up by other of more strength riding behind them upon the Buttocks of the Horse. In fine, to colour the matter, they which were so desirous to go, said that this their manner of departure grounded upon good reason, was not to be accounted a shameful Flight (as some would term it) but a right honest and necessary manner of retiring; forasmuch as they were stronger than their Enemies in Horsemen, and equal also (if not stronger) in Footmen, although they were fore weakened with Sickness. Whilst these things were in Council diversely discoursed, and the resolution set down as is before said, the matter was brought to this pass, that every Captain with troubled judgment conceived in himself secret cogitations, far from the common good; and without regard of Shame and Dishonour, be thought himself how he might bethake himself to flight; the uncertain hope of desired life. On the contrary part, Mahometes using most certain Spies, and advertised every hour of all the distresses of the Christians, and thereby prefiging his future Victory; did by most diligent Watch and Troops of Horsemen, besetting the passages far and near, most vigilantly attend every motion in the Christian Camp; of purpose, that when the Army should rise and set forwards he after his wonted manner might in the Straits (fit for his purpose) set upon them being divided and dispersed one from another, as they must needs in those troublesome passages; for he had placed his Horsemen and Footmen in the known Tracts of those Woods, that he had shut up the Christians as it were in a Tole. It was now almost midnight, and the Army taking no rest, so carefully expected the sign of setting forwards, that every little delay gave them much men both tedious and dangerous; so that many great Captains upon a cowardly conceit would lay no longer, but hasted to depart, and to go before the rest, without any leave of the General. The beginning of this mischievous departure, is reported to have been begun by the common Hungarian Horsemen, which knowing the passages and ways through the Woods, made most haste to Walpo. Ladislau Morus, following their example, went the other way to his Castle Zenthuerebeth. After them followed in great haste the Syrian Horsemen, without regard of shame, led by John Hungenot their General, who was appointed to have guarded the Rearward. Symon Bishop of Zagabria fled in like manner, known by his great Lantern wandering in the Wood; yet with less shame than the rest, because he being a Clergy man, might be thought to belong to his vocation, not put on Arms, or to go into Battle. In the mean time it was fearfully told to Cassianer, that the Hungarian Horsemen were fled, and that Ladislau and Hungenot, with the Syrian Troops were gone also; and that all the rest of the Army not expecting the appointed signal, were in like manner upon flying; with which report, the cowardly and diffident General was so terrified, that he presently got to Horse, quite forgetting the signal he should have given (for that he thought all the rest, as he afterwards said, to have been gone before) and as he was unarmed, be took himself to flight, leaving behind him for haste his Tent furnished with Plate and other rich Furniture. In this Tumult of them which so disorderly fled, Lodromius, that famous Captain was called up, and told by his

his Servants, that the General was fled and gone; to whom he answered again, Without doubt it cannot be so, that I should be so shamefully and perditionally betrayed of him; and so as a man meagred with long Watching and painful Labour, laid himself down again to sleep. Not long after, Mahometes hearing the stir that was in the Camp, rofe with his Turks to assail his Enemies; yet to be better assured what the Enemy did, he thought it good to stay for day light, causing his men to stand fit in order of Battle, and with wonderful silence to expect the sign of setting forward, which was given by the fife found of a Horseman Drum passing through every Company. For the old Captain acquainted with many Battles against the Christians, doubting of their feigned Flight, would not unadvisedly be drawn into Battle, but in a place commodious for his Soldiers; as one before fully set down (after his wonted manner) to perform that service, not by the hazard of one fife Barrel, but by dallying off the time with often skirmishes, when he could take the Enemy at advantage. The day appearing, Lodromius again awaking, heard a certain confused noise of the Turks, and withal saw himself forsaken of the greatest part of the Horsemen; whereupon he complained in vain, that he was betrayed; yet for all that, he was nothing discouraged, but cheered up his Footmen, exhorting them to remember their former Valor, and to resolve with themselves only with Courage to overcome the danger, which hard Fortune had at that time brought them into; for that valiant men were rather to think of an honourable Death, than shameful Flight, whereby whether they should escape with Life or not, was uncertain. As for himself, who he said he was resolutely set down by selling the Enemy to bring them into a place of safety, or else valiantly fighting together with them to end his days. As Lodromius was yet thus encouraging the Footmen, the Horsemen of Carinthia, Saxony, Austria and Bohemia, who mindful of their duty, had in vain expected the appointed signal from their General, came unto Lodromius, as unto the most valiant Captain, beseeching him instead of their treacherous General, to take upon him the place; promising to do whatever he commanded, and to fight as men against those Infidels for their Religion and King, so long as they were able to hold up their Weapons. Lodromius would in no case accept of that honour so frankly offered, modestly professing himself unworthy thereof; yet as a man of Courage, and moved with the hard estate of such an Army, he with a solemn protestation promised to execute the place in the best manner he could, and so did as long as his Fortune gave him leave.

It is reported, that as Lodromius was encouraging the Footmen, and earnestly inveighing against their shameful flight, an old German Soldier was so bold, as bluntly, yet sharply to say unto him, Worthy Lodromius, with a Host of such a prize under thee, Lodromius perceiving the old Soldiers meaning, alighted, and with his Sword boxed his Horse; saying aloud, This day, valiant Soldiers, shall you have me both your General and Fellow Soldier, fighting on foot as one of you selves; see now that you deserve not my expectation, but let us enter with glorious Victory, or honourable Death end this War together; yet if, as I have, die not unrewarded. All his other Horses he gave away unto such sick and wounded Soldiers as he best knew; amongst whom was one Piccard of Cremna, a Captain who was then in an extreme Fit of an Ague, and had hardly escaped the hands of the Enemy. They first Troops of Horsemen and Bands of Footmen; were farcely out of the Camp with their Ensigns; but the Turks coming with a hideous cry, assailed them on every side, and many sharp skirmishes were given unto the Christians sometime vainly receiving the Enemies charge, and sometime charging them again, repelled the proud Enemy fife buff with them. In these continual skirmishes, Antius Maser Tuschfat, General of the Grinthian Horsemen, fighting valiantly was slain; being for his brave Armor supposed by the Turks to have been the General of the Field. And of like mishap four and twenty Horsemen of great fame were also slain, and their Guidon taken amongst these were three Noblemen, Andreas Rofchius, Christophern Hernus, and Georgius Humbergus. In another place was made a most cruel skirmish with the Saxon Horsemen, and them of Saxony, Thuringia and Francia, who followed the Saxons Ensign; of these, fighting most valiantly, Lieutenants, or Ancients; and Chonourus a principal Captain of the Saxons taken, who afterwards died in Bonds among the Turks. Amongst them which were slain, Sebastians Mafelous, and Jacobus Scullemburgh were of greatest Nobility. In like manner the Horsemen of Austria courageously resisting the Enemy for a space, were in the end overthrown; where amongst them were slain two valiant Noblemen, Fritius and Hofchardus, with divers other men of great place and reputation both in their own Country and abroad. But the greatest slaughter was made amongst the Bohemian Horsemen, upon whom (being disordered by the Janizaries Harquebusers) the Turkish Troops of the old German Soldiers breaking in with their Simeters and heavy Iron Maces, made a most bloody execution. The Battle of Footmen being fore gained and almost disorderly in their march by certain Companies of Janizaries and Archers of the Alps (who from a woody Bank of a Marsh discharged their shot and arrows continually upon them, yet never coming to handy Blows) was on the other side so hardly charged by Ammurates with his Troops of Horsemen of Bosnia, that being not able longer to keep order, it was at last by him broken and cut in pieces; where the Turks with their Swords and Hatchets flew the poor Christians without mercy. Lodromius himself carried away with the breaking in and force of the Horsemen, was driven into a Marsh; where after that he being fore wounded, and almost fast in the deep Mud, had done the utmost of that his last endeavour; he by the fair entreaties of the Turks, perswading him rather to yield, than there to be slain, so yielded himself, that he with three Companies which were with him, after they had laid down their Weapons, were all faved as valiant Soldiers; for now the merciless Turks, imbrued with the Christian Blood, were weary of slaughter, and began greedily to seek after the Spoils, hunting after them who flying disorderly, thought themselves to have escaped the Enemies hands) with such success, that a great number of them was taken and led away for Slaves; few of the Footmen escaped, and almost all the rest which were fled before the Battle, were to be seen dead upon the ground.

This shameful Overthrow at Essek was reported to have exceeded the most grievous Overthrows that the Christians had received in any former time; for the Flower both of Horse and Foot.

notable Pynns, with thirty Gallies, who landing their Men near unto Calvroomum (as they were commanded) were valiantly encountered by Sarmenius with his Spaniards, and forced again to their Gallies, many of the Turks being slain and taken Prisoners. After that came Barbarossa with ninety Gallies, and three tall Ships which carried the Artillery for Battery and other necessary provision for the Camp; where he spent three days in landing his great Ordnance and casting up Trenches, which could not be done but by night by reason of the continual fog out of the Town; wherewith the Spaniards had in that three days space slain above a thousand Turks; amongst whom was Agus Hariademus, who had made himself as it were a King at Taiores, a City near Tripolis in Africa whose death much grieved Barbarossa, as one of his most ancient and best Friends. At length Barbarossa having cast up his Trenches, landed four and fifty great Pieces of Artillery for Battery; whereof he gave a fourth part to Ulamis to batter the Town on the North side, whilst he in the mean time, in three divers places battered the East side, and Salee from Sea with ten Gallies, did morning and evening batter another part of the Wall. Whilst Sarmenius was thus in so many places assailed, and did what was possible to have repaired the Breaches; the Turks by force took one of the Towers, where after they had displaced their Engines, they from thence with their shot fore troubled the Spaniards. At the same time also, Ulamis had made a Breach, and was ready on the other side of the City to enter. In which extremities, Sarmenius seeing no means longer to defend the City, commanded the hurt Soldiers to take the place below, and the rest with him to take the Market place, where they did together like Men; where the Turks straight way breaking in on every side upon them, made a most cruel and bloody Fight, wherein the Spaniards overwhelmed with shot, and the multitude of their Enemies, were slain almost every Man. Sarmenius wounded in the Face with three Arrows, and wearied with long fight, seeing Sancius Fria a Captain ready to flee, sharply reproved him, and catching him by the hand, made him there to tarry by it, until they were both together slain. Many valiant Captains were there left, whose names for brevity I omit. Alysius Arius, and certain other Captains, who together with the wounded Soldiers were got into the Castle, seeing no means to defend the place, yielded themselves; whom Barbarossa according to his promise, took to mercy in sparing their lives, yet carried them away into captivity to Constantinople. The dead Body of Sarmenius could not be known amongst many heaps of the dead, although Barbarossa had caused most diligent search to be made for it, and offered great sums of Money and liberty also, to whosoever could recover it; being desirous to have sent his Head for a Present to Solyman. Barbarossa proud of this Victory, began forthwith to gape after Cassius a City of the Venetians in the bottom of the famous Bay; and thereupon wrote threatening Letters to Francesco Bembo one of the Venetian Senators then Governour of the City, presently to deliver the City; which he would (as he said) otherwise assault by force. Whereunto Bembo answered again by Letters, that in so doing he should violate the League lately made with Solyman; and that he should find him ready by force to repel his Forces. Wherewith Barbarossa displeased for certain Gallies in the bottom of the Bay; who discharging certain great Pieces at the City, made such as if they had come to besiege it. At whom Bembo a Man of good courage caused as many more like Pieces to be discharged, and threw his Men upon the Walls; which thing Barbarossa perceiving flaid his conflict, and calling back his Gallies, returned to Calvroomum, from whence (better appeased with Presents afterwards sent from Bembo) he departed out of that Bay.

The long Wars betwixt Charles the Emperor and Francis the French King, were now well pacified, and such friendship (at leastwise in their) now grown betwixt these two great Princes, that most Men thought that all other quarrels laid aside, they would now at length with united Forces go against the great and dangerous Enemy of Christendom; which opinion not altogether of the wiser sort believed, was yet at this time wonderfully confirmed by many extraordinary and rare conflicts then passing betwixt them, which concern not this History; as also, in that two of their most famous Captains, Alphonfus Vastius, and Hannibal, were as it were with one consent by them both sent Embassadors to Venice, to have drawn the Venetians into the Confederation of that War against the Turk. Which two renowned Captains coming to Venice, most gallantly accompanied, were by Lamius the Duke, and the whole State, with great magnificence received, the people after their wonted manner flocking together in every place, to behold them to noble Captains sent from such mighty Princes; but especially Vastius, whose Fame having many times before filled their Ears, made them now the more desirous to satisfy their Eyes also with the beholding of his tall and comely Person. Which two famous Captains admitted into the Senate, for that purpose fully assembled, and Audience given, Vastius arising from the Dukes side, in these or like words delivered their Embassage.

Alphonfus Vastius and Hannibal sent Embassadors from the Emperor and the French King to the State of Venice.

It is come to pass; (as I suppose) by the great providence of Almighty God, and of all the Divine Powers; on to the death of the most noble Duke and honourable Senators; that two of the most mighty Kings of Europe, who of late had Senate of long time made mortal Wars one upon another, Friends; undoubtedly to that purpose only, that having made a firm Peace, they may bring such a general quietness to the long troubled and afflicted State of Christendom, as best becometh their greatness; and taking in hand a sacred War, to revenge so many calamities received from the Infidel. That this might be made known unto you (most noble Venetians) these mighty Monarchs have sent us hither in good time to shew in you the like Zeal, wherewith it is well known you have always for the honour of your State been enamoured; for you of all others, which are of such power and valour at Sea, they will be a stable lover and Confederates in this sacred War and hoped Victory; and think you worthy, which should enjoy the special fruit of all that labour. Forasmuch as the Christian Forces once renewed, and so great and strong a Fleet once assembled, every Man feels that the Turks must needs be too weak; although they brag, that they can never win the Victory of late at Actium, when as they then escaped out of the victorious hands of our Men, kill by their own Valour, but by the unexpected help of a Judahish Storm. For all the power of Heaven and Earth, and of the Sea also, will be propitious unto us, uniting in great Forces, in regard of our sacred Religion; and will so take away the Hearts of the Infidels, that they shall learn to be overcome. As for our land Forces, we are to hope nothing but will, forasmuch as we intend to have the Emperor of late brought into the Field at Venizia, and caused the Turkish Emperor to sit, shall be joined not only all the Horsemen and Infantry of France (a wonderful strength), but Sigismund also King of Polonia will without delay bring forth his Armies, wherewith he hath been used in the quarrel of the Christian Religion, bravely to fight against the Infidels; so that it is not to be doubted of a most certain and assured Victory. Wherefore the victorious Emperor and most Christian King Francis most instantly request you to enter into the like godly Cogitations, conceived for the general good of the Christian Name, and religiously to embrace the hope of a most true and glorious Victory; and further exhort you, by a wholesome Decree to avert your religious and courageous Hearts from the friendship of the Infidels; for it may worthily seem unto your most honourable minds, a most foul and shameful thing, to have renewed your League, and to have preferred an infamous and uncertain Peace, before a most religious and just War. Neither doth it becom this most wealthy State to be terrified from that which is good and right, with any Charges of War, be they never so great; for if we shall once overcome, which is evident to this present and long wished occasion, we shall by the profit of one Victory, either by Sea or Land, to your incomparable praise recompense all the Losses by us in former times received.

France

The answer of the Duke to Vastius.

Whereunto the Duke in the name of the whole State answered, That there never happened any thing at any time unto the Venetian Senate more honourable, for the manner of the Embassage, or for the publick security of their State, more to be desired than the hope of such a Peace; after that two most mighty Kings by two such famous Captains their Embassadors, did certify them of their atonement and assured Peace, most glorious to themselves, to their eternal praise, wholesome also to the Venetian State, beset with so many dangers, and wonderfully to be wished for of all the other Princes of Christendom; that they would faithfully and religiously with their Forces by common consent united, resolve upon that sacred War; for then would not the Venetians be wanting to themselves or the Christian Common-wealth, but end the League they had with the Turk, not with a dishonourable Peace, but with Arms and Victory. Wherefore it was to be requested of Almighty God by Prayer, That those puissant Kings which were with religious and happy event fidelity and fortitude fulfil all that hope of Peace, which they had by their mutual discourses and embracings in shew promised unto the World.

In few days after, certain of the select Senators sitting in Council, after the manner of that State, called the Embassadors unto them, and asked them, Whether they knew any thing of the Articles and Capitulations wherewith that League and Confederation was to be concluded. And by the way, Whether they thought the Emperor in regard of that Peace would give unto the French Kings Son the Dukedom of Milain, as was reported? Whereunto Hannibal the French Embassador answering nothing, Vastius said, that he knew nothing more, but that the two great Princes had agreed betwixt themselves, and that the Emperor had desired the Peace, as one willing to be the afflicted and declining State of the Christian Common-wealth; which thing any Man might see could not be effected or brought to pass, but that the Emperor must in many things yield to the requests of the French King, and redeem his good will; for his noble mind (said he) worthy Senators, can easily make light of the greatest loss of his own things, when he foreseeth a large way opened thereby to eternal Fame and Glory. These words were very glorious and gracious to the Hearers; but they, as Men of great experience, could not let it sink in their minds, that the Emperor whom they had often deeply favoured, would ever part with the Dukedom of Milain, which only thing the French King required, and had for the recovering thereof unfortunately thriven almost twenty years, to the trouble and disquiet of a great part of the World. The Nobility and Authority of this Embassage more moved the Senate than did the other former Embassadors, Dulacio Mendez, a Spaniard, and Guthobus Pellicanius, a Frenchman, whose both presents yet was it much suspected by the Venetians, because it contained no certain resolution, but only the bare hope of a future Peace; so that it was by many Men supposed to be but a matter devised to deceive others, and to serve the Emperors turn to his great profit. Yet all the cunning seemed to rest in this Point, That the Venetians did not on with the hope of this League, thought not the renewing of the League they had the year before taken with Solyman, which was now almost expired. Upon which uncertainty of other Mens resolutions, the grave Senators thought too dangerous a matter to depend.

Upon this question of this new League and Confederation to be made with these Christian Princes against the Turk, the Senate was wonderfully divided; some favouring the Emperor, respect, enjoining against the renewing of that dishonourable League with the Infidels, which they said was nothing else, but as much as in them lay to betray unto the other parts of Christendom, and especially Italy, detriment of their help, and yet not to be obtained without great charge; and with many reasons urged the honourable Confederation with these Christian Princes; others of a contrary mind, saying what infinite harms they had from time to time received by falling out with the Turks, and suffering also the Emperors drift; and joining thereto the consideration of the great dearth then reigning in the City, which was not to be relieved but out of Macedonia and Gracia, the Turks Countries; the Emperor having at that time as it were of purpose imposed for great a Custom upon all Corn to be transported out of Sicily, that the very Custom came to as much as both the price of the Corn and the Freight together; all which mischief they said were to be prevented by renewing the League with Solyman. This matter was with great heat debated in the Senate too and fro, either part having great Favour; so that the Senators spent almost whole Winter nights in the Court-dilcussion and confounding withal were left to be won; but whether there was laid or decreed, was forthwith by one of the Factions or other made known, not only to the Embassadors present in the City, but by Letters also discovered into Provinces far off; a thing never before in that State known, which had ever used as it were with a religious silence to keep secret whatsoever was there decreed. Which thing Marcus Fulcrus, an old Senator and a Man of great wisdom perceiving, said openly, That the State was betrayed by the multitude and corruption of voices, and must needs shortly perish, if it were not speedily committed to the grave and faithful judgment of some few; for there was almost two hundred of them which gave voices, reducing the Multitude to the number of fifty, who for their experience and love towards their Country, were holden of Men of greatest gravity and secrecy; when he foreseeth a large way opened thereby to eternal Fame and Glory. These words were very glorious and gracious to the Hearers; but be as light headed Men without discretion, so excluded out of the Council; that he was by the voices of the Multitude first thrust out of the Council himself; and by them kept a great while after from all the Presents and Honours of the City; being indeed one of the gravest Senators, and a Man of deepest judgment. Which disgrace turned afterward to his great honour and credit, as one that had foreseen much, after they were once found out and condemned which had traitorously revealed the Secrets of the State.

The Venetian Senate secretly agreed towards the Emperor to renew the League with the Turk.

Fulcrus discovered the minds of the Senate.

The Venetians
Ambassadors to Solymán
in consequence of Peace.

But this long consultation concerning the Consideration, came to this end, That the Senators doubting the Union of those two great Princes, and yet willing to expect the event, decreed forthwith to send three Embassadors; whereof two should be sent to the Emperor and the French King to discover their designs; and the third, which was Aloysius Baderius, a wife and well spoken Man, was with all speed dispatched away to Solymán, to prevent the fame of the distrust to be conceived of the agreement of these great Christian Princes; and if he could by any means, to spare for no Cost, to have un- to the Venetians their Cities of Naplium and Epidaurus, which Solymán required of them before he would grant them Peace. Which if it could not be obtained of the proud and crafty Tyrant, then to yield unto necessity, and to conclude a Peace with him upon any conditions, which could the Decem-Viri thought to be most expedient for the State; yet concerning the yielding up of the Cities, they gave him fewer instructions and warrant, fearing forthwith the force and tumult of the headstrong Multitude, who if they had known any such thing, would undoubtedly thereupon have taken occasion to have croffed and overthrowen that most wholesome Decree; for there was no doubt, that if they had delayed the matter, and fought for Peace too long, but that Solymán would upon another Mans weakness and necessity have increased his insatiable desire, and not granted them Peace, being brought low and forsaken, except they would deliver unto him the Islands of Cephalonia, Zacynthus, and Coryra, a matter no less grievous than the destruction of the very City of Genova it self. So that the great Embassadors Folius and Hambald, who came of purpose to have hindered the League with the Turk, by their great diligence wrought nothing more effectually, than that the Venetians the better foreseeing the danger of their State, should as they did, make haste to conclude the same; for it lalleth out in Mens purposes and Actions, That a good and happy success otherwise well hoped for, is oftentimes marred with too much diligence and care. Neither was it any doubt, but that Hambald was sent by the French King for no other purpose, but to be understood by Pelicerius the old Embassador, perswaded the Venetians to hasten the conclusion of Peace with Solymán. Which as Baderius their Embassador was carefully soliciting the matter at Constantinople, and being loath to yield the strong Cities which Solymán required, offering unto him in stead of them a great sum of Money, Solymán took him up with these things as a flame-trick Dissembler, earnestly pressing. That he would never grant him Peace, without the yielding of those Cities, rehearsing unto him the most secret points of his Embassage, and how that he was authorized from the Decem-Viri to yield them unto him; which thing the Embassador little thought Solymán had known. Wherefore Baderius so thankfully reprieved, and standing in doubt of his life, seeing the greatest secrets of his Embassage revealed to Solymán and his Baffles, was glad to accept of Peace, by yielding unto him Naplium and Epidaurus, two Cities in Peloponnesus, and with them Nadium and Labrania, two Castles of Dalmatia, to the great grief of the whole Senate; for granting whereof the Common people ignorant of the secret Decree of the Decem-Viri, and supposing that Baderius had given away that which he had no authority to give, were so enraged against him at his return, that there was much ado to save the guiltless Man from exile, and his Goods from confiscation; although the Traitors were then known which had discovered the Secrets of the State unto the Turks. These were Maphus Lanius a Senator, and Constantinus Cobatinus, Secretary to the Colledge of the Decem-Viri, and the Traitorous disperser of the Turks Money for the deception of others; who with other his Complices were for the same Fact hanged in the Market-place, when as Leoniis and Cobatinus were a little before fled into France.

About the same time, which was in the Year of our Lord 1540, did Joannes Sepulch King of Hungary, Solymán Tributary; after whose death ensued great Wars in Hungary, and the lamentable subversion of that flourishing Kingdom; for the better conceiving whereof, it shall not be amiss with as much brevity as the plainness of the History will permit, to open the causes and grounds of the endless calamities which afterwards ensued, and never took end, until that warlike Kingdom was to the great weakening of Christendome utterly subverted.

King Ferdinand and this tributary King John, had with like desire of Peace and quietness, made between them a League; profitable to them both as their Estates then stood, rather than honourable; yet most welcome to the Hungarians, who were divided into Faction, and having followed before the one King and some the other, enjoyed nevertheless their Lands and Goods by the benefit of this Peace; the Towns and Castles being still kept by them in whose possession they then were at the making of the Peace. In the capitulations of which Peace, it was comprised, That Ferdinand should from thenceforth call John by the Name of a King; whereas before he had both in his common Talk and Letters called him by the Name of the Vayvod only: It was also expressly set down in the same Articles of Peace, and subscribed by the Hands of divers of the Nobility of Hungary, That if King John should die, King Ferdinand should succeed him in the whole Kingdom of Hungary; which condition was suppressed and kept very secret for fear of Solymán, who accounted that Kingdom as of his own, gotten by Law of Arms and bestowed upon King John as upon his Vassal; neither was it to have been thought, that if he should have known thereof (being of a haughty mind by nature, and not able to endure an injury) he would have suffered that Kingdom, good and defended with so great danger and cost, to be by the Will of an unthankful Man, transferred unto his Enemy.

This matter of so great importance, was (as the secret confederations betwixt them is reported) by Eleronimus Lalicus Embassador for King Ferdinand to Constantinople, revealed unto Solymán and the Baffles, to bring King John into hatred. So much did this noble Gentleman, for his rare Vertues otherwise greedily to have been commended, yield unto his grief, and desire of revenge; when after the death of Aloisius Grittius, he fell from the friendship of King

A Peace concluded betwixt the Venetians and Solymán.

The Queen with Child.

King John, being (as is before declared) by him committed to Prison, and hardly afterwards enlarged, at the request of King Sigismund. Whereupon Solymán being exceedingly angry with King John, called him unthankful Churl, and turning himself about to Luxius Balis his Brother in Law, said, How unworthily do these two Christian Kings wear their Crowns upon their faithless Heads, who as shameful deceivers are not afraid, either for worldly shame or fear of God, for their profit to falsify their Faith? But King John understanding thereof, and wonderfully fearing his own Estate, did by good Friends and rich Presents, pacify Solymán again, laying all the blame upon King Ferdinand, as better able to bear it. Not long after, King John having for his Kingdom in good order, and strongly fortified the City of Buda; being now far stricken in years, at the earnest request of most of the Nobility of Hungary, and other his best Friends, married Isabella the Daughter of Sigismund King of Polonia, a gracious Lady and of great Spirit; which King Sigismund, had long before married Barbara King John's Sister, after whose death he married the Lady Bona Sfortia, the Daughter of Joannes Galacius Duke of Milan, by whom he had this Lady Isabella whom King John now married. Which Marriage Solymán liked well of, having many times by way of talk before condemned the single life of the King; but King Ferdinand liked thereof nothing at all plainly foreseeing, that the Hungarians (if the King should chance to have a Son) would forthwith look upon him as their natural King, and reject himself as but a Stranger.

This young Queen in short time (as he had feared) conceived with Child, and was now very big; when King John was employed to make an expedition in person himself against Maylat, (famous for the death of Aloisius Grittius) and Bela, both Governors of Transylvania; whereof Maylat not contented with the Name of Vayvod or Governour, fought to make himself King. But Solymán detesting the impudent Arrogancy of the faithless Man, and hating him for the death of Grittius, and the Turks slain with him, advertised King John of all the matter, willing him to be more circumspect, whom he trusted with the Government of so great and rich a Country. So Maylat shamefully rejected of Solymán, and out of hope of a Kingdom, fearing also to be thrust quite out of his Government by King John, thought it best for his own safety to raise up all the Province unto Rebellion, and to take part with King Ferdinand; which thing Ferdinand by his divers Agents secretly furthered to the uttermost. For these two Kings, although they were at Peace the one with the other, and in words and shew made semblance of friendship, yet in heart they envied and hated each other as if they should presently have waged War. At that same time King John exacted of his Subjects, and especially of them of Transylvania, a great sum of Money, to pay the Turks his Tribute, then two years behind: Which thing served Maylat and his Complices as a fit occasion to raise the People unto Rebellion, perswading them that there was no reason to pay unto the Turkish a Tribute, as would serve well to wage ten years honourable War against him; so that by that, and such like perswasion, all the Province was in an uproar, little differing from manifest Rebellion.

To appease these dangerous troubles thus rising, King John sent certain of his chief Nobility and best Captains with a great power into Transylvania, following after himself in his Chariot, not yet well recovered of his late

Sickness. These Noblemen entering in two places into Transylvania, and scouting up and down the Country, had in short time to feed the matter, that what by force, what by policy, the Tumult was well pacified, and divers of the chief Offenders worthily executed. Maylat the ambitious Author of this sedition, not able to hold the Field against the King, and seeing himself beset on every side with his Enemies, retired himself with all his Wealth into a Town called Eggaras, a horridly after hardly besieged; which the Kings power then lying at Silyburnus, the chief City of Transylvania, and about a mile distant from Eggaras, sick of an Ague, whereunto he was again fallen through too much care and pains taken in traveling in that hot time of the Year, the days being then at the longest. Whilst he thus lay sick at Silyburnus, and his Army laid by at the Siege of Eggaras, News was brought unto him from the Court, That the Queen his Wife was delivered of a fair young Son; which was no sooner brought abroad, but the Hungarians as Men overjoyed, came flocking to the Court where the King lay, discharging their Pieces in triumph with all other signs of joy and mirth they could possibly devise; the Noblemen came from the Camp to rejoice with the King, and all the Army was led with gladness. And for the greater glory of this so common a Joy, a royal Feast was prepared, whereunto the Noblemen would needs have the King, who with his presence, though he were then sick, willing being as yet but a little recovered; hoping by yielding to their importunity, he suffered himself to be overruled and brought to the Feast by them, which was unto him the merriest and the last that ever he made; for willing to shew his inward joy, and to content his Nobility there present, he forgot himself, and eat and drank more liberally than was for the health of his weak Body; whereby the Fever which had but a little before left him, was again renewed, in such sort, as that he well perceived he could not longer endure. Wherefore feeling his end to draw nigh on, he made his Will, appointing his young Son to be his Heir, whom he committed to the Tutelage of George Bishop of Veradium, and Peter Vecshe a noble Gentleman and his near Kinsman, until he came to Age; requiting the rest of the Noblemen to prefer his Son in the succession of the Kingdom, before a Stranger; telling them, That Solymán would undoubtedly take upon him the protection both of the Kingdom and of his Son, if they would in time send Embassadors unto him with Presents, and promise for his Son, that he should reign as his Tributary as he had done before; and so presently after died.

This King was of a courteous and gentle nature, bountiful, and in all his doings just, of no fierce and rough disposition, as the Hungarians commonly are, but of a most civil behavior, garnished with good letters, and thoroughly schooled in the divers chances of both Fortunes; measuring his actions by the strength of his power, but by the exact rule of deference; for in time of business no Man was more circumspect, or vigilant than he, nor in time of recreation any Man more courteous or pleasant. He used oftentimes to say, That the favour and love of valiant Men, gotten by bounty and courtesy, was the best Treasure of a Prince; for that courteous and thankful Men, did oftentimes in some one worthy piece of service, plentifully repay whatsoever had been bestowed upon them; as for such as were unthankful, they did to their shame bear the testimony of another Mans virtue.

posed in so weighty a Cause to use the advice of Sigismund her Father, whose Integrity and Justice was such, as King Ferdinand need no other Judge or Arbitrator to end that Controversie. Wherefore the requested a convenient time and space wherein the might ask Counsel of her Father, to whose just judgment the said the would stand, as he thought the Nobility of Hungary would also. Which small time of delay if it should be denied, and that they would needs forthwith make War upon her; the said, that the Emperor and King Ferdinand his Brother should surely win no great Honour, if they should come to oppugn her a Widow confuted with Tears, and a young Child yet crying in his Cradle. The Countess sent away, when he was returned to King Ferdinand, told him, That the Queen was altogether in the power of the Bishop, and could neither say nor do any thing, but what he had before received from him; for he only (as he said) commanded all; as for the rest of the Nobility, they shared amongst them the Honours and Preferments of the Realm, and as Men desirous of credit and gain, had rather be the Governours of the young Prince, than the Servants and Waiters of a great and mighty Foreign King; all which, he said he had both heard and seen. Wherefore all the hope was in War, wherein such speed was to be used, as that the Queen with her Son unprovided, and expecting the event of their Embassage from Constantinople, might be driven out of Buda before they could take up Arms, or well advise themselves what to do; and that the Queen sought delay but to make her self the stronger, and in the mean time to call in the Turk, and so to make a more dangerous War. Wherefore if ever he purposed to Reign in Hungary, he should forthwith call off all other Cogitations, and make ready his Forces with all speed possible.

Hereupon King Ferdinand furnished with Money from Charles the Emperor, without delay raised a great Army, which he sent down the River Danubius to Strigoniom, which City had all the Reign of King John, continued faithful to King Ferdinand. The General of his Army was Leonardus Vellus, a Nobleman of Rhenia; who for many causes, thought it expedient first to open the way to Buda; for almost in the middle of the way stood Vitegrade, with a goodly Castle upon the top of an Hill by the Rivers which Town (but not the Castle) Vellus after nine days Siege took with the loss of about two hundred of his Men, all the Garrison Souldiers therein being either slain or taken Prisoners, with Valentinus Lieutenant their Captain. From Vitegrade he passed over the River Danubius to Pefth, which he took, being forsaken of the Enemy. With like success he took the City of Vachia without loss; and removing thence, and crossing again the River with his Fleet, came and encamped before Buda, so to terrifie the Citizens, and to discover as far as he could the purpose of the Queen. Where Pererus, Stephanus Rajcaius, and Franciscus Francopanis Bishop of Agria, all Men of great Nobility amongst the Hungarians, revolted from the Queen to King Ferdinand; the Bishop was reputed for a Man of great Integrity, and upon meer confidence to have gone over to Ferdinand; yet was he by Letters from George the Kings Tutor, challenged to have revolted, in hope by means of Charles the Emperor to be made a Cardinal. Vellus lay with his Army at the hot Baths, about a mile and a half from the City, as if he would rather besiege it than assault it. The Germans lying there, did fetch in Boory round about the Country; which was taken in evil part by the Hungarians on their side, who seizing their own Cattel, or their Friends driven away, the Villages burnt, and the poor Husbandmen bound and taken Prisoners, fell together by the Ears oftentimes with the Germans. On the other side they of Buda sending out their Troops of Horsemen, skirmish with the Germans if they did but stir out of the Camp, and well defended the Villages from the injury of the Enemy; for Valentinus Thauricus General of the Queens power, had taken into the City a wonderful number of light Horsemen. Whilst the Army lay thus encamped, it furnished that Balthazar Pamphilius a noble Hungarian, straying out of the Camp even unto the Gates of Buda, desired the Warders at the Gate to give him leave to talk with Valentinus their General, for that he desired to see his old Friend, and to confer with him of certain matters concerning the good of the Common State. Which thing being granted by the General, he was immediately received into the City with his Troop of Horsemen. Shortly after returning again into the Camp, he reported how he had been entertained by his old acquaintance in the City; where viewing the Garrison, the great Artillery, and Fortification of the City, he perceived it was not to be taken without a greater power, and in a more seasonable time of the year. Which thing he moved Vellus, by nature suspicious, and doubtful of the fidelity of a Stranger, that he commanded him in anger to avoid the Camp, because he had without his leave gone into the City, and upon his own private infidelity had conference with the Enemy, and by amplifying their strength, to have discouraged the Army, by putting them out of hope of Victory. Wherefore Vellus never attempting to assault the City, returned again to Vitegrade to besiege the higher Castle wherein the ancient Crown, King Stiegs, parts from Buda, wherewith the Hungarian Kings were ever after him Crowned, was kept; which Castle he also took, with something less loss than he had done the lower Town. Not long after, he marched with his Army to Alba Regalis, the City where the Hungarian Kings were usually Crowned and Buried; which by the means of Pererus was delivered unto him, and a Garrison put into it for King Ferdinand. These things thus done, Vellus retired again to Strigoniom; which he did the rather, because the Germans and Hungarians, two rough Nations, could by no means agree together, in so much as that Vellus the General in parting them was wounded in the Thigh, and Pererus hurt with a Stone; besides that, Winter was now come far on, and the Souldiers cried out for Pay. For which causes, Vellus (being also sick of the Stone) bidden his Souldiers for that Winter about the Country. Yet before that, he new fortified Pefth, and left therein a Garrison; because it was reported, that the Turks upon their Frontiers were making preparation to come to aid them of Buda.

At such time as King Ferdinand was levying his Forces for the invasion of Hungary, the Queen by the Counsel of the Bishop had in good time craved aid of the Turks Lieutenants in the Countries bordering upon Hungary, especially of Uffrey Governour of Bafus (a very aged Man, and of great Honour, who had married one of the Daughters of Bajazet the old Emperor) as also of Mahometes Governour of Belgrade, and Annaraber who had the charge of the Frontiers of Dalmatia; from whom he received one answer, That they might in no case without express commandment from Solyman depart from the places places committed to their charge. Besides that Mahometes was by rewards overcome by Lachus, he he passed by Belgrade to Constantinople, and so stir or aid the Queen. Wherefore this, rejected by these great Captains, certified Solyman by her Embassadors, what danger her self, her Son, and the Kingdom was in, craving his speedy aid. Lachus was not yet come to Constantinople, being fallen sick by the way, but had felt before, Ptolemy his Physician to the great Bassiae, and especially to Lurza his old acquaintance, upon whom he had bestowed great Gifts, and was in hope by him to have obtained what he desired, but all in vain; for Solyman who thought it much for his honour to defend his own right, and that he had before given unto King John thought also that it would redound both to his great profit and glory, if he should as it were upon charity take upon him the protection of the Widow and Fatherless Child, in their great distress and danger. Wherefore calling unto him the Embassadors, the three great Bassiae standing by, he said, That he had of his meer bounty before given the Kingdom of Hungary unto King John, to defend to his posterity, so long as they should retain the kind remembrance of so great a benefit; wherefore to declare his constancy, incapable from his bounty, he said he would take such a course in the matter, as that the Germans his Enemies should not long rejoice of the Wars they had begun. And in token of friendship, and that he had taken upon him the protection of the young King, he caused to be delivered unto the Embassadors a royal Robe of Purple and Gold, a Buckler with the Bos most curiously wrought, a Horsemans Mace with a handle of Gold, and a Scimitar with the Scabbard richly set with Stones; and afterwards wrote effectually to Uffrey and Mahometes his Lieutenants. That they should without delay aid the Queen, and not to make excuse because it was Winter, and that it might if the rook any harm through their default and negligence, it should cost them their Heads. The Queens Embassadors glad of their good dispatch, were scarce departed from the Turks Court, when Lachus came to Constantinople; and underhanding by his Physician the success of the Hungarian Embassadors, proceeded for all that in his business, and delivered his Message, and upon reasonable conditions requested the Kingdom for King Ferdinand. But when he in speaking had oftentimes made mention of Charles the Emperor, as if he would with all the power of Germany aid his Brother; Solyman was so moved therewith, that he was presently taken away and committed to Prison; the great Bassiae, but especially Raskyn, Solymans Son in Law, a proud and furious young Man, chiding him and taking him up as worthy of death, for offending with his liberal Speech the Majesty of so courteous a Prince, and as it were mocking the King of Kings; requiring friendship, when in the mean time his Master most impudently made Wars in Hungary.

Uffrey and Mahometes the Bassiae aforesaid, having received such frait commandment from Solyman, assembled their dispersed Souldiers, and by drawing brought them down the Rivers Savus and Dravus, into Danubius; for it is a hard matter to perform any great thing by Wars in Hungary without the help of a great Fleet, for conveying of the great Ordnance, Victual, and other such necessities of the Army, from one side of the great Rivers to the other, as occasion requires; but as then being the midst of Winter, and the North Wind blowing hard, Danubius was so Frozen on both sides, that the middle of the River was scarce open; so that the Turks not able to pass for the extremity of the Weather, Solyman, were enforced to their Tents there to abide the hardness of Winter, to the vexation of their readines. It is almost incredible to be spoken, with what patience and resolution the Souldiers endured all the extremities of the time, in so bare a place, their Horses, which of all other things they held most dear, starving for Cold and want of Meat.

The Spring at length coming on, right welcome both to the Turks and the Queen, Mahometes with his Turke and wild Illyrians, and Uffrey with his Souldiers of Bafus, entered into Hungary, with whom Valentinus General of the Queens Forces, joyned also, with an Army of Hungarians brought from Buda. And the Queen to further the matter, sent Presents to the Turks Generals, victualled the Camp, and furnished them with great Ordnance for the besieging of such Cities as were holden by King Ferdinand her Enemy. They passing over Danubius, took the City of Vachia (being but badly defended for King Ferdinand) and putting many to the sword, after the manner of their barbarous Cruelties, burnt the City. From thence they removed to Pefth, which was valiantly defended by Barcecius and Rajcaius, the one a Hungarian Captain, the other a German, that the Turks despairing of the winning of the City, and not well relieved by Victual by the Queen then, fearing future wrong, passed again over Danubius, and faithfully rejoining the great Ordnance without any more doing, returned again into their own Countries; but in their retiring, the Hungarians by the leading of Fererus Genarus, slew many of them, amongst whom was one Achometes one of their best and valiantest Captains.

King Ferdinand advertised of the Turks departing, returned again to his old hope of recovering the Kingdom; perfwading the Emperor his Brother, not to give over the War, so fortunately begun, especially now that the Turks having forsaken the Queen, were departed and gone. Wherefore the new Forces lately before raised in Austria, Bohemia, Sillesia, and Moravia, for the new supply of Vellus his Army, were presently sent into Hungary, under the leading of the Lord William Regendorff Steward of the Kings House, who was then gone as far as Pofsonium to have relieved them of the Queen, as a man of more ancient and honourable General Vellus gave place. He, furnished with these new Supplies, three months Victuals, and great Artillery from Vienna, joyning with the old Army, marched directly to Buda, and besieged it. Overagainst the stately Castle of Buda, wherein the Queen lay, was a great Hill called St. Gerrards Mount, so high, that the middle thereof was equal with the highest place of the Castle, and from the top thereof they might look into the Streets of the City, betwixt which Hill and the Castle was a great Valley and a deep Ditch. Upon this Hill, Regendorff sought to beat the Castle, and to terrifie the Queen, planted his Battery, and so shooed a new built Tower thereof, that it was thought that it would have suddenly fallen; which if it had, yet was it supposed a dangerous matter to have assaulted it, because it was walled about by a rubble Wall. But the sumptuous Towers and the princely Galleries of the Kings Palace in the Castle, which every Man law Regendorff might have beaten down with his great Ordnance, he spared; but whether of himself, or else commanded by the King (as loath to destroy so goodly Buildings, as could not without great charges be in long time again repaired) was uncertain. sent unto the Queen, he wished her to break in sunder those Gyves and Fetters wherein the Bishop under colour of protection, had fast bound her Son and her, and to accept of King Revalius offer, who was ready to bestow upon her a goodly Seignior, whereas she might most honourably live in quiet, and bring up her Son in safety. Which thing if she, as a simple Woman, and ignorant of her own danger, should refuse, and obstinately contend the peril wherein the flood, he would forthwith in most terrible manner break down the Palace about her Ears. Whereunto the Bishop in the Queens behalf answered, That she was not such a Fool to exchange the Kingdom of Hungary for the Principality of Sepulvia; and that she thought Regendorff a very doting and mad old Man, who being once before well beaten in those Ditches, came now again like a Fool to receive his utter destruction in full gerdon of his rash Folly; wherefore he should cease to terrify valiant Men, fighting with discretion for their natural King and Country, against his drunken Company, for that they were nothing troubled with the noise of his great Shout; but yet he said, that he would above all the rest, by way of private courtesy, gently request Regendorff to discharge his Pieces with a little less noise, because he had a Sow at home graced with Pigs, which terrified with the thundering of his Guns, would farrow he doubted before her time, to the grief of his Guests. For the Bishop was of a sharp and teasing Spirit, and such a contentner of the Germans, that when two of them were taken in the Kings Orchards burning certain Houses, he in derision caused two Hogs to be hanged upon the same Gallows with them. Not long after, Regendorff removed his Camp from St. Gerrards Mount, to a more commodious place for the barring of the City, called the St. Juss Graves, near unto the Gate called the Yew Gate. Which thing the Bishop seeing, after his quipping manner requested of Regendorff to pardon him, in that he had of late wrongfully called him a doting old Man; for that in removing his Camp into a more commodious place, he seemed to be a proper wile Man and of good discretion, now that he had pitched his Tents in a moist place amongst the dead, both for himself being an old Man and almost worn with vain labour; and for his Army there condemned to die with him. Regendorff thus encamped, began in two places to batter the Walls; Perennis and the Hungarians with the Bohemians near unto the Gate called Sabatina in one place, and he himself with the Germans betwixt the Yew Gate and the Castle in another; which was done with such violence, that a great part of the Wall was beaten down, and another part thereof overcharged with Earth, which the Defenders had cast up on the inner side for the strengthening thereof, was at the same time borne quite out and fell down, to the wonderful dismay of all that were in the City. Which fair opportunity to have taken the City, Regendorff let slip, either for his want thereof by reason of the great smoke of the Artillery on both sides, and the Dust arising with the fall of the Wall which covered all; or else according to his natural disposition, doing all things leisurely and suspiciously; so that a little delay bereft him of the present apprehension of so sudden a resolution; and the Germans used more to flustering battle than to assaults, were not to be so easily brought on to assault the Breach upon the sudden, as were the Spaniards, Italians, or French. The Wall was opened in that place almost two hundred Paces in length, yet standing almost the height of a Man, which might easily have been scaled with short Ladders; but night was coming now fast on, wherein the Germans would not willingly attempt any dangerous matter; so that the assault was deferred until the next morning. Upon the first of Buda in the mean time taking the advantage of the Enemies delay, with incredible diligence and labour in that night raised up a new Rampier in stead of the Wall that was fallen, every Man without exception putting his hand to the Work. In the morning the Germans coming to the Breach, gave such fierce assault unto the new made Rampier, that Orso Foiscau desperately entered into a flattered Hoof, which joined unto the Wall; and certain other Companies, one Souldier helping up another, had almost recovered the top of the Rampier, and were there ready to have set up their Ensigns; when they of Buda with wonderful constancy and resolution withstood the assailants, George the Bishop encouraging them, and fighting amongst them; who having laid aside his Hood, was now to be seen with his Helmet on his Head, running too and fro as need required all along the Rampier. At length the Germans seeing themselves to strive in vain against resolute Men, were enforced to retire. In this assault Regendorff lost above eight hundred Men. Perennis was also in like manner, but with less loss, repulsed at the other Breach he had made at the Gate Sabatina. After that, Regendorff attempted by undermining to make open the City, but was by Countermine disappointed of his purpose. Yet for all this, they in the City began to feel the want of many things, so that it seemed they were not able to endure any longer Siege; the common People pinched with Hunger, crying openly out in mutinous sort, that it was time to yield and make an end of those common miseries; but such was the Authority of the Bishop, with his provident foresight of all urgent events, that once shewing himself in the Market-place as if he would have preached he could turn the peevish minded people which way he pleased.

After all this, it misted but a little, but that this City which could not by Enemies force be won, had by shameful Treason been lost; there was at that time in Buda one Bornemissa a Lawyer, who had in former time been Maior of the City; this Bornemissa exceedingly hated the Bishop for taking part with the Law against him, and being full of malice, and desirous of revenge, promised to Revalius (Marshall in the Enemies Camp) to deliver to him the blind Postern in St. Marius Church-yard, whereby he might enter the City; which Gate served the Citizens in time of Peace to go through to the River. Regendorff the General made acquainted with the matter, so liked thereof, that he in himself thought it not good, in a matter of so great importance, to use at all the service of the Hungarians: Quite contrary to that Bornemissa had requested of Revalius, who desirous to have the matter brought to pass without the slaughter of so many guiltless People as was by him to be betrayed, would have had it altogether performed by the Hungarians, who he was in good hope would show mercy unto their Country-men and Kinsmen, and use their Victory with more moderation than the Germans, who provoked with many despights, and coming in by night, were like enough to make great use of their Blood. But Regendorff after the manner of his Nation, to be counted pollicy, using to keep promise with no Man, and hoping by excluding the Hungarians, to have all the glory of the conceived Victory wholly to himself; made as if he would have have used only the Hungarians, and glozed with Revalius, who for the more assurance he took as a Pledge; For against the appointed hour, which was about midnight, having before given straight charge that no Man should fit in the Camp, he sent four fleec Companies of Germans with great silence unto the Postern; in which time his son Cadi stood with a strong Troop of Horsemen ready to have entered, at such time as the Germans (received into the fort) should break open the great Gate, as was before agreed. Neither did Bornemissa fail to perform what he had as a Traitor promised; but opening the Postern we spoke of, had with great silence received in most part of the great German Companies. But when he felt asked folly of them as they came in, for Revalius, and heard them answer nothing but in the German Language; although he was otherwise a Man of a bold Spirit, yet then surprised with a sudden fear (as it oftentimes chanceth in such actions to Men deceived of their expectation) he stood as a Man amazed that knew not what to do, and forgot to command the Germans, who altogether unacquainted with the City, knew not which way first to go; and stealing on softly in the dark, went on with no great courage, for fear of Treason, till asking of them that followed, for him that should direct them. The Germans could not go so closely, but that they were by the clattering of their Armor and the light of their Matches, descried by the Watch; who asking for the Word, and they not giving it, presently raised an Alarm; but now all too late, the City being as good as half taken, had the Germans well conducted, refused to give on with the matter so well begun; but they ignorant of their own fear, ran back again to the Postern, in such haste, that one of them miserably wronged another, in striving who should get out first; and their passage so much letted by the Pikes and Weapons which they which first had cast across the way to run the lighter into the Camp. The first that set upon the Germans was Bacimus, who had that night the charge of the Watch; and after him Vicchio, who kept the Court of Guard in the Market-place; and hearing the Cry of Alarm, came thither with a strong Company both of Horsemen and Footmen. Many of the most valiant Germans, who coming in first, were in flight become last, were slain or taken, and amongst them many of Bornemissa his Familiars and Friends (as for himself, he was got out among the foremost) from whom the Bishop by the exquisite Torment wrought out the whole Plot of the Treason, and afterwards caused them to be severally executed to the terror of others. Revalius in the mean time complaining in the Camp, That he was deceived by the General; and Bornemissa wofully lamenting, That having worthily got the name of an infamous Traitor, he had thereby lost all his Substant and undone his Friends and Kindred. The General Revalius (condemned even of the common Soldiers, for his foolish Arrogancy and Pride) was hardly spoken of through all the Camp, as he that by too much intemperance had overthrown the fairest occasion of a most goodly Victory; wherefore from that time he attempted no great matter, but set himself down by long siege to tame his Enemies, and to win the City.

Solyman understanding of the Queens distress in Hungary, and with what desire Ferdinand (supported by the Emperor his Brother) thirsted after that Kingdom, consulted with his Baffles, of the purposes and power of his Enemies both there and elsewhere; and politically resolved at one time, with his divided Forces, to withstand their attempts in divers places, and those neck of his power is well to be perceived. First, he sent Solyman Baffles, to march to Babylon, to defend the Country of Medopotamia, and the Frontiers of his Empire along the River Tigris, and against Tamar the Persian King. Mahomet a-mother of his great Baffles, he sent into Hungary to relieve the besieged Queen; and Anders his Officer Baffles, which was the fourth of his chief Baffles, with another Army to fly at Belgrade, in readiness to aid the other Baffles sent before him, as occasion should require, if he should find his Enemies too strong. Unto Bor-belle he committed his Navy, for the defence of Grecia and Epirus against Auria, who but a little before, aided by the Turks and Moors (which took part with the Turks) out of Clepea, Neapolis, Adramutium, Rapina, Tepina, and call Molodunia, except the City of Lepis, and caused those Cities to submit themselves to the Government of Mahomet King of Tunes. These Cities are at this day called Calabria, Susa, Mahometia, Memetaria, Sfaxia, and Africa. And because Solyman understood, that Maylat Ferdinand, he sent against him Achometus Governor of Neapolis, who commanded Peter of Moldavia, Prince of Valachia to aid him; who afterwards accordingly came unto him with thirty thousand Horsemen. He himself also doubting the purposes of the Christian Princes, and especially of Charles the Emperor, more than he had need, came to Hadrinople, and in the Countries thereabout raised a third Army, to aid the two Baffles sent before into Hungary; keeping with him his Son in Law Rufinus, whom he had made one of the four great Baffles of his Council, having thrust out Lefebus, whom the Turks call Lurcia, his Brother in Law, and exiled him into Macedonia for evil entreating and striking his Wife, which was Solyman Sister, as is before said, but was at this time done.

Mahomet the Baffles desirous to do his great Matter the best service he could, entered into Hungary with his Army about the middle of June in the year 1541; being with him in the way the other Mahomet Governor of Belgrade, who gave the shameful overthrow unto the Christians at Esek; joyning also with him the power of Bajna, now commanded by Ulanus the Persian; for that Ulfers the old Baffles was lately dead. The Captains of the Christian Army hearing of the coming of the Turks, entered into Council, Whether they should continue the Siege, or else go and meet them by the way and give them Battle. But the Period of the Hungarian Kingdom drawing fast on, and the inevitable Destiny thereof so requiring; the opinion of Regendorff prevailed against the rest for the continuing of the Siege, he seeming more willing to die than to cross over the River to Pegh, or to retire to Viegrad or Sirigium, as divers would have persuaded him; wherefore he removed from the place where he lay before, and encamped his Army on the further side of the City, at the foot of St. Gerrards Mount, where the Hill lying between Buda and the Camp, and departing from the River, leaveth a fair Plain toward the East; of purpose that the Turks (which he knew would not go far from the River and their Fleet) should be enforced dangerously to pass by the Mouth of his great Ordinance, which he had aply placed upon the front of his Trenches; for such was the nature of the place, that the Camp lay defended on the right hand with the steep Hill, on the left hand with the River, and behind toward the City with a strong Bulwark. Upon the right hand, upon a little rising ground, he placed the lesser Camp, wherein were the Hungarians which favoured King Ferdinand, and then followed his Ensigns. He made also a Bridge from his Camp into a little Island which lay in the River, and with a Fort well planted with Ordnance commanded both the River and the Plain, so to beat the Enemy's Fleet coming up the River, and themselves also as they should march along the Plain. He was about also to have made a Bridge of Lighters and Boats quite over the River, from his Camp to Peßk, and in this order to expect the coming of new supplies from King Ferdinand, and to repel the Enemy who was coming, and with long Siege to weary them in Buda; for there was such force both of Victual and all other warlike Provision in Peßk, as would well have sufficed his Army until Winter had been spent. As soon as the Turks were come nigh the City, Valentinus as an Ambassador from the Queen, met them with two thousand Horse, and fully instructed both the Mahometis, what the Christians did; what strength they were of, and how they might most conveniently encamp their Army. Wherefore the Bassa marching on boldly forward, came within half a mile of the Christian Camp, where he quickly intrenched himself round with a strong Trench, filling a great part of the Camp with his Tents. But the other Mahometis, Governor of Belgrade, a most pollicer Captain, took the higher ground towards the rising of the Hill, nearer unto the Tents of the Hungarians than of the Germans. Unto these two Armies thus encamped, belonged also two Fleets; the Christian Fleet consisted of four and twenty Gallies, about fourscore small Pinnaces, and little less than a hundred Ships of burthen and other great Boats; whereas the Turks Fleet was not thought to be past half so great. Near unto the little Island, joined as we have before said by a Bridge to the Christian Camp, beneath in the River had the Turks taken another Island called Cepelia, over against their own Camp; where calling up a great Bulwark in the uppermost end thereof, and planting it with great Ordnance, they from thence shot at the Fort which the Christians held in the little Island, and at their Vessels passing to and fro in the River, as the Christians did at them likewise. This Island of Cepelia lyeth somewhat more than forty miles in length in the River Danubius, full of Country Villages, so commodiously, that if Regendorff had at the first taken it and fortified it, before the coming of the Turks, as the Hungarians persuaded him to have done, the Turks could by no means have encamped in the Plain, but must needs have forsaken their Fleet, fetching a great compass about more toward the West, further off from the River; which would have turned to the Turks great disadvantage. But no Alan is so wise as to foresee all things, when as the very evil conceits, be the Plot never so well laid, shall of it self, beside the loss, leave unto the unfortunate Man the Note of the want of provident Foresight and discretion. But Regendorff was unwilling to divide his Forces, until he had some new supply from King Ferdinand. Whilst the Armies lay thus near one to the other, there were some light skirmishes made every day, either by the Horsemen or the Footmen, and sometime one brave Man challenging forth another hand to hand, whom he thought by his Armour or some other sign of his worth, to be like to himself; which was so pleasant a sight to behold, that both the Armies upon a military courtesy, as if it had been so agreed, would many times for certain hours forbear to shoot any shot, of purpose to see those Gallants, with true Prowess to prove their Valour and Manhood one upon another with their Spears and Swords only. In which light skirmishes the German Horsemen were often times put to the worst; who mounted upon pranceworthy Horses, firmer for a set Battle, could never so readily charge the Enemy, nor pursue him in his flight; as could the Turks with their nimble and ready light Horses, so well acquainted with that manner of flying fight, that they would with wheeling about easily frustrate the first charge of the heavy Horsemen, and by and by come upon them again with a fresh charge, and so oft retire and come on again, until they had either wearied or overthrown them. But the Hungarians acquainted with that manner of fight as well as they, and also better armed, did easily encounter the Turks, and foil them, although they were in number more.

There was amongst the German Captains a Nobleman called Eckius Rayfchachius, whose Son (a valiant young Gentleman) being got out of the Army without his Fathers knowledge, bare himself gallantly in fight against the Enemy in the sight of his Father and of the Army, that he was highly commended of all Men, and especially of his Father, who knew him not at all; yet before he could clear himself, he was compassed in of the Enemy, and valiantly fighting, slain. Rayfchachius exceedingly moved with the death of his brave a Man, ignorant how near it touched himself, turning about to the other Captains said, This worthy Gentleman, whatsoever he be, is worthy of eternal commendation, and to be most honourably buried by the whole Army. As the rest of the Captains were with that passion approving his Speech, the dead Body of the unfortunate Son refused, was presented to the most miserable Father; which caused all them that were there present to shed Tears; but such a fuddain and inward grief surpris'd the aged Father, and struck to his Heart, that after he had stood a while Speechless, with his Eyes set in his Head, he suddenly fell down dead. From that time the General commanded, that no Man should upon pain of death, go out of the Army to skirmish with the Enemy without leave; wherein he was so severe, that he hanged up one or two that presumed to transgress his Commandment; which thing much discouraged his own Men, and so encouraged the Enemy, that they would sometime brave the Christians upon the top of their own Trenches.

Many days had now passed since the coming of the Bassa, the Turks and they of Buda daily increasing both in strength and courage; when on the other side, faint courage, weak strength, troubled council, uncertain resolution, the ominous signs of an undoubted overthrow, were easily to be seen; and hope it self, the stay of all human Actions, especially of Martial Affairs, almost lost; the only things that held their fainting Hearts, was the open letters of King Ferdinand, and the firm opinion they had conceived, That Charles the Emperor would not in so great a danger fail to aid his Brother, both with Men and Money; and last of all, the firm resolution of a General, which far passed all reason, the sooner to draw him to his end. The Armies lying in this order, the Turks from the higher ground, and out of Cepelia, perceiving the Germans in the little Island as careless men to keep but negligent Watch, agreed amongst themselves at one instant out of both their Camps, to assail divers of their Forts; and so in the break of the day landed with their Fleet so closely and suddenly to the Island, that they had slain almost six hundred of the Germans, before they were thoroughly awake or could well arm themselves; wherewith the self were put in such a fear, that they fled to the Camp in such haste, that many of them fell beside the Bridge and were drowned in the River. All the Camp was wonderfully troubled with the fuddainness of the matter, the Turks with their hideous cries raising the Alarm in divers places at once; yet for all that, certain German Companies in one of the Forts nearest unto the River, and the Soldiers in the Fleet, well declared their present resolution and valiant courage, in recovering again of the Island. For Heroldus, the Camp-Master, persuading them not to suffer the Christian Ensigns and great Ordnance to be so shamefully carried away of the Turks; and Marius the Admiral at the same time landing divers Companies in the Island with his Pinnaces and great Boats; they so courageously charged the Turks, then busied in the spoiling of the dead bodies and drawing away of the great Ordnance, that they drove them again into their Boats, leaving unto them as Victors, both the Island and the Ordnance, having before their departure, received no less loss themselves than had the Germans before.

It was reported, that the Turks Fleet might that day have been quite overthrown, if the Christians using the Victory, and hopen with the course of that swift River, had courageously pursued them and landed with them. But many things after a matter is done are easily seen, which in the very heat and huddle of the danger cannot be foreseen; for such as fuddain accidents are attended with great peril, do oftentimes daze the minds of right wit and valiant Captains; yet four of the Turks Pinnaces were sunk, and three taken, and many of the Turks slain or drowned in the River. Shortly after, the Turks more and more encouraged with the multitude of themselves, and the fearlessness they perceived in their Enemies, did at sundry times so insolently trouble and assail the Camp of the Christians on every side, that they left them almost no time of rest, one Company fall succeeding another, so that they were almost in despair, to be able long to defend their Camp, the Enemy still growing both in Strength and Courage. For the Bassa that lay at Belgrade, still taking unto him the sick and wounded Soldiers, sent continually fresh men in their stead; and Valentinus taking unto him a Company of the Turks Janizaries Harquebusers, had driven Peremus with the Hungarian Horsemen out of the upper Camp. So that they in the neither Camp were now hardly beset with their Enemies on every side; yet were they well helped by the great Artillery from Peßk, which much troubled Valentinus and his Horsemen in assailing the Camp on that side.

Some report that Valentinus, not greatly angry with the Hungarian banished men, but with the Germans, did by the way of private courtesy and Friendship, by a faithful Soldier with Peremus speedily to provide for the safety of himself and of the Hungarians with him; for that there was a great Beast coming, which would at one morrow devour them all. For Solyman advertised of the doings of the Emperor and King Ferdinand, thinking that they would have come down to Buda with a puissant Army, was resolved to be present himself at so notable a Battle, and was therefore coming thither with his Army in all haste. Wherefore Peremus thus forewarned, laid plainly to Regendorff and the other Captains. That except they would presently rise with the Army and depart, he would now whilst he had yet time, make shift for himself and his Countrymen. Their opinions diversly delivered, at last they all agreed, that it was best the next night to pass over the River to Peßk; only the General upon a fatal obstinacy said, He would not without King Ferdinand's commandment depart from Buda; and therefore sent Count Solyman with a swift Pinnace up the River to Vienne to know his pleasure therein. In the mean time urged with fear, Peremus fretting at their long stay, it was resolved upon, that they should the next night after the Moon was down, pass over the River in four Convoys to Peßk. In the first, were to pass over the Hungarians, with their great Ordnance. In the second, the German and Bohemian Horsemen; and in the other two, the Footmen, and the Baggage of the Army. For it was not to suffice a matter to make a Bridge over Danubius, as they had at first supposed; for after they had begun it, and almost planked it, there rose such a Wind and Tempest, and the violent River became so rough, that the Timber wherewith the Bridge was fastned together was broken, the Joyns unloosed, and many of the Boats whereof the Bridge was framed, their Cables being broken, were carried away by the force of the Stream. The first and the second Convoys therefore favoured that they well passed over; for although they of Buda and the Turks, seeing in the day time from their high places the Fleet drawing together into one place, might have some suspicion of the matter, some guessing one thing and some another; yet could they foresee nothing of the fuddain departure of the Enemy: But that multitude of Ships and Boats now passing too and fro, could not long deceive the attentive and vigilant Enemy; and so much they left, for that the two Hungarian Armies even then discovered to the Bishop the Flight of the Germans; who presently certified the Bassa, and the other, Mahometis thereof, which without further delay came almost with all their power to assault the Christians in their Camp; the great Ordnance was brought forth, and after the Janizaries and other Footmen, followed the Horsemen, dismounted from their Horses to do the better service; who all with a horrible cry assailed the Trenches. Then began the Germans to quail, their Flight being now discovered; yet did they with the Bohemians for a while notably resist the Enemy. All the Camp was filled with tumult and confusion, and especially at the River side, every man in that great fear striving to get aboard, without regard of order or flame; for the dead time of the night then covered with dark and thick Clouds, made all things more terrible, even unto them which were of best courage, the Authority of Regendorff the General (in the darkness of the night, and so great clamor both of his own People and of the Enemy, and the thundering of the Ordnance) was as nothing; he (besides that he was then sick in mind) lay in his bed wounded, by a wonderful and fatal chance, for as he was writing Letters to the King, a Faulcon-Shot out of the Enemies Camp falling in his Tent, and striking in under a Chelt which stood there, wounded him grievously in the left shoulder with a Splinter of the same. The other Captains of the Footmen, envying that the Horsemen were so well escaped, stood as men more careful of themselves than of the common danger, faintly resisting the Enemy. The uppermost Tents, wherein Peremus lay, were firt taken by Mahometes of Belgrade, and Valentinus, and the German Footmen, chased all over Scindia, and Gerrards Mount. Fleet of Buda also fell out, and entered the Camp on that side which was next unto the City, and with Wild-Fire burnt the Tents a little before forsoaken by the Germans. And the Bishop at the same time caused a great Stack of Straw standing by the Kings Stables near unto the Rivers-side, to be set on fire; which gave such a light, that a man might have seen all over Danubius unto the Walls of Pesth, as if it had been light day; whereby the great confusion of the Christian Army by Land, as well as the shameful flight by Water, was of the Turks plainly discovered. Then was the great Artillery from every place discharged upon the flying Fleet, as well from Buda as the Turks Camp. And to increase the fear, Cafon the Turks Admiral rowing with his light Boats against the Stream, fell upon the Ships crossing the River to Pesth, where he took certain Boats loaded with Soldiers, and with his great Ordnance sunk divers others; so that the River was filled with dead Bodies, and the miserable Company of Soldiers and Mariners laboured to save their Lives by swimming; for at such time as the Janizaries having slain the first Companies, were broken into the lower Camp; and the rest of the Germans flying over the Bridge into the little Island, were there slain without mercy, by the Turks pursuing them, many of them leaping into the River and there perished. Three hundred Sail of one sort of Ships and other, were so confused and mingled together, that Danubius seemed that night to have been covered over, as if it had been with a great Bridge. But the Christian Fleet seeing all lost, cleared themselves so soon as they could of the Turks; and to beating them back with great Cannon, nance out of the tops of their Ships, got up the River to Comor. The rest of the Land Forces endured the same Fortune in the Camp, of whom the Bohemians died most honourably, slain by the Enemy in Fight. Many falling into the hands of them of Buda, were saved or slain, as was their Fortune to fall into the power of a merciful or merciless man. But the Sun rising, plainly discovered the Slaughter of the Christians, and the Victory of the Turks, not so well before known. There were about three thousand men of one sort and other, in warlike manner had taken a little Hill by Saint Gerrards Church, and there stood upon their guard, until such time as more than two thousand of them were slain; the rest casting away their Weapons yielded in hope of life, and were referred for a spectacle more grievous than death it self.

At the same time Cafon with his victorious Fleet coming to the Shore of Pesth, brought such a fear upon them that were escaped thither, and might easily have defended the Walls, (only with the cry of his Soldiers and the thundering of the Artillery) that the Horsemen for haste to get out, were like to overrun one another. The Germans had at that time so much forgot their wonted Valour, and so trembled at the name of the Turks, that as soon as they saw their white Caps, in their Ships, they ran away as men dismayed, unarmed, leaving behind them their Plate, their Carriages, and whatsoever good thing they had else. Yet some of the Hungarian Horsemen more desirous of the Spoil than afraid of death, staid behind rifling the Merchant Ships, for Pesth was become a very rich Mart Town, for all kind of Merchandise, Merchants resorting thither from all other places of the Country, as to a strong and commodious City, and of more safety than the rest. But Cafon now entering without resistance, new some of those greedy Hungarians, and ran through the Town with such barbarous Cruelty and Thirst of the Christian Blood, that he spared neither Man, Woman, nor Child, except some few, which either for their Beauty or Strength of Body were reserved for the Turks beauty Lull, or flaviish Labor; so that in this War it is reported more than twenty thousand Christians were one way and another by divers chances slain. There was taken at Pesth, in the Camp and in the Island thirty six great Pieces for Battery, of wonderful Beauty; and of lesser Field Pieces an hundred and fifty. As for Shot, Powder, Armour, Weapons, and Victual provided for Winter, such force was found, that the Turks accounted it for the greatest part of their Victory. Rogendorf the unfortunate General, at such time as the Turks having won the Trenches, were fighting in the midst of his Camp, desiring rather to be slain in his Tent, than to live after a great overthrow, was against his Will by strong hand carried aboard a little Pinnace by his Physician and Chamberlain, which would not leave him as he lay, and was so conveyed up the River to the Island of Comor; where he shortly after, partly for the painfulness of his Wound, but more for grief of mind, died in a little Country Village called Samaricus, leaving unto the Germans a woful remembrance of his accursed obstinacy and pride. Solyman still doubting the coming of Charles the Emperor and King Ferdinand to Buda, was coming with his Army from Hadriampole in such haste, that he caused the Janizaries, his best Footmen, contrary to their manner, to march as fast as his Horsemen; but understanding by the way, of the late Victory obtained by his Captains, he took more leisure, and came with a great power to the same Comor, and there incamped on the other side of the City, to avoid the noisome favour of the dead Bodies, which lay yet unburied. Where calling unto him the other Army, and making one huge Camp of both, he highly commended all his Captains, but especially the two Mahometes. And understanding that the Victory was especially gotten by the means of Mahometes Governor of Belgrade, he made him General of all his European Horsemen, one of the most honourable Prefereements of the Turkish Empire; the other Captains he rewarded according as they had deserved, and withall augmented their Pay.

After that, he caused the Prisoners, in number Turkish Cavalry, about eight hundred, to be brought out; who bound in long Ropes, were in derision led all along the Army, ranged in order of Battel, and afterwards by his commandment flayed by his young soldiers; laying with severe countenance, that they were worthy of such death, which by Embassadors dissemblingly entreating of Peace, had in the mean time craftily waged War. Amongst these Prisoners was one Soldier of Bavaria of an exceeding high Stature; him in despite of the German Nation he delivered to a little Dwarf (whom his Sons made great account) to be slain, whose head was feared as the Kings of the tall Captives; with that cruel spite to aggravate the indignity of his death; when as that goodly tall man, mangled about the Legs a long time by that apish Dwarf with his little Scimeter, as if it had been in disport, fell down, and was with many feeble blows hardly at last slain by that Wretch, still heartened on by others, to fascinate the Eyes of the Princes, beholding it as their Sport.

This barbarous and cruel execution done, Solyman sent his Embassadors with Presents to the young King, which were three beautiful Horses, with their Bridles of Gold, and their Trappings richly richly fet with precious Stones, and three Royal Robes of Cloth of Gold; and unto the chief of the Nobility he sent rich Gowns and Chains of Gold. The Embassadors which brought these Presents, in courteous manner requested of the Queen, to send the young King her Son, attended with his Nobility, into the Camp, and without all fear, to hope that all should go well both with her and her Son; for that Solyman, who exceeded all other Kings, not in Power and Fortune only, but in Vertue and upright dealing also, was of such an heroicall Disposition, that he would not only defend the Child, whom in the right of his Father he had once thought worthy his Protection and Favour, Victory confirming the fame, but would also augment his Estate, with the largest Bounds of his ancient Kingdom. Wherefore he was desirous to see the young King, and to behold in him the representation of his Father, and with his own hand to deliver him to be embraced of his Sons; that of his Protection renewed, so happily begun, might be grounded a firm and perpetual Friendship with the Osotoman Kings; and that he would always account of her as of his Daughter, but the cause why he came not to see her, which he did in courteous desire, was for that by ancient custom the Osotoman Kings were forbidden that point of courtesy, to visit other mens Wives in their Houses. Besides that, Solyman (they said) was not so forgetful of his Modesty and Honour, as to receive into his Pavillion the Daughter of a King his Friend and Ally, and the late Wife of a King his Friend and Tributary, and the fair young Mother of a Son, growing in the hope of like Regal Dignity, for fear he should draw into any supposition the inviolate name of her Chastity, which in Queens was to be guarded with an especial and wonderful care. Whereunto the Queen (a manifest fear confounding the tender Senties in her Motherly Affection) answered very doubtfully; but the Bishop perswading her, and instantly requesting her, not to give the Turks occasion to suspect, that he had them in distrust, by her little and unprofitable delay; sent her young Son in Princely swathing Clothes, in a rich Chariot, with his Nurse and certain great Ladies unto the Camp, attended upon with almost all the Nobility to whom Solyman had sent Presents. In his coming to the Camp, he was for honour sake met upon the way by certain gallant Troops of the Turks brave Horsemen; and all the way as he passed in the Camp, orderly stood the Janizaries of Solyman Guard. As soon as he was brought into the Camp, Solyman courteously looked upon him, and familiarly talked with the Nurse, and commanded his Sons there present to take him in their Arms, and to kiss him, in certain token of the love they would bear him, whom they were in time to have their Friend and Tributary, when he was grown to mans estate; these were Solyman and Bajazet, begotten of his fair Concubine Roxalena; bearing the Names of the one of his Grandfather, the other of his great Grandfather. As for Mustapha his eldest Son by his Circassian Wife, he then lived in Adan a great way off; who though he was a Prince of so great hope, as never any of the Turkish Kings had a Son of greater, and was therefore exceedingly beloved of his Father, brought out of favour with him by Roxalena, as if he had traitorously gone about to take the Empire from him, yet living, as did Solyman his Grandfather from Bajazet; for which cause Solyman secretly purposed to take him away, as afterwards he did, and to appoint Selymus for his Successor, as hereafter shall appear.

Pesth taken by the Turks, and the city of the Turks.

But Solyman at such time as the Noblemen of Hungary were dining merrily with the Baffies, had commanded certain Companies (to whom he had before given instructions what he would have done) under the colour of seeing the City, to go to one of the Gates called Sabatina, and the chief Streets; which was done so quietly and cunningly, that a wary Watchman standing there and beholding the manner of the Turks coming and going too and fro, could hardly have perceived how the Gate was taken, until it was too late. For many of the Turks walking fair and softly by great Companies into the City, as if it had been but for pleasure, to have seen it; and other some to colour the matter, walking likewise back again, as if they had sufficiently viewed the City; by that means they without any tumult or stir quickly took the appointed Gate, with the Market place and chief Streets of the Janizaries caused Proclamation to be made in all parts of the City, that the Citizens should without fear keep themselves within their Houses, and forthwith, as they would have their Lives, Liberty, and Goods saved, to deliver all their Weapons, which they seeing no remedy, did; and having delivered their Arms, and taken them into their Houses as their unwelcome Guests. But such was the quietness and modesty of the Turks, by reason of the severity of their Martial Discipline, that no Citizen which took them into their Houses, was by them wronged by Word or Deed. Solyman understanding that the City was thus quietly and without resistance taken, sent the Child back again unto the Queen, although it was now almost night; but the chief Noblemen he retained fill with him; these were George the Bishop and Treasurer, Petrus Picche the young Kings high Kinman and one of his Tutors, Valentinus Taracene General of the Queens Forces, Stephannus Verbitus Chancellor, and Bacianus Urbanus Governor of the City of Buda. This sudden and unexpected change exceedingly troubled all their minds, and so much the more, for that the great Baffies with changed countenance began to pick quarrels with them, and as it were frantically and impudently to examine them, and to call them to account for all that they had done. The Queen seeing the City so craftily surprized, and the Nobility injuriously detained in the Camp, troubled with grief and grief, by humble Letters requested Solyman not to forget the Faith he had long before given unto her, and eyes of late confirmed by his Embassadors; but mindful both thereof, and of his wonted Clemency, to send back unto her the Noblemen, who for their Fidelity and valiant Service had well deserved both of him and her; this he did by Russenes Baffia, whom he had loaded with Gifts, and amongst other things of great price, had sent him a fair Coroner of her own, and a goodly Jewel set with rich Stones, to send unto his Wife (Solyman Daughter) for a Present.

After that, Solyman conferred with his Baffies four days, what order to take concerning the Kingdom of Hungary; in discourse whereof the great Baffies were of divers opinions. Mahometes desired him to carry away with him to Constantinople, both the young Child and all the Nobility, to leave such a Governor in Buda, as by his wife and moderate Government, rather than by rigour, might put the People out of fear of Servitude and Bondage, by defending them from wrong, and yet by little and little lay upon them the yoke of the Turkish Government. But Russenes Baffia (before corrupted, and a man in greater greater favour than the rest, because he was Solyman's Son in Law, and therefore further from all suspicion of Flattery; saying, That nothing could be more dishonourable unto so great and mighty a Monarch, who never had at any time with any Spot or Stain blemished the Glory of his Name, than after Victory, against all right and reason to break his Faith at once with a weak Woman and silly Infant, whom he had before taken upon him to protect and defend. On the other side, Mahomet Governor of Belgrade (an old mortal Enemy of the Christians, of all the rest best acquainted with the state of Hungary, and for his great experience and approved Valour, then extraordinarily admitted by Solyman into Council among the great former opinions, as too full of Lenity; and being asked his own, delivered it in this mischievous manner as followeth:

The Opinion of Mahomet Governor of Belgrade to Solyman, concerning the disposing of the Kingdom of Hungary.

I know (said he) most mighty Solyman, that he which in consultation of matters of so great consequence is to deliver his opinion last, shall be different from the rest, be subject to envy and reprehension, and therefore it cannot be, but that I being of a quite contrary opinion to them that have before spoken, my speech must be unto your Ears both unpleasant and tedious. But I refuse not to be counted by my self, yea and presumptions, if you will so have it, rather than a smoother up of other men's sayings, as one of no Judgment; whilst I recount those things, which as the present case standeth, may wonderfully profit your designs and the Imperial State; for right I may desire you to yield a little to my year, and if I may by your good favour so say to you that I have already done as when as I, now grown an old man in Wars against these Hungarians, have by experience learned those things of the State and Strength of this Kingdom, and the disposition of the People, which being here laid down, may much avail for your better determination of this so weighty a cause as admitteth no repentance if you shall now be overseen therein. You have now within the space of these twenty years come in Wars your self in person five times into this Country, when as I as no obscure Captain or Soldier, was in all those Wars and Battles ever present, of purpose, as I suppose, to revenge your Injuries, to enlarge your Empire, and in brief to assure you of a good Peace, which could never be by force of Arms and Victory. And therefore you valiantly won Belgrade, the infamous dwelling place and receptacle of most outrageous Thieves and Robbers, and in former time famous for the unfortunate attempts of your Ancestors; when as from thence the Hungarians in time of Peace had at their pleasure, whilst your Father was then occupied in the Persian War, spoiled the Borders of Servia and Illyria. The same Hungarians about five years after, for that they had in cruel manner slain your Embassadors, you overbore in battle, and slew their King; and possessed of Buda, to manifest and make known by a notable demonstration, the magnificence of your heroic mind, even unto the remotest Enemies of your name, did choose out of the reliques of that vanquished Nation, one whom you might grace with the honour of the Royal Crown, although not born of Royal Blood, or unto you known for any other desert, than that he was a little before, both your public and private Enemy; and coming gainst you with a strong power out of Transilvania, he had in the mean time lost his Brother, a better man than himself, slain with our Swords. After that, rose up the Austrian King, a new Enemy, to expulse the Hungarians, reigning by your courtesy, and so you took in hand the third War against the Germans, which you so effectually prosecuted, that having first with your self the King, you carried the terror of your self not only to the Walls of Vienna, but into the very heart of Germany. But two years yet scarcely past, the same King (never long contented with Peace or Wars) supported by the power of his Brother Charles, and in their besieging Buda defended by your Garisons, stirred you up again to revenge the Injury, Slaughter, and Spoil by his Souldiers done; for that you thought it to stand with your honour to protect him with your power, whom you had of your rare Bounty made a King; and then desired above all things, to fight a noble Battle with the two Brethren for the Empire of the West. But they at such time as you with Fire and Sword went through their ancient Kingdom, endured not the sight of your coming. After that, ensued a Peace between the Hungarians and the Germans; your Majesty permitting and approving it, as at such time as you made haste to go against the Persians; but the German King so broke that Peace, that had not I in good time revenged his Treachery, by the overthrow of a great Army of his at Exek, you must of necessity have been sent for from Babylon your self, as but now you were glad to come in haste, by long and painful journeys from Constantinople, to aid us in time, and I surely hope, to make an end for all; that all things (as in firm order in Hungary, the inconveniences of so many labours and so great charge, five times undertaken for another man's profit, might now at length take end; except (as I see (me with) you be in mind never to give over the protection of the Child and Widow, a matter full of infinite labour and peril, not to be counterwaied with that glorious show of honour, which by this (in my opinion) your too wise men is pretence to your haughty mind, ever too unwise men to this high point of Wisdom, abounding with Glory, which in the very course thereof cutteth in sunder the sinews of Victory, and is never by doing as I wish you more fortunate than your Ancestors, who have united eighteen Kingdoms to this your Empire, so would I not have you more wise than they is for what can be a more unwise path, than always to play the wisest of men? That is to say, always to be careful of other men's Affairs, and in mean time oftentimes to endanger his own Estate, his Health, his Wealth, his Honour. You have satisfied, and that (in my opinion) plentifully the duty both of Charity, Fidelity, and if it must needs be, of Honour and Glory also; if it be to be gotten rather by Courtesy, Clemency and Lenity, than by the inevitable strength of wise Policy, and the constant resistance of your mind's; for by those instruments, and some other, have worthy Virgins always promoted and supported the Ottoman Kingdoms. Wherefore let those vain Jews (as Semus unto me) of counterfeit honour delude the minds of idle and foolish Kings; assuredly they never pleased your armed Ancestors, but after the Enemy was quite overthrown, the Triumph made, and the Trophies of Victory erected. But let this be as best pleased your high Wisdom and Judgment, whereunto the greatest Wits gave place. Truly (as I said) we have the chance of War, and the assured vent of things; which chance of War, and the assured vent of things, which pleasure of my mind persuadeth me unto; when as necessity, which ruleth all things, presently foreseeth me and sheweth me a far better Course. The Hungarians above all other things notably want us not to revolt them, who infamous for their unconstancy after Treachery and Treachery, are still at variance amongst themselves; and their banished men are continually setting on the Germans to invade the Country, and the weak power of the Queen and the Child is not such as that withouten so near and so mighty an Enemy to be against another man's Kingdom must of necessity be defended by our help, which may not be left than a strong Army without our great peril. To be brief, every year to take in hand so long an expedition of so great labour and travel,

Mistake of the Court.

The Doom of Hungary.

The Queen departed out of Buda with her Son.

with an Army furnished with Horsemens, Footmen, Artillery, and a Fleet of 50 ships for defence of another man, as commonly we do, (I think to me more madly) rather do I think it to stand with the Majesty of the Ottoman Emperors, thus to be moved every year at the request of a pining Woman, crying for help; except you think it more profitable and honourable to maintain a defensive than offensive War: Wherefore (in my opinion) it is best to turn this Kingdom (so often conquered and defended by Law of Arms) after the manner of your Ancestors, into the form of a Province; the Queen I would have sent to her Father, and the Boy her Son brought up in your Court at Constantinople, and there instructed in our Religion; the Nobility of the Country I wish to be slain, and their Castles razed, and the notable Families which have the bravest minds, to be carried away out of all parts of the Country into Asia; as for the base multitude, I would have kept under with good Garisons, to till the ground, and inhabit the Cities. By this only means (mighty Solyman) shall both the Hungarians perceive themselves conquered, and the Germans glad to forbear coming into Hungary, unless they will rally and unfortunately hazard both Styria and Austria.

But Solyman thinking it good to do sacrifice before he would resolutely determine of so great a matter, entered into Buda with his two Sons, Selimus and Bajazet, the thirtieth of August in the year 1541, and there dedicated to the Virgin Mary (being before by his Priests Purified after the manner of their Superstition) sacrificed the first Mahometan Sacrifice in Buda. Shortly after, he as it were moderating the opinions of his great Counsellors, provided out of them all both for his own security and honour, and published a Decree, the fatal Doom of that flourishing Kingdom, whereunder it yet groweth at this day: That Buda should from that day be kept with a Garrison of Turks, and the Kingdom be turned into a Province of the Turkish Empire; and the Queen with her young Son should presently depart the City, and live in Lipso, in a fertile and quiet Country beyond the River of Theiss, which something to comfort her, was near unto the Borders of her Father Sigismund his Kingdom, to be safely conducted thither with all her Wealth and Jewels by his Janizaries. Wherefore the Queen and her Son, according to this Decree, with Tears and Mourning, Christening in her heart the Tyrant's perfidious dealing (which necessity informed her then to dissemble) departed from Buda, constrained by the Turks to leave behind her all the Ordnance in the Castle and City, with all other the Warlike Provision and Store of Victual. The Noblemen went with her also, who although they went forrowful for this woful and unexpected change of things, yet were they very glad of their Liberty and Safety, whereof they had for the space of three days despaired. Only Valentinus was kept in safe custody in the Camp, because he was a Martial Man of greatest power amongst the Hungarians; and besides that, much hated of the Turks for the hard pursuit of Cafo and his Horsemen, slain at Storaberg in Austria. Thus the Royal City of Buda fell into the hands of the Turks, whereupon not long after ensued the final ruin of that Kingdom, sometime the strong Bulwark of Christendom, but lost to the great weakening of the Christian Commonwealth; which may justly be imputed to the Pride, Ambition, and Diffention of the Hungarians amongst themselves, and the calling in of the common Enemy; the due consideration of whose only coming, might well have sufficed to make them agreed.

Whilst these things were doing at Buda, King Ferdinand expecting the event of this War at Vienna, and hearing of the shameful loss of his Army, and that the General deadly wounded was fled to Comara, and that Solyman (Fame creating the evil News) was coming towards Vienna; sent Leonardus Velsius (who never liked of the Siege of Buda) to Comara, to stay the further Flight of the Souldiers, and to gather together so well as he could the dispersed Reliques of the scattered Army, and to comfort again the discouraged men with the hope of new supplies and of Pay. And somewhat to stay Solyman, who as it was thought would suddenly come to Vienna, he sent Count Salma and Sigismund (indubitably a noble and grave Counsellor, his Embassadors, with Presents and new Conditions of Peace to Solyman. The Presents were a high flaming Cup of Gold after the German fashion, curiously set with curious devices, daily exprefling the hourly passing of the Time, the motion of the Planets, the Change and Full of the Moon, the motion of the superior Orbs, ever moving by certain Wheels and Weights curiously conveyed within the frame, and exactly keeping due time and motion; lively exprefling the wonderful motions and conversions of the Celestial Frame. A most curious and strange device of Work, delicate and perfected by the most cunning Astronomers for Alexander the Emperor, whose noble mind never spared for any Cost to obtain things of rare and strange device. The Embassadors passing down the River of Danubius, were at their landing first received by Cafo the Admiral of Solyman's Fleet, and by him brought into a rich Tent, the ground under their Feet being all covered with rich Carpets; to whom Ruffian Bassa sent such good honour into the Camp afforded, but especially most excellent Wine, no less than the Turks by their Law, than desired of the Germans. The next day after, the great Baffes feasted the Embassadors, Solyman himself dining not far off in his Pavillion; at which Feat the Baffes for the more courteous dined with the Embassadors, not sitting with their Legs gathered under their flat upon the ground, as their manner was but sitting in Chairs at a high Table, after the manner of the Christians; only Mahomet Governor of Belgrade, for his Age and Valour, an extraordinary Gift, far down upon a Cushion beneath the Baffes. Their Cheer was only Rice and Mutton, and that so plainly and sparingly clothed, as if they had thereby noted our gross and manifold excess; who measure not our Cheer by that which Nature requirith, but that which greedy Appetite desireth, as if therein consisted the greatest Nobility; and the Drink for the great Baffes themselves, right easy to be had, was fair Water out of the River Danubius. After Dinner the Embassadors were brought in unto Solyman, each of them led betwixt two Baffes holding them fast by the Arms, as it had been for honours sake, and so brought to kiss his Hand. For the Turks suffer no Stranger otherwise to come unto the Presence of their suspicious Emperor, but first they search him that he have no Weapon about him, and so clapping him by the Arms under the colour of doing him the honour of dishabing, to receive him of the use of his Hands, lest he should offer him any violence; yet hath he always as he sitteth in his Throne, lying at hand ready by him a Target, a Scimeter, an Iron-Mace, with Bow and Arrows.

The great Globe was also brought in by twelve of the Embassadors Servants, which with the strangeness thereof filled the mind of Solyman, and the Eyes of his Baffles with admiration; for Solyman was of so flarp a Wit, that he was not learned only in such Books as contained the Laws and Rites of the Mahometan Superstition, but had also curiously studied Astronomy, and especially Cosmography, in which profitable and pleasant study he much recreated himself as his leisure served. The Embassadors desired that he would give the Kingdom of Hungary to King Ferdinand, almost upon the same conditions that Lafca had before required it for him at Constantinople, paying him six yearly Tribute as King John had usually paid, and promising farther to draw Charles the Emperor his Brother into a false League; so that Solyman might turn his Forces upon the Persian, which it was thought he most desired. Besides that, they said he should desire nothing honourably nor indifferently, if he should prefer the young Child before King Ferdinand, who befide his ancient Right unto that Kingdom, (which they were not now to urge, as oppressed by his happy Victories, but might in a time be revived) had also a late interest by a League betwixt him and King John, wherein he had expressly covenanted by the solemn consent of the greatest part of his Nobility, that King Ferdinand should succeed him in the Kingdom. Whereby they excused him of the late War, as justly taken in hand against the Queen and her Son usurping upon his Rights; which King John knowing to be good, and moved with Confidence, had by his solemn act acknowledged, though to the great offence and prejudice of Solyman, his fetter up and defender, as also to the touching of himself in honour, to have to unthankfully and fraudulently dealt with his Patron, to whom he was by the Oath of Obedience bound. Wherefore they requested, that sith he being a Prince of all others most mighty and magnificent, handing upon his upright dealing both in Peace and War, had so lightly regarded the sile dealing of so ungrateful a man; he would rather accept of King Ferdinand to many ways injured, as his Friend and Tributary, than to have him his perpetual Enemy. Concluding, That nothing could be unto him, for the good report of his Justice more commendable, or for the assurance of a perpetual Peace more profitable, or to the immortal praise of his Bounty more honourable, than to call a King of a most ancient Discent, famous for his Verue and Fidelity, chosen for a King by the Bohemians, desired for a King by the Hungarians, Emperor elect of the Roman Empire by the Germans, and the natural Brother of the great Emperor, his Tributary King of Hungary. Solyman with cheerful countenance accepting and commending of the Presents, answered them two days after by Rufan the Baffa his Son in Law, that day was his resolute condition of Peace and Friendship; If King Ferdinand would forthwith restore all the Cities, Towns, and Castles, which were before belonging to King Lew, and for ever after abstain from Hungary, and whereas he had been so often provoked by him to War, and had therein bestowed great charges, and taken so much Travail, he could for that be content with an easy pain (which Lew he was for his great honour) to impose an easy Tribute upon Austria; upon which Conditions he was content to enter into League with them; but if so be that those Conditions seemed unto them too heavy, and that they would rather make choice of War than Peace, he would bring to pass by continual War, that such things as they had taken from the Kingdom of Hungary, should be required with the destruction of Austria. But the Embassadors, although they were much moved at the proud Demand of Tribute and power, Charles the Emperor and King Ferdinand were disdainfully abused; to keep the best course of their Negotiation, and to win some time in so hard estate of things; required a Truce until such time as King Ferdinand and the Emperor his Brother might be made acquainted with the matter. Which their request the Turk (perceiving their drift and purpose) would in no safe grant, for Winter was now fast coming on; it was lawful for the Embassadors all the time they were in the Turks Camp, to view every part thereof, Rufan Baffa conducting them from place to place; where above all things, they most wondered at the perpetual and dumb silence of so great a multitude, the Souldiers being for ready and attentive, that they were no otherwise commanded but by the becking of the Hand, or a Nod of their Commanders; they marvelled also at the exquisite order and sweetness of the Turks Camp, finding there in nothing disordered or noyful; so that it seemed not the Camp of such a rude and barbarous Nation, but rather of them which were the Authors of Martial Discipline. The Embassadors being rewarded, and so few away, Solyman commanded the old Governor of Belgrade to spoil the Borders of Austria all along Danubius; Cafan also General of the voluntary Horsemen, he sent into Austria for like purposes; who neither of them did any great harm, by reason of the suddain rising of the great Rivers, with the abundance of Rain then falling in Autumn. After that, Solyman appointed one Solyman an Hungarian (who taken Prisoner in his youth by the Turks, had from that time followed the Mahometan Superstition) Governor of Buda; who by the upright administration of Justice, and courteous using of the People, with Veretius the old Chancellor, should do what was possible to put the People in hope of long Peace and Tranquility. Which things done, after he had staid about twenty days at Buda, he determined to return again into Thracia, because the Rain of Autumn and the cold of Winter was now come in; and was also in doubt to be shut in with the rising of the great Rivers, wherewith the Country of Hungary is in every place so treated, and on every side, so compassed, that it is an hard matter to pass. By the way he left Lafca, King Ferdinand's Embassador, again at liberty, whom he had left in Prison at Belgrade; but he long enjoyed not that benefit; for shortly after returning into Polonia, he died of the Flux; which caused many to suppose, that he was poisoned by the Turks. A man for his Verue and Learning famous worthy of a longer life, whose death the King himself much lamented.

As Solyman was returning into Thracia, and was come to the River Dravus, it was told him, that Stephen Maylat, Vayvod of Transylvania, who took King Ferdinand's part, a professed Enemy of the Turks, was taken by the cunning of Peter of Moldavia, and Prince of Valachia; and that all the Country of Transylvania was well pacified, and yielded to his Obedience. Of which News Solyman was passing glad; for he exceedingly hated Maylat, a Martial man of a forward Nature, desirous of rule, and ready upon any occasion to revolt; forasmuch as he remembered Gritus his Legate, and the Turks by him slain; and knew also, that the Transylvanians, an invincible People, born to trouble, and more delighting in uncertain War than assured Peace; was by him stirred up; whom he withed rather by gentleness to appease, than by force of Arms and strong hand to subdue. But because we have oftentimes before made mention of this Maylat, of whose taking Solyman so much rejoiced, it shall not be amiss in few words to declare in what fineness he fell into the hands of this treacherous and bloody man, Peter of Moldavia.

This Moldavian by the commandment of Solyman (as is aforesaid) had joined his Forces with Achometes, Governor of Nicopolis, against Maylat; which being united, were in number fifty thousand Horsemen, beside Footmen; which after the manner of those Countreys, were not many, every man almost in the Country, he he never so poor, keeping a Horse to serve upon. Maylat befet with the multitude of his Enemies, and finding himself too weak to encounter them, he knew to be buffed in a greater War, forsook the Field, and fled again into the strong Town of Fagaras, as he had done the year before, when he was overcharged by King John Power; for there as in a most strong place both by nature and fortification, he had laid up his greatest Substance and Provision for the Wars, but especially the rich Spoil he had long before taken from Gritus. Achometes coming thither with his power, and perceiving the place was not to be battered or taken by force, but with much labour and long time, thought it best, as if with him he could overcome him by craft and deceit. Wherefore he sent a Messenger unto Maylat, to persuade him to yield himself unto Solyman, and to make choice rather to be called of him his Friend, than to be judged his Enemy; of whom he might well hope of all goodnes, which had given whole Kingdoms unto his Enemies; promising, that he would use the utmost of his Credit, which was not of the small, and labour for him as a Friend, and might feel the fruit of his Clemency and Bounty, and fill enjoy the Government of Transylvania, paying him some small yearly Tribute, as he had before requested; forasmuch as he could take no course better, being befet with so many Enemies, than to make his Peace upon reasonable Conditions, and that with as much speed as was possible; in which doing, besides that he should well provide for his own safety, he should also save both his Wealth and Honour; for Solyman was coming (as he said) with his victorious Army, who would with assured death revenge his vain hope of holding out the Siege, if he should upon a stubborn and obdurate mind then refuse to obey his command. Whereunto Maylat, who foresaw that it was better for him to make a certain Peace, than to endure an uncertain War, answered, That he could be content to conclude a Peace, so that it were not upon any bad conditions; and would not greatly refuse Solyman's command, which was wont to be both reasonable and just; wherefore upon sufficient Pledges he would come into the Camp, in preference to agree upon the Conditions of the Peace and demanded to have Achometes his Son a valiant young Gentleman delivered in Hoilage. Which thing Achometes denied, for that he had (as he said) before given him to Solyman, as the manner was, and therefore had over him no more power; but he promised for him, that was but one, to give four of his best Captains. Which offer Maylat (misdoubting no deceit) accepted, and with a great and gallant retinue attended upon, came to the Enemies Camp, where he was courteously and honourably received. But the Parly, as it could not be conveniently begun immediately after the first salutation, so could it by no means be then ended, but was deferred until the next day; to the intent, that the treacherous Moldavian might take his well acquainted and well known Gueft, whom he had against that time invited to a solemn Banquet. By that means, the next day about the midst of Dinner, Fortune favoured the intended Treachery, that Maylat (who was of so proud and choleric a nature, that he could not well brook the least indignity) was by occasion of some insolent Speech, of purpose mistof by the Moldavian Guefts, put into such a rage, that laying his hand upon his Sword, he in a free flung from the Table, at which time all the other Guefts starting up also, laid hands upon him, and took him, fluming, and in vain crying out, that he was shamefully betrayed. His Followers were all forthwith stripe of all their bravery by the noody Moldavians, and their Horses and Armor taken from them. Whilst Maylat was yet furiously exclaiming of this Treason, in came Achometes, who to seem guiltless of the matter, with deep diffimulation sharply reproved the false Moldavian, that he had in doing so foul a Fact shamefully violated the Laws of Hospitality, renowned of all Nations, falsified the Faith which he had given him for his safety, and betrayed the lives of such notable Captains as lay in hoilage for him. Whereunto the Moldavian (as if it had been in contempt) scornfully answered, that he had upon good cause taken Maylat Prisoner, and so would in safety keep him for Solyman, unto whom it only belonged to judge, whether he had justly or unjustly kept him.

Not long after, the strong Town of Fagaras was delivered, with the Hoftages, but whether by fear or corruption of Maylat's Lieutenant, is uncertain. So Valentinus Turacuss, and Maylat, two of the greatest Noblemen of Hungary, sufficient of themselves to have restored the Hungarian Kingdom (first sent in funder with civil Difcord, and afterward with the intent of the Turks) fell into the hands of the Enemy, nor were acquitted in Batel, but deceived by Treason. The Town being thus surrendered, almost all the Country of Transylvania, was by Solyman's consent delivered to the young King, unto whom all the People most willingly submitted themselves, and took the Oath of Obedience, remembering that his Father had almost for thirty years space with great Justice and quietness governed that Province; and with many Presents honoured the young King living in Lippa, with the Queen his Mother, and his two Tutors, the Bishop, and Vicbe.

At the same time, Charles the Emperor at the importunate suit of his Subjects of Spain, had prepared a great force both by Sea and Land for the conquering of Algiers, from whence the Turkish Pyrats did so infest all that Coast of the Country, from Gades to the Mountains Pyrene, that the Spaniards (all Trade of Merchandise being far apart) were glad to keep a continual Watch and Ward all along that Coast for defence of the Country. Wherefore although he well knew of Charles the coming of the Turks to Buda, and how hardly he was by the Langraves and others spoken of, for leaving his Brother so hardly befet, to go many against a sort of Pirats in Africk, yet persisting in his former determination, he departed out of Germany into Italy, where by the way he met Odavian Farnesius his Son in Law, Alphonfus Vassius his Lieutenant, by the Venetian Embassadors, near to Verona, and so brought to Milano, where he was with great Solemnity joyfully received of the Citizens, and under a Canopy of Gold brought unto the Palace; he himself going in a plain black Cloke, and a homely Cap in mourning vils; when as the Women and vulgar People, upon a curious simplicity, expected to have seen to great an Emperor in his Royal Robes, glittering with Gold and precious Stones, and the Imperial Crown upon his Head. His heavy Countenance answerable also to his Attire was much noted, as prefiging the woful overthrow which was the day before received at Buda, but not yet known in Italy. From Milain he departed to Genoa, where he was advertised by Letters from his Brother King Ferdinand, of the overthrow of the Germans, of the Victory of the Turks, and the coming of Solyman. Upon which news, Vasfin and Asurie, his two chief Commanders, the one at Land, the other at Sea, would have persuaded him to have deferred his intended expedition for Africa until the next Spring; and with such power as he had already raised in Italy, and brought with him out of Germany, to stay still in Italy, so to make shew unto the Turks as if he would have returned and holpen his Brother; and in the mean time to assure himself of his state in Italy against the French, who (as it was thought) would be ready to take all occasion of advantage, if any mishap should befall him, either by the force of the Enemy, or violence of Tempest. But he constant in his former resolution, answered them as they sat in Council, that they had perswaded him for great reasons to stay in Italy; but that he was for far greater to pass into Africa; for if he should then stay in Italy, it would be thought that he was for the safety of the Turks fled out of Germany, which disgrace could no otherwise be prevented, but by the present prosecuting of his former determination for Algiers, and satisfying the expectation of his Subjects of Spain; and so by Sea valiantly to prove their better Fortune, which had of late not so well favoured them at Land; in hope that Algiers might be won before the Seas should grow rough and dangerous with Winter Tempests; which if it should fall out according to his mind, he would not, as he said, greatly care what the French could do. Yet was it thought, that the dissembling Friendship betwixt the French King and him, would not long endure; and the rather, for that there was a new grudge risen betwixt them about the death of Antonius Renuz, who for certain years had been Ambassador for the French King at Constantinople, to Solyman, and was few months before sent back again by him into France to the King; but returning back again with new instructions from his Master, for the confirmation of a further League betwixt the Turkish Sultan and him, he was by certain Spaniards of the Emperors old Souldiers, who had knowledge of his coming, belated upon the River Padus as he was going down to Venice, so to have passed into Epirus, and slain, together with Caesar Trepatius, or as the common report went, first taken and tortured, to get from him the secrets of his negotiation, and afterwards slain. Which report so much touched Vasfin in Credit, that in purgation of himself, he offered the Combat to any man of like quality to himself, that durst charge him with the truth thereof. But many were of opinion, that he was well and worthily taken away, for undertaking so odious a Charge, as to stir up the Turks against the Christians, and to shew unto them such opportunities as might best serve their purpose, by discovering unto them the Emperors Designs, to the great hurt of the Christian Common-Weal. But were it well, or were it evil, as Paulus the third of that name then Bishop of Rome, meeting the Emperor at Luca as he came from Genoa, could not, or would determine, fire it served as no small occasion to set those two great Princes again at odds, whereby the wished Unity of the Christian state was fore shaken, and a way opened for the Turk. The Emperor at his coming to Luca, was honourably received by the Cardinals and Bishops, and lodged in the Court; the great Bishop was before placed in the Bishops Palace, whither the Emperor came thrice to talk with him, and the Bishop to him once. But the Bishop having nothing at all prevailed with the Emperor and the French Ambassador, for the appeasing of the troubles even then like to arise betwixt him and the French King; did what he might to persuade him to employ such Forces as he was about to pass over with into Africa, against the Turks in defence of his Brother Ferdinand, and of the Country of Austria, if Solyman should happily pursue his late obtained Victory at Buda. But he still resolute in that fatal determination of invading Africa, rejected that the Bishops request also. So the great Bishop having moved much, and prevailed little, in the greatest matters which most concerned the common good, taking his leave of the Emperor, returned by easy journeys to Rome.

The Emperor in the mean time with certain Bands of Italians, under the leading of Camillus Columna and Augustinus Spinola, of his thousand Germans, came from Luca to the Port Lane, and there imbarking his Souldiers in certain Merchants Ships provided for the purpose, and five and thirty Gallies, departed thence, commanding the Masters of the Ships to direct their Course to the Islands of Baleares; but after they had put to Sea, they were by force of Tempest suddenly arising, brought within sight of Corfica; where after they had been tossed too and fro two days in the rough seas, and put into the Court, the Wind something falling, they put into the Haven of Syracusa, now called Bonifacium. The dispersed Fleet once came together into the Port of Syracusa, and the rage of the Sea well appeased, he put to Sea again for the Islands Baleares, now the Emperor driven by tempest into Sicily. He met with a Tempest from the West, more terrible and dreadful than the first; wherein divers of the Gallies having lost their Masts and Sails, were glad with extreme labour and peril in striving against the rough Sea to get into the Harbor of the lesser Island, taking name of Barcinus Mago the famous Carthaginian, whose name it retaineth until this day. From hence the Emperor with all his Fleet passed over to the greater Island, being wonderful glad that Ferdinand Gonzaga his Viceroy in Sicilia was in good time come with the Sicilian Gallies and Ships of Italy, in number an hundred and fifty sail, wherein he had brought forth store of Batts and Victuals as might have sufficed for a long War. Mendoza was also expected to have come thither with his Fleet from Spain; but he by reason of contrary Winds being not able to hold that Course, altered his purpose according to the Tempest, and so happily cut over directly to Algiers. So the Emperor nothing misdoubting the careful diligence of Mendoza, and thinking that which was indeed already chanced, as the Emperor's Admiral hoisted sail, and in two days came before Algiers, and there in goodly order came to anchor before the City in the sight of the Enemy. Whilst the Fleet thus lay, two of the Pyrates which had been abroad at Sea, seeking for prize, returning to Algiers, not knowing any thing of the Fleet, fell into the Bay amongst them before they were aware; the bigger vessel Vicomtes Cicada stemmed with his Gally and sunk him, the other with wonderful celerity got into the Haven. In the mean time Mendoza with his Gallies had passed the Promontory of Apollo now called the Cape of Califfines, and in token of honour saluting the Emperor after the manner at Sea, with all his great Ordnance, gave him knowledge that the Spanish Fleet was not far behind. In this Fleet was above an hundred tall Ships of Biscay and the Low Countries, and of other smaller Vessels far greater number. In their Ships, besides the Footmen, were embarked a great number of brave Horsemen out of all parts of Spain; for many noble Gentlemen had voluntarily of their own Charge gallantly furnished themselves with brave Armor and courageous Horses, to serve their Prince and Country against the Infidels. Over these choice men commanded Ferdinand of Toledo, Duke of Alva, for his approved Valor then accounted a famous Captain. Their Ships going altogether with Sails, were not able to double the Cape as did Mendoza with his Gallies, for now it was a dead Calm; howbeit the Billows of the Sea went yet high, by reason of the rage of the late Tempest, and did so beat against the plain Shore, that it was not possible to land the Souldiers; but that they must needs be wafted up to the middle; which thing the Emperor thought it not good to let them unto, and so to oppose them Sea-sick and through wear against the sudden and desperate Assaults of their fierce Enemies. He also feared for the coming of the Spanish Ships for two causes; first that he might with his united Power more strongly assault the City, and terrify the Enemy; then, to communicate the whole glory of the action with the Spaniards, at whole request and forwardness and greatness. Charge he had undertaken, which late delayance for two days, although it was grounded upon good reason, did not only disturb an assured Victory, but to the notable hurt of the whole Army, opened a way to all the calamities which afterward ensued.

In the mean while the Emperor sent a convenient Messenger to Alanagas, otherwise and truly called Alfan-Aga, or Alfan the Eunuch; who with a little Flag of Truce in his hand making sign of a Parly, and answered by the Moor with like, as his manner is, went on there, and was of them courteously received and brought to Alfan. This Alfan was an Eunuch, born in Sardinia, brought up from his youth in the Mahometan Superstition by Barbarossa, a man both politic and valiant, and by him left for the keeping of his Kingdom of Algiers in his absence with Solyman. This Messenger brought into his presence, required him forthwith to deliver the City first furnished by Force and Treachery by Hlorucine, and afterwards to the destruction of mankind, fortified by Harisudun Barbarossa his Brother to Charles the mighty Emperor, come in person himself to be revenged on those horrible Pyrats; which if he would do, it should be lawful for the Turks to depart whether they would, and for the natural Moors to abide still with their Goods and Religion wholly referred unto them untouched, as in former time; and for himself, he should receive of the Emperor great Rewards both in time of Peace and War, so that he would remember himself, that he was born in Sardinia, and was once a Christian; and accept of the fairest occasion which could possibly be offered for him to return again to the worshipping of the true God, and to enjoy the favour and bounty of the most mighty Emperor, and wishal to revenge himself of the cruel Tyrant Barbarossa, for the unnatural Villany done unto his person. But if he would needs dally on the time, and make proof of the strength of his great preparations, he should undoubtedly, with the rest of his Followers, receive the full reward of his obliquity, which they had to the example of others, received at Tunes. Whereunto the ungracious Eunuch answered, That he thought him altogether mad, that would follow his Enemies Council; and with a grinning countenance ask him, Upon what hope the Emperor trusted to be able to win the City the Messenger pointed with his finger directly to the Fleet, told him, That which you see, with his great Artillery, and Valour of his Souldiers, both Horse and Foot; whereas the Eunuch scornfully laughing, replied, And we with like Force and Valour will defend this City, and make this place, already famous for your overthrows here twice, now the third time, of all others most famous by the Emperors discomfiture. It is reported, That there was in Algiers an old Witch, famous for her Preditions, who had (as it was said) foretold the Shipwracks and misery of Dido Verra, and Hugo Moncada, to them of Algiers, and also prefixed a time when as the Christian Emperor adventuring to besiege that City, should there receive great loss both by Sea and Land. The fame of which blind Prophecy serving fully to confirm the hope of the Turkish Souldiers of the vulgar multitude, Alfan for bold and augmented (although he himself being a crafty wile fellow, believed no such vanity) that he did therewith not only encourage his own Souldiers, but also struck a terror into the minds of the weaker sort of his Enemies, seeing themselves cast upon so dangerous a Coast upon the approach of Winter. There was in Garrison in the City but eight hundred Turks, and most of them Horsemen, but such as whose Valour and hardiness far exceeded their number. For Alfan had lost many of his best men, some in fight against Mendoza, and otherwise at Sea, slain or taken by Auria in Cosica, and in other places by the Rhodian, Neapolitan, and Sicilian Gallies; but many more were by his leave gone to aid the Moors against the Portugals; the other multitude did scarce make up the number of five thousand; which were partly natural Moors born in that Country, and partly such as were born in Granada; to whom were joined many fugitives out of the Islands of Majorca and Minorca, who in former time having entered into Rebellion, and fearing condign punishment, were led to Algiers, and there revolted to the Mahometan Superstition. But the Captains of the wild Numidians made up a great number both of Horse and Foot, which lying flagrant without the City in the open Fields, should night and day vex and molest the Christians. This brutish People, naturally Enemies unto the Christians, had always with rewards and hope of a rich Spoil, allured out of the Countries thereabout to aid him; neither was it lawful for any man to carry his Wife or Children out of the City, into places of more safety farther off, or to shew any small token of fear, pain of death being by the imperious Eunuch propoed to whosoever should but look heavily for fear of danger, or speak a word favouring of Cowards. The Emperor by Auria making choice of a most convenient place for landing his men, laid his Gallies so close unto his tall Ships, that his armed Souldiers might with ease come out of the high built Ships into them, and so out of them into the long Boats, to be forthwith set on shore. And such was the speedy diligence of them that had the charge of that matter, and the plenty of Boats Boats still ready to receive the Souldiers as fast as they could come out of the Gallies, that the Footmen were in a very short time all landed. The Emperor having a little rested and refreihed his Souldiers, divided his Army into three equal Battels, which was in number about twenty thousand. Footmen, better Horfemen and others, who of their own voluntary Will then followed the Emperors Fortune. Unto every Battel he appointed three Field-Pieces, to terrifie the Numidian Horfemen, which were still picking up and down about them, ready to charge if they could take them at anyadvantage And so feting forward a few Furlongs, encamped in a ftrong and convenient place, near unto the City, between two deep Ditches, viz. the Water falling from the Mountains, was naturally worn fo deep, that neither Horfeman nor Footman could well pass over, but by Bridge; and falf by upon the left hand was an Hill, from the top whereof it seemed the City might with great Ordnance well be battered.

The description of Algiers.

The City of Algiers, fometimes the Royal Seat of the great King Juba, called of the Romans Tulca Cefarea, is in form of a Triangle, fquare falf by the Sea towards the North, having a Haven, but neither great, neither fafe from the North-Wind. The Houses farther off from the Sea, ftand in feemly order upon the rifing of a fteep Hill, as it were upon degrees; in fuch fort, that the Windows of one row ftill overlooks the tops of the next beneath it, into the Sea, moft beautiful to behold. The Emperor having divided his Camp into three parts, every Nation by themselves, lying on the East fide of the Town, was in great hope to win it; and the rather, for that whilst he assaulted it on that fide, his Ships and Gallies from the North fide, might in time of the Assault with their great Ordnance beat the Enemy all along the Wall; which still rifing higher and higher according to the rifing of the fteep Hill, could not conveniently be defended with one Bulwark, as we fee it may in plain ground. Neareft unto the rifing of the Hills, lay the Spaniards; in the midft, the Germans with the Emperor; and in the Plain neareft to the Sea, the Italians. In the mean time whilst the great Ordnance was landing, and the Horfes unshipping, the Numidians with a hideous outcry fhewed themselves upon the tops of the Mountains above the Spaniards, and from thence affely gaufed them with their Darts and Shot; for they nimblely running too and fro in the known parts of the rough Mountains, would fuddainly and fiercely affail them, but after the manner of their Nation skirmishing afar off, rather than near at hand. In which manner of light skirmishes, all the day was spent until night, with fmall danger but much trouble to the Spaniards. And when night was come, these wild People, one Company still fucceeding another in the place they had before taken, never left fhooting; for wheresoever they faw any Fire in the Spanish Camp, thither came Arrows, Darts, and Stones flying as thick as Gall; for remedy whereof, the Spaniards were glad to put out their Fires, and with silence to expect the day, that they might come nearer unto them. Wherefore as soon as the Sun was up, the Spaniards by the perfuafion of Alvares Sandes, Master of the Camp, valiantly climbing up the high Mountains, repulsed and put to flight the Numidians, and took the top of the Hills, and there lay as it were encamped in the poor Shepherds Cottages. But the fame day fuch a multitude of the wild People was flockt about them, that they were compaffed in round, and glad to fight on every fide in a Ring. Yet this hercefnets of this barbarous

People, was by the Valour of the Sicilian Companies quickly repuffed, whose Pikemen glittering in their bright Armor, made fmall account of the Numidians Arrows and Darts, but orderly stepping forwards with their Pikes, and the Harquebussers clofe by their fides, easily repuffed their naked Enemies. The Numidian Footmen are for moft part Youths half naked, with long hair not unlike the Irish, using no other Weapons but Darts; they fight mingled with their Horfemen, trusting the one to the other, and are of a wonderful fwiftness, and agility of Body. Their Horfemen use long Spears armed at both ends, which they with a marvelous dexterity use, to the endangering of their Enemy purfuing them; they use also long and light Targets made of Leather, wherewith they fo cunningly defend themselves and their Horfes, both in their Charge and Retreat, that for a fmall triffe, in respect of the danger, they will give a man leave to cast feven Darts at one of them, which they will all fo furely avoid either with the Spear or receive them without harm into their Target. In the mean time, whilst this wild People thus skirmished all the day, at night a fuddain misfortune overthrew all the Emperors hope; for as he stood beholding the unshipping of his great Ordnance, his Horfes, Victual and other necessaries of the Army, a storm of Wind and Rain began about fix a clock in the Afternoon, holding on all the night without intermission, with fuch rage, as if Heaven and Earth should have gone together; wherewith the whole Army at Land was wonderfully troubled, and a great part of the Fleet at Sea by force of Tempest driven aground, perished. That night three Companies of the Italians, by the appointment of their General, lay without the Trenches against the fuddain Assault of fo uncertain an Enemy, who when they had all the night endured the relentless Rain and excessive cold, were fo overcome with the extremity of the Weather, that neither were their minds able to relieve their weak bodies, neither their feeble bodies their daunted minds; for they could neither conveniently ftand nor lie down, all the ground being fo miry, that at every step they funk up to the calf of the Leg. Upon these ftarved Companies, the Turkish Horfemen and Moors Footmen, who diligently observed the Watch the Christians, perceiving their diftreffes, fuddainly fell into in the dawning of the day; and fo fiercely charged them, their Match and Powder being now fo wet that they could not use their Pieces, that they all fled, except a few Pikemen, who made a ftand, and were all quickly flain by the Turks; who fo desperately purfued the rest in chafe, that they followed them over the Trench into the Camp. This Alarm being heard, Gemilur Columa, the Italian General came prefently thither, being fent by the Emperor, who with certain Companies iffued out over the Bridge against the Enemy; who now in fnew difcouraged with the coming out of this new Supply, did indeed, or at leaftwise made as if they did diforderly retire for fear. At which time Ferdinand Gomzaga, Victory of Sicily, a man of greateft account in the Army next unto the Emperor, coming in also, and engaging them as valiant men, to recompence their shameful flight with a fresh Charge, by driving the Enemy home to his own door; which thing Columa faid could not be done without great perill, but Gomzaga being a man of a noble Courage, defired to have the difgrace which al the Italians had received, falfed some way, al though it were with need fo great danger; thinking also that it might happily fall out, that the Enemy being put to flight, and haftily purfued, they might together with them enter the City, without danger of the Artillery. So without farther delay, the rest of the Italian Companies were led forth of their Trenches with great cheerfulness by Augustine Spinola, who fo valiantly charged the Enemies, that they put them to flight, and purfued them fo hard, that they came with them to the very Gates of the City; where many thut out for fear of letting in the Italians together with them, efclaped by known ways, fome to another Gate, and fome into the Mountains. But then these barbarous People, with Darts and Shot from the Walls, began to overwhelm the Italians which were unadvicably come within the danger, and with rude outcries to terrifie them, and the which before were fled without the Walls, returned again to fight. They also which had thut the Gate, fell out again, and hardly charged the Italians, who already gaufed with thut from the Walls, and rent in funder with the great Ordnance, fled most diforderly; for why, they were but raw Souldiers taken up in half, little or nothing acquainted with the Wars. As which time Alfonso alfo falling out, who was easily known by his Countenance and rich Attire, purfued the chafe with his Troops of Turks and Moors Footmen. Only certain Knights of the Rhodes fought valiantly, and retired orderly; and Spinola with fome other Gentlemen making a ftand at a little wooden Bridge, fomewhat falfed the Enemy and faved the lives of many. So the Italians which first charged most valiantly, being in the flight become hindmost, the Enemy striking them down as they fled, covered the Fields with their dead Bodies by the fpace of half a mile, efpecially they which fled towards the Sea; for there they were circumvented and flain by the mercilefs Numidians, who beholding the Shipwrack, were come down to the Sea fide for prey. But the foremost Companies of the Italians which first fled into the Camp, fled in fo much haft and fo great fear, that none of the Leaders in fo great and fuddain a perplexity, remembered either the common fafety, or performed the duty of an advicd Captain; fo that all seemed at once loft both by Sea and Land. Only the Emperor, armed with an invincible courage against all the chances of fortune, and notto be difmaid with any mishap, was both unto himself and others that day the greateft Captain; for when all was almost loft, he in good time fluted the matter by coming on with the Squadron of Germans, whereof he fent before three Ensigns to ftay the flight, and with them as a fire and fresh supply to guard his Camp beyond the Bridge which was over the Ditch, ferving his Army for a Trench as we have before fald. But fuch a fear had poffeffed the minds of the flying Italians, and fuch was the fierce purfuit of the Enemy, that those Germans (not before aware of their backs) as if they had been afraid of the Turks white Caps, or not able to abide their fight, or to hold up weapon against them; by and by turned their backs, and shamefully fled for Company with the Italians. Then the Emperor galloping forth with his Horfe, and his Sword in his Hand drawn, reproving them of Cowards that fled, fort forwarding with the German Squadron; and with a shout and many Country fpeaks to them, that a few words in their own Language; When will you (fellow Souldiers) shew your Faces to your proud Enemies, if now when you should fight for the honour of the Christian Name, for the glory of the German Nation, for the falfeguard of your own Lives, in the presence of your Emperor, you fear a few difordered and naked Barbarians? Immediately when he had thus fald, the Germans touched with shame, and diffidain that it should be thought they needed any exhortation to perform the parts of valiant Souldiers, iffued out against the Enemy; who moved with their coming, and seeing the Italian certain valiant, and expert Captains, stood fild a while and began to retire; whether it were because they feared the great Artillery and assault of the Germans, or that they thought they had done enough for that fully; when as for the full accomplishment of the Victory they faw the Christian Fleet overcome with a most horrible Tempest, miserably to periff before their Faces; and many of their Men, efpecially the Moors, hafted to the Sea fide in hope of a more certain Prey, whereas no Enemy was to be feared. For the blustering Winds blowing from divers quarters, as if they had confpired to raise a most horrible Tempest, had made fuch a rough Sea, and the huge Billows went fo high, that the Ships by the violence of the Weather, and rage of the Sea, put from their Anchors, fell foul one of another, and went fo loft; or else driven upon the Main, were there beaten in pieces in the fight of the Army; fo that all the Sea Coast Westward from Algiers to Cercado, lay full of dead Men and Horfes, and the Ribs of broken Ships. The Numidians beholding this miserable Wreck, came down by great Companies from the Mountains, and without mercy flew all that came alive to Land. In the fpace of a few hours was loft about a hundred and forty Ships, and all the fmall Boats and Carvels, which were in number many. Some of the Gallies, which they had from midnight to the next day at noon, by the painful labour of the Mariners, and skillfulness of the Masters, rid it out; being no longer able to endure the rage of the Tempest, and fearing to be eaten up with the Sea, with Sails and Oars ran aground; but the Souldiers and Mariners swimming to Land in hope to fave their Lives, and thinking that the greateft danger had been now past, were by the Numidian Horfemen which ran up and down the Sea fide, flain. There might a Man have feen Free-men of all forts, with Tears commending their lives and liberty to their own Gallies, flaves, that by the speech and entreaty of them, which by the fuddain change of fortune had but even now shaken off their Irons, and with merry Hearts fwam out to their liberty, they might be freed from the cruelty of the fierce Numidians. It was a most grievous and awful fight for divers hard extremities, when as every Man according to the difpofition of his mind and skill in Swimming, ftanding doubtful in most affured death, that to receive or refuse, was by fatal Destiny drawn to his end, and either drowned in the Sea, or thrust through with the Enemies Lance; yet most made voice to abide the danger of the Sea, and to expect the event of the Tempest, rather than to haften their end by the Enemies merciless Hand. By that means it came to pass, that that barbarous Cruelty of the Enemy (as being most feared of the Mariners and Souldiers) faved many Gallies; which by the appointment of the fcareful Mariners and Passengers should otherwise have been run on ground. But after that, a notable Gallie wherein Jamesinus Auria was, was feen to come near unto the Shore, and to be driven upon the sands by force of the Weather and the beating of other Gallies. The Emperor not enduring to fee fo valiant a young Gentleman, Captain of many Gallies, flain without help by the Moors in the fight of Auria his Uncle; fent by and by one of his Captains called

Many Gallies were lost by the waves of the Sea.

Antonius

Antimus of Aragon, with three Bands of Italians to the Sea side; by whose coming the Moors were put to flight, and he with the rest in the Galley saved; but so, that the saving of him was the loss of divers other Gallies. For many delivered of the fear of the Numidians, and trusting to the rescue of the Souldiers came down to the Sea side, desiring to save themselves from the rage of the Sea, ran their Gallies on ground; and had not some bold Captains (grieved to see so great a loss) ran up and down the Banks with their drawn Swords in their Hands, and by threatening death unto the Galley-flaves and Mariners, staid their rowing, most part of the Gallies had by the example of the others perished. Aurica, not so angry at himself as at the Emperor (who, contrary to the observation of skillful Sea-men, could not be dissuaded from taking in hand that great expedition in so suspicious a time of the year) with an invincible courage strove against the violence of the Tempest, and rage of the Sea; inso much, that being requested by some of his Friends to save himself, whatsoever became of the Galley; he was so angry thereat, that he commanded them to be bestowed under Hatches. Four Gallies also of Verginius Ursinus Earl of Aguilaria, and as many of the Rhodians, after his example rid it out, the reputation of their honour exceeding the fear of death. Certain Gallies also of Scilia, Naples, and Spain, happily endured all the rage of the Tempest; yet was there fifteen great Gallies cast away; with the loss whereof, besides the loss of so many Ships, the Tempest still enduring, so great sorrow and dejection in the whole expedition of the Wreck of all, possessed the whole Army, that not only the young Souldiers regarding only their own lives, but even the most valiant Captains careful of the common Estate, were utterly discouraged; for never was Army in any memory overwhelmed with a greater concourse of calamities, when as all their Victuals being lost in three days, nothing was left to relieve them withal, and they wanted Tents wherein to shroud and rest the Souldiers spent with labour, hunger, cold, and wounds, in such perpetual Rain and so dirty a Country. In which so great miseries a wonderful care, heavier than the former fear, exceedingly troubled the minds of all Men, to think upon that horrid Wreck; when as having lost so many Ships, and they poor Men landed in Africa, were in doubt however to return again into their native Countries. Yet the notable courage of the Emperor still kept the distressed Men in hope, which never altogether forsaketh wretched Men in the midst of their calamities; for he with a courageous heart and cheerful countenance performed all the parts of a provident and courteous General. For when he had again made sure his Camp against the assaults of the Barbarians, he commanded the wearied Captains, especially the Duke of Alva (wonderfully wearied in the last skirmish, and done weep) to spare themselves and take their rest; he comforted the wounded Men, and caused them to be carried and cherished in the Tents which by chance yet stood (for the tempestuous Wind had almost overthrown them all), and so not sparing himself for any pains, being in his Armor and through wet, won the hearts of all his Souldiers the more. In this conflict he lost about three thousand Men, among whom was five of his forward Captains, and three Knights of the Rhodes; but many more were hurt. The greatest loss was thought to be in loss of the Ships and of the Mariners, which was also increased by the loss of a wonderful deal of great

The cheerfulness of the Emperor comforted the whole distressed Army.

Ordnance, reckoned so much the greater, for that it would come into the hands of the Moors, to the common harm of the Christians, so soon as the Sea would give them leave to dive for it. Shortly after, Aurica (as he went to foresee the Tempest, a wonderful observer of the Sea, of the Heavens, and of the Clouds) misstruck that place, departed with the remainder of the Fleet to the Cape called Metaphum, because it was a place of safer riding for his Gallies, and better for the taking in of the Souldiers; advising the Emperor to march thither by Land. Which his Counsel the Emperor liking well, to relieve the hunger of his Souldiers, commanded first all the draught-Horses which were first unshipped for the drawing of the great Ordnance, and after them the Horses for service, to be killed, and divided for Meat among the Souldiers. As for Wood to make Fire of, they had plenty of the Planks and Ribs of the broken Ships, Fortune as it were with that one poor benefit recompensing so many calamities. The next day the Emperor departed from Algiers, with his Army divided into three Batails, the sick and wounded Men being received into the middle; and when he had marched seven miles (the Enemies Horsemen still hovering about him) he came to a heady Brook which the Moors call Alcaraz; which was grown so high with the abundant Rain and the check of the Wind and of the Sea, that being but a shallow thing before, it was not now to be passed over by a good Horseman. Wherefore the Emperor of necessity there encamped. The next day, that lying with his Army in form of a Triangle, two sides of his Army was defended with the Sea and the Brook, and the other with a strong Guard of armed Men, for he thought it not good to depart from the Sea, a sure defence for his Army on the left hand, to seek a Ford farther off. Many adventuring to swim over, were by the violence of the Stream carried away and drowned. Wherefore the Emperor caused a Bridge to be made over it, of the Masts and Sail-yards of the broken Ships, which were by chance there taken up, and so passed over the Italians and Germans. The Spaniards marching higher up the Brook, found a Ford whereby they passed over. After which time the Turks pursued them no further, being called back again by Alfon their Governour; as for the Moors and Numidians which still followed at hand always ready to skirmish, they were easily repulsed by the Habiqueries and Field-pieces appointed to every Nation; but upon such sick and wounded Men as were not able to keep way with the Army, they exercised all manner of cruelty; for there was none which in that small hope, possessed with fear of their own safety, was greatly moved with the compassion of their Fellows misery. The next day passing over another little River, which the Souldiers waded over up to their Breasts, they came in three days march to the Rode where the Fleet lay, and encamped in the Ruins of the old City Tippa, near unto the Sea-side, which served them in stead of a Fortress against the Barbarians. The Sea was now calm, the Wind laid, and the Weather so faint that all Men thought the Souldiers might now well be embarked and transported into Europe; wherefore the Emperor to the great joy of the whole Army, commanded every Man to make himself ready to go aboard, in such sort, that first the Italians, next the Germans, and last of all the Spaniards should be embarked; but so many Ships and Gallies, as is before said, being lost by Shipwreck, it was thought that those which were left were not able to receive the whole Army, although it was crowded together together as close as were possible. Wherefore the Emperor commanded the Masters and owners of the Ships to call all the Horses overboard into the Sea, reputing it an unmerciful part, to prefer the safeguard of those Horses (although they were of great worth) before the life of the best common Souldier or Horse-boy in his Camp. Which thing much grieved the minds of the Noblemen and Owners of those goodly Beasts, not only for that they were (not without extrem necessity) for the present deprived of such an inestimable Treasure, but should for ever, as they said, lose the most notable race of Horses in Spain; there with grief and rain compassion, have been goodly Horses of service, bearing up their proud Heads, swimming all about the Sea unto the Ships nearest unto them for safeguard, as if it had been to the Shore, and in the end wearied with long swimming to be there drowned. But scarce half the Souldiers were yet embarked, when the East and North-East Wind, and friskways after divers contrary Winds almost as great as the first, rose; whereupon the Ships which had already taken in the Souldiers, not expecting any command, for fear of being driven upon the Rocks, directed their Course according as the Wind carried them, with full Sails along the Coast; They were quickly out of sight, and dispersed with the Tempest, some into one Country, some into another, carrying the Fame of that Shipwreck, and the report that all was lost, into the Islands of the Mediterranean and Ports of Italy. The force of this Tempest was so great, and the Billows went so high, that some of the Ships were in the fight of their Fellows swallowed up of the Sea. But amongst the rest two Spanish Ships full of Souldiers were by wonderful mishap by contrary Winds driven again to Algiers, and there set fast upon that fatal Shore, where the Numidian Horsemen with a multitude of the Moors following them, came running down to the Sea side to kill them as they fled, and come to Shore; for the barbarous People thirsting after Christian Blood, would not receive them to mercy, although they were ready to yield themselves, and covenanted nothing but the safeguard of their lives. At which their cruelty the Spaniards disdaining, with their Weapons in their hands got to Shore, and standing close together as desperate Men, withstood them who had with their multitude quickly compassed them in round; yet in despite of what that barbarous multitude (without regard of humanity or Law of Arms) could do, they made way through the midst of them, from the place where they were cast on Shore, unto the very Gates of the City. But seeing the Turks fall out, they called unto them, offering to yield themselves Prisoners to Alfon without further resistance, if they would assure them their lives, which they were in great hope of, for that he was born of Christian Parents in Sardinia, and was attended upon with many Renegade Spaniards. So Alfon coming forth of the City, gave them his Faith for their safety, and beating away the Moors and Numidians, courteously saved them all, wisely making great account of so great a gain as would rebound unto him by so many Prisoners, joynted with no small commendation of his clemency, saving them. Of the Germans the third part never returned home, but were either lost with Shipwreck, or else dead of the Sickness ensuing so great miseries. The Emperor perfwaded (or rather overruled) by Aurica, to avoid the violence of the Tempest, sailed along the Coast of Africa Eastward to Buzia; the Cattle whereof was kept with a small Garrison of Spaniards; where the Emperor landing, found some fresh Victual, though not much, yet such as did both him and the other Noblemen no small pleasure. Whilst the Emperor lay at Buzia expecting fairer Weather, a great Ship of Genoa laden with Victual chanced to come into the Bay, to the great joying of the hungry Souldiers; but such was the violence of the Tempest, that her Anchors came home, and the driven upon the Flats was cast away; yet so, as that part of the Victual driven to Shore, and half spoiled with the Salt-water, well relieved the encamping want. In the mean time the Emperor when he had long looked for the arriving of the Tempest, and was now out of hope of any new supply of Victual, sent away Gonzalez, a Spanish Arabian and Rhodian Gallies; for the Wind blowing at North was now come to North-west, and put them in hope to adventure again to Sea, rather than to stay there longer. So although with a troublesome yet a prosperous Course, they came in short time to the Port of Utica, now called Farinia; where Mulefles King of Tunes bountifully relieved Gonzalez and his Fleet with all kind of Victual and other necessities. From whence they afterward departed, and landed all in safety at Drepanum in Sicilia. The blustering Winds were now at length weary of blowing, and the raging Sea became calm, so that the skillful Sea-men for fear of new dangers, and weary of those that were past, thought it best to adventure again at Sea. Almost every hour they were reasoning in Council, what Course they were for most safely best to take; when some were of opinion, that it was best to bear for Sardinia or Sicilia; and others would have had them to have kept along the Coast of Africa, and to directly for Sicilia. But the Wind coming fair at East, the Emperor directed his Course to the Islands Baleares, and from thence at length arrived at the Port of Valencia in Spain, greatly commended even his Enemies, for the wonderful courage and constancy in passing through so many extremities, in such sort as if he had triumphed over the malice of fortune.

About this time the dissembled friendship betwixt Charles the Emperor and France the French King brake out into open hatred. The King first thinking himself deluded by the Emperor, who had long time fed him with the vain hope of the restitution of the Duchy of Milan, when as he meant nothing of it; and of late abused by the death of Rinco his Embassador, slain by the Spaniards in passing down the River Pado, as is before declared. In revenge whereof he raised a great power in France, and at such time as most Men thought he would have invaded Italy, sent Charles his Son with the one part of his Forces into the Low-Countries, which were then governed by Mary Queen of Hungary the Emperors Sister; and Henry his other Son with the other part of his Forces to invade Spain, both young Princes, of great hope. And not so contented, but desirous by all means to trouble and molest the Emperor, as he did in the Low-Countries by setting on the Duke of Cleves; so by Antoni Polonus his Embassador, a Man of great credit, who earnestly solicited Solyman the Great Turk; with whom he was then in League, to spoil the Borders of Spain with his Gallies, at the same time that Henry his Son was besieging Perpenna in Spain. For which practice he was of most Men discommended, as too much favouring his own grief, and especially by such as affected the Emperor. But how this matter (which drew upon the French King no small envy) was carried in the Turks Court, shall not 1543. The French King thought the most to trouble the Emperor, solicited the Spaniards to invade his countries.

(as I hope) be unto this History impertinent to declare.

After the death of Rinco slain by the Spaniards, France the French King sent Antoniou Polimus a Man of great dexterity, his Embassador to Solyman's, who passing by many by-ways to Venice, and lyoia over the Gulf to Sibimicon, crossing over lyoia, met with Solyman in Adria, as he was coming from Buda; and there first offered unto him the Present sent from the King his Master (for with empty hands no Man might presume to come to those barbarous Kings of the East) which Present was a Cupboard of Plate curiously wrought, in weight six hundred Pounds; and five hundred rich Garments of all sorts of Silk and Skarletto be bestowed upon the Bassaes and other great Courtiers. Solyman after he had read the French Kings Letters, and heard what he had further to say, seemed to be greatly moved with the death of Rinco, and promised Polimus not to be wanting unto the French King, by Sea or Land to give him aid in his just Wars against Charles his Enemy, for breaking of the League, but inasmuch as nothing could be well determined of such matters in his Journey of so great haste, he told him, that as soon as he was come to Constantinople, he should then have answer by his Bassaes of all his demands. The Embassadors above all things desired that he would send Haridienus Barbaruffa with his Fleet against the next Summer unto Prevence, there to be received into the French Harbors, and to be employed against the Emperor as occasion should require; and further, That he would request the Venetians, with whom he was able to do much, to join in League with the King his Master against Charles the Emperor, whose power began now to be dreadful to their Estate. Polimus was not slack in his business, but all the way as he went fought to win the favour of the Bassaes, still giving them one Present or other, and filling their minds with the hope of greater. But when they were come to Constantinople, in the latter end of December, Solyman promising what he had before said, advised Polimus to return to France with his Letters, and to bring him certain word back again from the King, of the determinate time and full resolution of taking those Wars in hand; and that he would in the mean time send Junubeus his Embassador to Venice, who had been there divers times before, and would provide to have such a Fleet in readiness as he desired. Polimus excusing glad of that answer, with great speed returned back again to the King, bringing with him as Presents unto Solyman two goodly Turkish Horfes and a Sword richly set with Stones of great price. The French King having by his Embassador received Solyman's Letters and Presents, and three days together discoursed with him at large of the manner of his proceeding in the Turks Court, in short time after sent him back again to Solyman with full instructions both of the time and prices, and other circumstances of the intended War. Polimus coming to Venice, found not Junubeus there, as he had well hoped; yet to lose no time in expecting his coming, he with Pollicerus Embassador Lieger for the French King, and other of the French Faction, laboured the Senators in the behalf of the King. For it was thought like enough, that the Venetians left mauling all their Councils by their profane counsel, and consent to that League, especially being requested thereto by Solyman, and put in hope to have the Port-Town Maranu delivered unto them in reward thereof; which otherwise the French, in whose possession it was, threatened to deliver to the Turks, and to make them their evil Neighbours, rather than to have it taken from them by the Germans. Wherefore Polimus having audience given him in the Senate, notably pleaded the French Kings cause, grievously lamented the death of the Embassador slain by the Spaniards, and bitterly inveighed against the ambition of the Emperor, who as he said aspired to the whole Mistrarchy of Italy, not by true verue and valour, but by meer craft and deceit, encroaching till upon the liberties of the Free-States, and by little and little imposing upon them the Yoke of Bondage; In confirmation whereof he produced many examples, to them well known, requesting them to joyn their Forces with the Kings; in which doing, they should assure themselves of such reward as the undoubted Victory, as they could not desire greater. Whereas if they should refuse to do so, and would rather sit still and look on as neutrals, they should undoubtedly, Fortune having decided the quarrel, grievously offend both, and might worthily expect of the vanquished, hatred; and of the conqueror, injury. Besides that, in taking up of Arms they should highly gratify Solyman, who provoked with late injuries, had determined with a puissant Army to invade Hungary, and at the same time to fend Barbaruffa with a great Fleet against the Spaniards their common Enemies; for the imparting of which his designs he would shortly send unto them Junubeus his Embassador: As for the event of the War they need not to doubt, when as they of themselves were strong enough without to thrust the Emperor out of the Duchy of Milan, being generally hated of the people, feeding his Souldiers with the spoil of the Country, and on every side befet both by Sea and Land by two of the greatest Monarchs of the World. Whereunto the Senate delayed the time for certain days, that Junubeus might in the mean time come further, gravely answered, That the amity they held with King France, ought to be unto them an ornament, but no burden; the like also they held with the Emperor, whom they would in no case seem to cast off, although they had been by him overwrought; Wherefore the Senators and all the Citizens in general were of opinion, to preserve their Peace, as they which in the hard times of War had endured great extremities, which would hardly be recovered with long Peace: But if they did once see the Ensigns displayed, and the Wars begun, they would then take further advice. Whether it were good for them to thrust themselves into those Wars or not, when as they were in League and Friendship with three of the greatest Princes of the World. In the mean time Junubeus arrived at Venice, and was there honourably received. He requested, That the League before made at Constantinople by Baderius their Embassador, might by the authority of the Senate be confirmed; and so commanded the French Kings cause to the Senate, that he requested no more, but that unto that amity which they already held with the French, they would joyn further courties, the rather for that Solyman had accounted him for his Brother, and had undertaken to aid him against Charles King of Spain; but as to joyn in League with him, or in his quarrel to take up Arms, he requested nothing. Which was quite beside the expectation of Polimus and Pollicerus, who by urging of the matter, and by telling of all, had thought easily to have persuaded the Senate to have granted what they requested, and therefore thought the Turk (who had so coldly spoken in the cause) to be some way corrupted. But as it afterward appeared, there was such equity and modesty in Solyman's Letters (who was otherwise of a proud and insolent nature) that he would not as then exact any thing of them, which would not stand with the good of their Estate. Wherefore Polimus having in vain stated certain days at Venice, was in one of their publick Gallies transported to Ragufium, and from thence traried by Land to Constantinople, where he found all things more difficult than ever he dreamed of. For the great Bassaes said, There could no Fleet be late out that year, by reason that he was come too late to sue for such a matter, the Spring of the Year being now past, of all other times most fit for to take in hand so long a Voyage. So that Polimus was above measure vexed with care and grief, that he had so ill sped, and was come too out of season both at Venice and Constantinople. Dixius also, one of the Masters of the Rhodian Gallies, was come to Constantinople, to carry newsto France of the coming of the Turks Fleet; who told Polimus, That the Kings Sons were with strong power far entered into the Low-Countries, and had already invaded Spain, expecting nothing more than the coming of the Turks Gallies. Wherefore Polimus (as it easily chanced to Man deceived by trust reposed in any other Mens promises, and bewailing the evil success of their vain travel) wonderfully tormented himself, cursed the froward and uncourtly manners of the Bassaes, called upon the Faith of Solyman; and besought the great Bassaes one by one, that they would not contrary to their promise forsake the King, who upon the hope of the coming of the Turks Fleet, had now invaded both the Low-Countries and the Kingdom of Spain; forasmuch as by that delay, which was unto them neither honourable nor profitable, was (as he said) betrayed the Majesty of his King, and a moist assured Victory now as good as gotten, quite marred. In which his obsecrations, he was so importunate and tedious, that he became unto those proud Bassaes rather loathsome than gracious; insomuch that to end his rage, they thought it best sharply to take him up, and for that time to shake him off. And therefore sending for him and the other French Gentlemen which followed him, to the Court, the great Bassaes then sitting in Council, and Barbaruffa with them for the Honour of his place; as soon as they were come into the Council-Chamber, Solyman Bassa the Eunuch turning himself about, spake unto them in this sort.

Frenchmen (said he) this place for dispatch of one of most weighty affairs, appointed by the grave Judgment of our most mighty Emperor to us his faithful Servants, doth (as it best becometh) receive us daily coming into it, void of love and hatred, and without doth notably put us in remembrance, to speak our minds freely. Neither would I, that this frankness of speech (the Messenger of truth, and therefore the faithful keeper of Friendship) should be unto your ears unpleasing or troublesome; for since your King hath called the friend and fellow of the Ottoman Name, we may not now either forget the duties of love, or loath your friendship; seeing that our Emperor doth marvellously affect you, and is not a little desirous to strengthen you with his power, and by overcoming your Enemies to increase your power and honour. But in your demands is no equity, no modesty, for that you immediately and importunately and others which favour you not, so with call you plainly by your right Names, unreasonable and shameful; Men who as too too forgetful of your duties, do most fondly trouble the Laws of amity and friendship. For Leagues are confirmed by like profits, making even the charge and mutual dangers; but if neglecting your Friends kindness and could know they will make no requital, they will quickly grow weary of you. So happened it unto you Frenchmen, who ever forgetful and negligent in our dangers, but in your own always mindful and diligent, have shewed your selves friends unto us when need was, not in deed and certain aid, but only in bare Letters, and empty promises. Tell me I pray you where ever you shewed any sign or token of your good will or aid? I have been kept in suspense of some doubtful hopes, when as Charles with all the power of the West came into Hungary; And Corone and Patrias were in the mean time shaken in Greece with the Enemies Fleet; and left of all Tunes taken with so great a Fleet? But all this we pardon you; yet this it is which is hardly to be endured, that you did not so much as once grieve at our great injuries, as you ought to have done; but yet your gratulatory Embassadors unto the bloody common Enemy, who had but even then slain so many of our people. At length our Emperor came to Aulona to your great profit, about to pass ever into Italy; but neither then in the arrival of your Fleet appeared the good will of the Apulians towards you, which were of you so openly promised, neither did you so much as once move to invade the upper part of Italy; so neither serving our turn, nor with fitting your care, you have always left the ocean of the good seas, as you doze off. But neither then, neither at any time afterwards, needed we your Counsel or united Forces; for the Venetians to their pain felt both our Forces and our Raib; as for the rest, War, the notable revenge of our wrongs, most happily brought to pass, at such a time as you of your own voluntary heads made peace with the common enemy, to invade us; and did as unkindly as impudently, as it were blow Wind in his Sails. But we, without your help, have not only repelled so great assaults of our Enemies; when as this same Haridienus Barbaruffa put to flight their Fleet at Ambracia and happily flew the Spanish Pyrats of Castrum, and having again recovered our own Cities, took also from them some of theirs; wherefore we are bound unto you for no desert, but we had rather forget these unkindnesses, than to fail you whom we have once received into our friendship. For we perform ours to you, as it is his part to regard the time, to way the danger, to wait occasion; which will not rashly commit his actions to the hazard of Fortune. You are come later than you should have done for the setting forth of our Fleet; for Summer now well spent, followeth the pestilent time of Autumn, so that Mariners cannot in convenient time be taken up, or safely thrust into the Gallies; for in long sailings you would not think, but that such a Company of Sailors usually set at the charge of an unacquainted Air, would be in danger of their lives? Who would not fear Shipwreck in their return, when as this same Haridienus so great a Master at Sea, driven upon the Acroceraunian Rocks in the Month of August, lost so many Gallies? A Fleet would be rigged in Winter, furnished and set forward in the Spring, in Summer is late sailing and making War. Which that it may be so done, we will for the Commonwealth sake, persuade the Emperor; for the Navy once left, cannot upon the sudden be again restored for much Gold, whereof the Ottoman Emperor warrieth no store, heaped up by many Ages. If thou be wise take these things in good part as friendly spoken; but whether the Emperor will pardon thy boldness or not, let himself consider; truly we have suffered both him and our selves in speaking to thee so plainly.

These things severely spoken by the Eunuch Bassa, did so much the more trouble Polimus, for

for that they seemed to have been sent from the mouth of Solyman himself, who was thought to have heard all that was said. For behind the Baffies as they sat in Council, was a Window with a brazen Grate, and a Curtain drawn before it, that the Emperor when he pleased, might unperceived hear the complaints and futes of all Nations, and note the manners of his great Counsellors; whose care for the administration of Justice was so much the greater, for fear of his presence. Yet did not Polinus for his repulse, deserting the delicate dealing of the Baffies, to give over his fute; but winning by gifts the favour of the Capiaga or chief Porter, a Man ever of great authority in the Turks Court, laboured by him to be brought to the speech of Solyman himself, who faithfully performed what he had undertaken. So the French Ambassador brought by him into the secret place of the Court, which few Christians had ever been, and to him how all matters had before passed, and most earnestly besought him not to fail the Kings expectation of the Fleet he had before promised, who at that present was invading his Enemies in three places. Whereunto Solyman courteously and expressly answered, That the opportunity of sending out of his Fleet was past; not by his will, but by which was always immutable and firm, but by his late coming, and the time of the year half spent; but promised the next Spring without doubt to send unto the King his Friend and Brother, twice so great a Fleet as he had desired against Charles their Enemy. With which answer, the Ambassador dispatched away Dixius into France, upon whose arrival, King Francis called back again Henry his eldest Son with his Army, from the Siege of Perpenna in Spain.

The Princes and States of Germany, at the request of King Ferdinand and the Nobility of Hungary, about this time decreed with one consent, to take up Arms against the Turks, for the recovering again of Buda, and other the lost parts of Hungary. For besides the dishonour done to their Nation at Esek under the leading of Casazianer, and again at Buda under the leading of the Lord Rodoff; they well saw, that if they did not speedily relieve the Hungarians overwhelmed with the calamities of the Turks Forces, they should in short time be enforced to fight for their Religion, Children, Wives, and Lives, against the same mighty Enemy, at their own Doors. For preventing whereof, the Princes and free Cities of Germany, sent out thirty thousand Footmen, and seven thousand Horsemen; amongst whom was Mauritius, afterwards Duke of Saxony, then a young Gentleman about twenty years old. But the General of these German Forces, was Joachim Marquis of Brandenburg, a Man more for the honour of his House than the valour of himself preferred to that place; yet so, that unto him was joined eight others, Men of great years and experience, by whose Counsel he was to be directed. When they were come to Buda, King Ferdinand power met them; where, beside such as were taken up in Austria, Huguenot Governour of Sirria came in with ten thousand Horsemen. Unto these the Noblemen of Hungary, Gasper Sereclius, Andreas Bator, and Petrus Peremus, a Man of the greatest authority, power, and experience, amongst the Hungarians, joined themselves, with fifteen thousand Horsemen; whither also Paulus the third of that Name, then Bishop of Rome, sent three thousand chosen Footmen out of Italy, conducted to Vienna by Alexander Vitellius, a most famous Captain. The Marquis with this great Army marched from Vienna along the River Danubius, but so softly, that the Hungarian and Italian Captains said plainly, That the best part of the Summer and hottest time for Wars, was passed over in loitering and dallying out the time to no purpose; especially Tachius Medius, who had long before overtraded the King, to be ready to set forward his Forces with the first of the Spring, before the Turks could either augment their Garrisons, or put in any new Forces; for thereby such resolute and speedy invasion, it was like enough he might recover both Peft and Buda. Which policy and wholesome Counsel for well given, King Ferdinand too much crediting the great Men of his Court (liking nothing but what proceeded out of themselves) rejected, expecting the full assembly of all his Forces, before the setting forth of his Army. At length the Marquis was by soft marches come to Strigomium (King Ferdinand himself laying behind at Vienna) where it was commonly reported, That Solyman fearing to lose Buda, was either in person himself coming into Hungary, or else sending down the General of his European Horsemen, who might never far far forward to War, without sixty thousand Horsemen. Which news so troubled the Germans, that they made no great halt forward, doubting how they should return again if they chanced not to get the Victory; beside that, it was thought that the Marquis never purposed to fight a Battle, or endanger himself or his Army for the Kingdom of Hungary, but only to defend the bounds of Austria, and by thus showing strength of Germany, to terrify, if he could, the Turks, if they not content with Hungary, should also provoke the Germans. But after it was by certain Espies from Samandria, known that all that report of the coming of the Turks great Army was but vain, and that there was scarce a thousand Janizaries and twice so many Horsemen come to Buda, and that the Turks Fleet was both for number and strength far inferior to the Kings, they set forward again with more cheerfulness, much encouraged by the forwardness of the Hungarians, especially of Peremus; assuring them, that if they would without delay march on, and spend no more time in vain, they should not find at Buda any such number of Turks as was worth the name of an Army; for that Solyman using but every second Year to make War, did that year take his rest, and was not like to undertake any great expedition. For these reasons all Men being persuaded of the Enemies strength and purpose, to come to the Siege of Buda; for then would the Soldiers with much more courage and cheerfulness endure the Siege of Buda, if they had by good fortune first beaten them out of Peft; Which Counsel was both best liked and followed, and the Army by two Bridges with great and painful labour made over Danubius (which was in that place divided into two parts) transported. As the Army passed an Italian Captain, Admiral of the Kings Fleet, came down the River, and in despite of the Turks took the Island of St. Margaret, lying in the River a little above Buda, and by force repulsed the Turks Fleet unto the Suburbs of the City. The Marquis to avoid the danger of the

the great shot from Buda, after he was passed the River, fetched a great compass about, and so came to the North side of Peft; for on the South it was defended with the River Danubius, running betwixt it and Buda; and on the East and West the great Ordinance on the one side from the Castle of Buda, and on the other from Mount St. Gerard, did so fow all along the Walls, that no Man could without most manifest danger there abide. For Buda standing upon the Hill, and divided from Peft only with the River, so overlook and commandeth all the plain Country about Peft, that without peril no Man can fire on any side of the City, but Northward towards Austria, covered by the City from the shot out of the Walls. As the Marquis was coming thither, he was told by certain Fugitives, That Bala Governour of Buda (who in that place succeeded Solyman the Hungarian Renegade, lately before dead of the Plague) had in Garrison in Buda two thousand Horsemen; and that Ulamus the Persian Governour of Bafna, was come unto him with three thousand more; whereunto Amrath had also joined another thousand which he brought out of Dalmatia; and that Segemen was come thither also with a thousand Janizaries from Constantinople; as for the rest of the Footmen, that they were but wild Country people, fitter for labour than for service in Wars. They told him also, that the Enemies Fleet consisted of sixty small Pinnaces, ten Gallies, and a few other great Boats; and that Solyman had commanded his Captains to come to the defence of Buda and Peft, to the last Man, without regard of any other place. And had proposed unto the valiant, great rewards; and to the cowardly, extreme punishment; charging them further, that if need were, they should in time send for Achomet, the General of his European Horsemen, to Sophia, to aid them. The Turks upon the approach of the Christians, issued out at one of the Gates of the City, and skirmished with the Hungarians; but after they had sufficiently proved one anothers strength, and some few were on both sides slain, they retired into the City, and the Hungarians to the Camp. The next day after, Vitellius going out of the Camp near the City with five companies, to chuse a place for planting the Battery; the Turks at one instant falling out at two Gates of the City, gave him a hot skirmish, where at the first, the fight was begun with like courage and force, but the Turks still sending forth new supplies both of Horse and Foot; first the Christian Footmen, and after that the Horsemen, not able longer to endure the force of the Janizaries, were constrained disorderly to retire, having lost in that retreat four of their Captains and two Ensigns; and had not Vitellius with one Company of Horsemen sored together, valiantly repulsed the insolent Janizaries, the loss had been much greater. Vitellius exceedingly grieved with this loss, and perceiving the manner of the Enemies fight, encouraged his Soldiers, purposing if he could to be fully revenged; and above all others, requested Peremus to be ready to join with him as occasion should require. Vitellius lay encamped in the Kings Orchards, walled about as it were a mile, equally distant both from the great Camp and from the City; out of these Orchards he went with twelve Companies of his European Footmen, commanding them to stand still within the Walls, in readiness at all affairs; and so fetching a great compass about, marched along the River side towards the City; neither did the proud Enemy (brag of the former days Victory) make any delay, but bravely fallied out at the East side of the City, and courageously charged them. But Vitellius warned of his former harm, and seeing his Enemies come on as he desired, covered his foot with his Pikes, and standing close, received the Enemies charge; his foot still playing under the Pikes, circumstances upon their Knees; many of the Turks were there laid on the ground, whilst they desperately sought to have broken the order of the Christians. In the mean time, when many of the Turks Horsemen and Janizaries coming out of the Gates, and divers others beholding the fight were come over the River from Buda, to be partakers of the Victory, had filled the lithermost Bank; Vitellius in good time, of purpose by little and little retired, as if he had been overcharged; then began the Enemy to give a great shout, and more fiercely to assail the Christians; their Horsemen also call behind them, to have there charged them. Which thing Peremus diligently noting, and that the Turks in following of Vitellius were drawn a great way from the Gates, he suddenly with his light Horsemen came in betwixt the City and the Turks at their backs; four hundred followed also Mauritius, (afterwards Duke of Saxony) with a strong Troop of German Horsemen, of purpose to have thrust them in for retreating back again into the City. But then the Turks perceiving the danger, and finding themselves shut in, stood as Men more than half dismayed, bethinking themselves which way to take, and so began to retire. When Vitellius coming on courageously with his Pike-men and his Harquebuses divided into the ranks, charged them fiercely; and the Hungarian and German Horsemen breaking in amongst them on the other side, made great slaughter of them, and struck such a fear amongst the flying Turks, that many of them in running to the Gate, thrust one another through with their Pikes; divers other were also by the Horsemen driven into the River and there drowned. This day Segemen lost above an hundred of his Janizaries, and four hundred others. The chiefest commendation for this piece of service was given to Vitellius, who had so well and so quickly revenged himself of the Turks; and next him to Peremus, who as skillful Captain had so well awaited the time to entrap the Enemy; Neither is Mauritius the young Saxon Prince unworthy his due praise, who valiantly charging the Turks, and having his Horse slain under him, was in danger to have been there lost himself; had the Turks still sending forth new Followers, covered him with his own Body, until such time as that he was rescued by others. Ribischi himself presently dying of his Wounds, this little Victory encouraged the Germans, that the Marquis commanded the great Ordinance to be presently brought forth, and the Battery planted, which was at the first placed so far off, that it did little harm, although the Wall were both old and thin, not above five Foot thick; and the Ordinance laid either a little too low, or mounted too high, either too short, or quite over the City into Buda; which fault once perceived, the Battery was removed nearer, and a fair Breach soon made in the Wall, with the continual beating of forty great Pieces of Artillery. Vitellius was the first that offered to assault the Breach, so that the Germans would presently second him, which thing they all by holding up of their hands promised courageously, but cowardly by and by broke that promise; for oftentimes it chanced, that they which before the danger are readiest to promise their help, are in the very danger it self of all others most slack. parts promised not to be behind. The silence of the Enemy at the Breach and in the City, was wonderful, for that many thought he had been fled back over the River to Buda; for Segement Captain of the Janizaries, an old beaten Soldier, ordered all things with as little fire as was possible; he had received new supplies from Ulamas, and had cast a deep Countermine within the Wall against the Breach, and on the inner side of the fame had made a strong Barriado, with Gabions and Wine Vessels filled with Sand and Earth; behind which stood the Janizaries, and next unto them the Turkish Archers, and last of all the Horsemen who had left their Horses to serve on Foot. The signal for the assault once given, four Italian Captains ran desperately with their Companies by the ruins of the Wall to the Breach; but whilst they there set up their Engines, and wondering at the Enemies fortification, were ready betwixt hope and fear to leap down, they were suddenly overwhelmed with a shower of Arrows and Bullets. Yet Vittellius still encouraging them, brought them still on, who did what they might to have entered; but the German Footmen with their General stood still under the Walls, looking on, as Men nothing moved either with the hope of Victory or danger of their Friends; and the Hungarians not so much as once looking upon the Enemy, retired; two of the Italian Captains, Rufus and Fidus were there slain, and Carpius Vitellius his Nephew, flung in the Shoulder. The Turks with Shot and Stones flew and repelled, and beat down the Italians, whereof the Germans also standing still, fell part, and were more gauled than Man would have thought. Men could have been, that did nothing; for there they still stood for shame, lest if they should have also retired, they should have incurred a second infamy as bad as the first; which thing Vitellius perceiving, would in no case depart from the Breach, but withered rather to lose his Men by whole Companies, than to leave the least colour of excuse to the Germans, or that they should say they staid longest, of whom he thought greater anger than grief complained, that he was forsaken and cowardly betrayed. In time of this assault one of the Turks was heard to speak aloud in the Italian Tongue, Why do not you valiant Italians spare your selves, and give place to these lascivious Germans? We all wish to spare you, and to beat the drunkards out of your cities, and to cut off their heads, that they should be hereafter provoked on. At length the Germans were weary of their hot flanding and nought doing, got them farther off, after whom the Italians forthwith retired; but so disorderly, to be quickly out of the danger of the Enemies shot, that if the Turks had at the same time fallen out at all the Gates, it was thought that the whole Camp had been greatly endangered. In this attempt rather than assault, even hundred Christians were slain outright, and many more hurt, who died afterwards of their wounds.

All this while the Marquis and Hugonot the great Commanders of the Army, kept themselves so far from Gunshot, that they were nowhere to be seen, until that Torniusius and Fosifus, two valiant Captains, finding them out, withed them for shame to free themselves for the comforting of the Army. A little before night they conferred with the other Captains, whether they should forsake the Siege, or continue it still; whereof most of the Germans best liked to be gone, as the safest way; though Vitellius and some others spoke earnestly to the contrary. At which time a Spy coming in, brought news that Ascomates, Solyman Lieutenant of the European Horsemen, had passed over the River Savus at Belgrade, and was coming to Oravus; who coming either cunningly fained, or vainly believed, caused the Germans to make a short conclusion, and to resolve flatly to return to Vienna, fearing that if they should longer continue the Siege, they should be staid against their wills by Ascomates. Which thing made many of the old German Soldiers to hang their heads for shame, and the Hungarian to curse both the Germans and the hard fortune of their Nation, vainly wishing for a General in courage answerable to the strength of that great Army. Segement perceiving how much the Christian Army was discouraged by the last days evil success, early in the Morning courageously sent out all the Horsemen, and after them certain Companies of Footmen, to relieve them in their retire; who in many place skirmished with the Hungarians, being nothing inferior unto them either in courage or skill; and the matter was brought to that pass, as if it had been so agreed upon, that many of the most notable and expert Soldiers on either side encountered together hand to hand in the fight of the Italians and Germans, the Hungarians mixt with the Turks, and the Turks with the Hungarians, with such fidelity, that they regarded no other Enemy but him whom every one hand singled out for himself, as if it had been in a triumph for exercise hand to hand. It happened, that a notable Captain of the Turks, desired to see Vitellius, who being thewed unto him (for he was easy to be known by his Armor) the Turk ran unto him to embrace him for his honour, and so departed. About five hundred Horsemen so encountered one another hand to hand that day, of whom many were slain or hurt. The night following the Battery was removed, and the Army marched towards the River to the Elceat. But the Turks, ceiving the Christians to be departed, fellied out of the City on all hands, and with a great cry upbraiding them of Cowardice, hardly pursued the Rereward of the Army. Ulamas was come over himself from Buda, and so eagerly followed the Army, that it could hardly have escaped without great danger, had not Vitellius with his Italians made a stand, and requested the Hungarian and German Horsemen to turn back upon the Enemy; which they at his request did, and not only repulsed the Enemy, but also put him to flight, and in the chase flew many. After which time the Army passed on quietly; yet seven hundred Germans which were sick and straggled behind the Army, were by the Turks Horsemen miserably slain in the fight of their Fellows. The Germans thrice foiled by the Turks, first at Esch, then at Buda, and now at Papls, returned full of heaviness and grief, as they which were now to forget the fubduing of Hungary, and to become careful of Germany it self. The Army coming to Vienna, was there broken up, and the Italians sent home into their Country, who for most part died by the way, of infection taken in the Camp in strange Ail, and a most quietie time of the Year.

But to cover the shame of this unfortunate expedition, and to turn Mens eyes to another by some notable accident; Petrus Perennis, the noble Hungarian was the Man pickt out for the purpose to fill Mens mouths. He, betrayed with the envy of the Court, was for suspicion of aspiring to the Kingdom of Hungary; by the commandment of King Ferdinand apprehended by Lificanus, a Spanish Captain in the Castle of Strigenium, as a Traitor, and presently delivered to Medices the Admiral, to be conveyed up the River to Vienna.

Vienna. Lificanus at the time of his apprehension pickt covertly and unaccountably took from him his Chain, and a rich Cloak lined with Sables; which indignity done to noble a Gentleman, so much offended the minds of the rest of the Hungarians, that above twelve thousand of them thompson presently returned home to their own dwellings, cursing the Germans to the Devil. This Perennis was one of the greatest Powers of Hungary, but of a most haughty and magnificent mind, so that he would sometime have almost a hundred goodly spare Horses fit for service led before him without their Riders; and would sometime speak too liberally against the bareness of King Ferdinand Court, who polled by his Courtiers, hardly maintained his State; which his surpassing magnificence and princely Port was caused for the other great Courtiers to envy at his Estate, and to seek his overthrow; who as Men overcharged with the burden of another Mans vertue, whereof they never bore the least part, and always gaining by the depraving of other Mens perfection, conspired together his overthrow, and oftentimes pointing at him with their fingers, would say, That he favoured of a Crown. This notable Man, as he had many worthy Vertues, so was he not without cause noed of ambition and uncontent; for after that King Lewys was lost, he disdaining the preferment of John the Vayvod to the Kingdom of Hungary, took part with King Ferdinand against him, in hope as it was thought to be next in honour unto himself; but after he saw King John again restored, and his State strongly supported by Solyman, and that all things stood doubtful and fickle with Ferdinand, he with little levity found means by divers ways to Bass to be reconciled to King John; which he hardly obtained of him by the intercession of Solyman himself (as is before declared) to whom he gave his Son as a Pledge of his Fidelity. After which time he lived in great Honour and Loyalty all the Reign of King John; but after he was dead, and saw George the Bishop the Kings Tutor doing what he list, to reign like a King, he disdained his Government, and followed by King Ferdinand, revolved again unto him, and furthered him in what he could for the obtaining of the Kingdom. But now falling into the envy of the Court, Malice found out matter enough to work his confusion. First it was given out, That his son who had many years been detained in Solyman Court as a Pledge of his Fathers Faith, was even then under the colour of a fained escape come into Pologonia; when as he had secretly agreed with Solyman, that his Father being a Man much favoured of the People, should by promising them all possible Freedom, allure them to the Turkish fubjugation; in reward of which good service he should be made Governour of the Kingdom of Hungary, and put in hope also to be made the Tributary King thereof. If it should fortune the young King to die. Besides that, it was accounted a thing very suspicious, that he had the Winter before used great kindness and friendship towards the Turkish Captains, by sending them great Presents, and receiving the like again. And last of all, his Letters directed to certain Hungarian Captains were produced, wherein he seemed to promise them as his Friends and Followers, greater entertainment than agreed with his present Estate. All which things King Ferdinand not easily to be persuaded to conceive evil of the Germans his Countrymen, were it never so apparent or true, but of Strangers any thing) quickly believed, and therefore caused him (as is before said) to be apprehended. But Perennis as he was brought by Medices the Admiral to Vienna, when he was come near unto the Gate of the City, and heard that Philippus Torniusius with certain other brave Captains of his acquaintance, were come to meet the Admiral; he requested that the clove Coach wherein he rid might be opened, and that he might have leave to speak to those noble and valiant Gentlemen. Which thing was easily granted, for that the Nobility and approved valour of the Man seemed unto them which had the charge of him, unworthy of such restraint, liberty or imprisonment, yea or of the least suspicion thereof. So he turning himself towards them, spake unto them in this sort:

Wretched I, noble Gentlemen (said he) whom delightful every hath circumvented guilefuls; but much table speech
my miserable King Ferdinand, whom domesticall to Tornius Thieves because of Selfishness, of Friends, and Honour near all as once. For I to come to pass, that by the this inconsiderate wrong done unto me, do shall ever terly lose the love and fidelity of the Hungarian Nation, and may therefore for ever not without cause despair for the obtaining of the Kingdom of Hungary, fubience that it is not lawful for me to inferior to move of my Nation in Birth, and having for my good and faithful service well deserved reward of a good King, so much to be desired for the deliverance of my Son from the Captivity of the Turks, but that for my snifter Fortune, dreadful death in stead of a comparable joy must be presented to mine Eyes. For will these malicious Pick-thanks, guilty of their own Cowardice, the wicked Controvers and Witnesses of my wrongful Accusation, spare me being laid fall and in duance, which never before the Kings Honour? For every Man of what Nobility I never, be he never so guileful, when he is once in hold, must be content to endure, not what he hath deserved, but what his hard fortune assigneth. To me agree, mine end, and the conscience, which only God the most just Judge leaveeth as a comfort to Men in misery wrongfully accused, delivered me of this care; and so will the Marques our General, to whom I before upon a mistrust foretold, that such a danger would shortly befall me, and that I had rather be slain guileful, than to withstand my self from Trial, which thing I told him at such a time as I was so guarded with mine own strength, that I feared no Mans force. I have seen you do me this honourable favour, as to request
King Ferdinand in my behalf quickly and honourably to proceed to the Trial of my Cause, and according to his own princely disposition, and the will of others to discern between his faithful Friends and fained Flatterers. Truly we are too unfortunate Captains, if for a little time success we shall be so adjudged
at Men that have received their Fortune. Caz-zianer peradventure received the just punishment had deserved, for the shameful forsaking and losing of the Army at Esch, when as he possessed with an uncouth fear, forgot the duty of a General, more afraid of death than dishonour; for when he had voluntarily committed himself to safe custody, he was so generally condemned of Cowardice, that despairing to defend his Cause, he brake Prison, and as wickedly as unfortunately resolved to die the Turks; but neither was I of late the General, neither were we conquered, although we prevailed not, but honourably retiring, valiantly repressed the inclemency of the pursuing Enemy. As for the Kingdom of Hungary, I might then well have affected the same, and easily have deserved it as Solyman Hands, when as King Ferdinand after the death of King John was making his preparation for that War, at which time my Friends

Hungarians towards me, fearing of no small dan-

tance for the obtaining of the Victory, might have misfringed no unreasonable or unreasonable to have drawn a Man into court; not altogether becoming a Christian. Wherefore I have, and will to long as I live fight against the Turks, if King Ferdinand shall show himself an indifferent Judge in this accusation, falsely furnished against me by the malice of mine Enemies.

Perenna, Valentine and May-lis, three of the greatest Nobility in Hungary, kept in perpetual Prison.

When he had made an end of speaking, the Admiral courteously perswaded him to have good hope in the clemency of the most just King; and shortly after performed his request; for he and Tornielius taking the King as he was Hunting, entreated him to deal favourably with Perenna. For all that, Perenna could not obtain that his cause might be openly heard, but was committed to safe keeping; but whether it was for the perpetual Prison; but whether it was for the imprisonment of new Treason, or for revenge of his old uncontentancy, is uncertain. Thus three the only great Princes left of the Hungarian Blood, equally worthy of the Kingdom, Polinus, May-lis, and Perenna, shared almost in like Shares of envy, cut off all hope of raising a King to their sedulous and therefore miserable Countrymen; when as Perenna lay too late bewailing his uncontentancy in perpetual Prison; and the other two left in Chains near unto the Euxine Sea, expected death the end of their miseries. This end had the Wars taken in hand against the Turks by the general consent of the Germans in the year 1542. which many thought might worthily be compared with the greatest losses of those times; when as King Ferdinand having in vain spent a great mass of Treasure (the King's pay for the imminent War) and lost the opinion before conceived of the strength of Germany, had now as a weak Prince, and subject to injury, provoked him against the Turks, bold enough otherwise, but as then insolent for their late Victories.

Polinus the French Kings Ambassador following the Turks Court, ceased not by all means to solicit Solyman, with his Gallies to aid the King his Master in the invasion of the Dominions of Charles the Emperor, in Italy, Sicily, and Spain. In which fure he was so croffed by Solyman the Eunuch Basha, then Viceroy, that he was almost in despair of speed. For the Malicious Eunuch, being himself a great Sea-man, and carrying the Honour of Barbarossa (who was to be employed in that service) fought by keeping him out of all honourable Actions, to diminish his former Glory; and concerning the present, proceeded openly as he sat in Council, That he saw no other cause why the Turkish Emperor should to his great charge and the common danger, send out such a Fleet, but to serve Barbarossa his own turn. But Solyman having diligently heard, and deeply considered of that the Basha had said, rejected their opinions, who would not he should have given the French King any aid; and honourably decreed according to his promise, whatsoever should ensue thereof, to send his Fleet unto the King by Barbarossa. Two days after, the French Ambassador before in despair, but now revived with that Decree, was solemnly Feasted by Ruffian Basha (Solyman Son in Law) and by Solyman the Eunuch Basha; for it was the greatest pleasure, both of them joying of him for the friendship confirmed betwixt the two Princes by sending this Fleet. After which, divers Gifts were bestowed upon the Ambassador and his chief Followers; and at such time as he was to take his leave, Solyman gave him great charge of his Navy, that it might be safely kept, and also after the service done, again returned; and withal delivered him Letters unto King Francis, wherein after the glorious rehearsal of his proud Titles, he writ unto him as followeth:

We have upon a brotherly Bounty granted unto Polinus your Ambassador, such aid to great a Fleet as you have desired, thoroughly furnished for all of France; whose direction we have commanded Hadrien our Admiral to follow, and by your appointment to proceed against the Enemy. But you shall do well and friendly, the Wars once happily ended, to send back again my Fleet to Constantinople. All things shall undoubtedly fall out according to your own desire and mine, if you shall carefully take heed that Charles the Spanish King your perpetual Enemy, do not again deceive you with the motion of a deceitful Peace. For then shall you bring him to a most indifferant Peace, when you have brought upon his Countries all the calamities of War.

Polinus taking his leave of Solyman then lying at Hadrinople, returned to Constantinople, where he found Barbarossa with an hundred and ten Gallies and forty Gallions, ready to put to Sea, which he had with incredible celerity rigged up and furnished. And so setting forward the eight and twentieth of April in the year 1543, and passing the Straits of Hellaspontus, he arrived first at Carisium, in Euboea; and from thence to Malea, where he was by contrary Winds caft into the Bay of Lacedemon, and there staid nine days before he could double the Cape of Metapontum, called in ancient time Tenaros. After that he came to Methon, and from thence crossing the Ionian, came to the Strait of Melana; where the Turkish Pyrats being come with their Gallies within the sight of Rhegium, began to land their Men. The Turks already landing, fled out of the City for fear; but the Castle was fill kept by Dilacus Gaudemus a Spaniard, who refused to have any parly with Polinus the French Ambassador, and with those out of the Castle flew certain of the Turks; where-with the rest being enraged, broke into the City, and finding it desolate, let it on Fire, fore against the will of Polinus and Barbarossa, who fought to have found out the Authors thereof, and to have punished them accordingly.

After that, certain Pieces of great Ordnance were landed and placed against the Castle, which with a few Shot so terrified the Captain, already troubled with the crying out of his Wife, that he without any more ado yielded himself and the Castle with all therein, into the hands of the Enemy; unto whom with his Wife and Children, Barbarossa at the request of the French Ambassador granted both life and liberty; the rest he shut up in a Church, and gave the Spoil of the Castle to his Soldiers. There was in the Garrison of the Castle about twenty Spaniards, but many more Citizens, which were all carried away Prisoners. One of the Captains Daughters, a young Gentlewoman of exceeding Beauty, had with her good Grace so warmed the withered affection of the old Pyrat Barbarossa, that he (now fitter for the Grave than for Marriage) became amorous of her person; so that taking her from her Father, and entering him in the Mahometan Superstition, he made of her as of his Wife; inasmuch that certain Months after he welcomed and bountifully entertained the Captain as his Father in Law, coming to see his Daughter at the Port called Formis Heracleis in Turkey, where the Turks Fleet then lay. Barbarossa sailing along the Coast of Italy, came to

Solyman Letters to the French King.

The French Ambassadors Letters to comfort Polinus the Cardinal, the Pope's Legate in Rome.

Solyman cometh with a great Army into Hungary.

The Castle of Walpo treacherously yielded, and the traitors justly rewarded.

Offis, in the Mouth of the River Tibur and brought forth a fear upon the City of Rome, that the Citizens were ready generally to have forsaken the City; had not Polinus by his Letters to Rodolphus Legate in the City, in part raised the Iudain Tumult. The Bishop himself was then at Bosconia, a Town betwixt Cremena and Placentia, travelling (in fiew) with the Emperor, to have made a Peace betwixt him and the French King; but labouring in secret to have bought of him the Dukedom of Adilion, for Giulius his Kinsman the Emperors Son in Law. Polinus his Letters written to the Cardinal at Rome, and sent by the Governour to Tarracina, were to this effect.

This Fleet which is by Solyman sent for the defence of France by Barbarossa his Admiral, is by his appointment at my command; so that it is not to hurt any but our Enemies. Wherefore make it known to the Romans and others dwelling along the Coast of the Pope's Territory, that they fear of no Hostility; for the Turks will never violate the Faith of their Emperor solemnly given unto me; and you know most assuredly, that the French King desires nothing more, than that the Estate of Rome might not only be kept in safety, but also flourish most gloriously, and be therefore preserved from all injury. Careweli.

In like manner he also comforted up them of Naples and Offis, to that they brought up to the Turks all manner of Victual, and sometimes for four Sheep or a couple of Ovens deemed a good Prisoner taken in some place of the Kingdom of Naples. Yet for all this, the Romans did not so much credit the Ambassadors promise in the behalf of the Turks good dealing, but that many of the weaker sort fled out of the City into the Country by night, although the chief Magistrats did what they might to have stayed them. When Barbarossa had thuslien three days in the Mouth of the River Tibur, and there watered, he passed along the Coast of Etruria and Liguria, without doing any harm; and so sailed directly to Marfille. Where leaving him with his Fleet for a while, expecting the French Kings further pleasure, we will again return unto Solyman, who at the same time that Barbarossa was spoiling the Frontiers of the Emperors Dominions in Italy, came with a great Army into Hungary, for the more assured possession of that Kingdom, whither he by King Ferdinand so much longed. And because he would make all fire before him, he sent Amurath Governour of Dalmatia, and Ullamas the Persian Governour to Besna, to besiege Walpo, a strong Town situate upon the River Dravus, not far from Esek, famous for the overthrow of the Christian Army under Cassianus; after whom Solyman sent Alphonse the great Commander of his European Horsemen. This Town (part of Perenna his possessions) was against all these Forces kept and worthily defended by Perenna his Wife (her Husband then lying in Prison at Vimma) and her Friends; who by the treacherous Soldiers delivered to the Enemy, together with their Generals whom they could by no means perswade to consent to the yielding up thereof, but that he would needs hold it out to the last, they took him prisoner, and so delivered him with the Town to the Turks; who received him with all courteous, and used him honourably; but those traitorous Soldiers, whether it were in detestation of their Treachery, or for the spoil of them, were all put to the Sword; the just reward of their Treason. The rest of the Citizens were taken by the Turks to mercy, and well used. The Bishop and chief Men of Quinque Ecclesia (a famous City not far off on the other side of Dravus) hearing of the loss of Walpo, and terrified with the greatness of the Turks Army, fled for fear, leaving none but the meaner sort of the People in the City, who willingly yielded the same unto the Turks. The next Town of any strength was Sesepia, belonging also to Perenna; which for that divers Gentlemen of the Country which were fled into the City, encouraged the Citizens to stand upon their defence. But after much harm done on both sides, when they were no longer able to hold out, so saved their lives and liberty by yielding; but Amurath was so offended with them, that he would come to no reasonable composition, or should at their pleasure come forth; and so as they came out at the Gate, flew them every Mothers Son, thereby to terrify others from making like resistance.

Solyman understanding of all these things, gave those Towns which were taken, to Amurath the General; and having put all things in readiness, departed from Buda the next day, to besiege Sirigium; which was his Army to besiege Sirigium, which was then kept by Lefcanus and Solanman, two proud covetous Spaniards, with a Garrison of one thousand three hundred Soldiers, whereof some few were Spaniards and Italians, and the rest Germans. Paulus Bishop of Sirigium got himself out of the City betimes, despairing of all mercy; so that he should have fallen into the power of Solyman; by very intercession he had been once before reconciled to King Ferdinand, and had again revolted from him to King Ferdinand. The Castle of Sirigium was situate upon a high Hill overlooking Danubius running underneath it; the Walls were built even without any Flankers, after the old manner of building before the invention of Guns; for which cause Vitelius and Tornielius two expert Captains (the year before sent from the King to view the place, and the manner of the Fortification) were of opinion, that the City could hardly be defended, if it were besieged by any strong Enemy; being subject also unto a Hill not far from the Gates of the City. Against which inconvenience the old Garrison Soldiers which wintered in Sirigium, cast up new Bulwarks and Fortifications, and after the manner of windy headed Men, making great boast before the danger, what they would do, seemed to wish for the coming of Solyman. But after the with for the coming of Solyman, his Tents covered the Fields and Mountains round about the City, and withal brought a Gallant Fleet up the River, all those brags were laid in the Dust, and every Man began to grow doubtful of his own safety; for that they being but few (although a Man of good worth) were to withstand the infinite number of their Enemies, as oftentimes will most desperately to expose their lives to all manner of dangers. This their fear was also increased by the coming of certain Messengers from Solyman, who understood of what the Nations the Garrison consisted, sent unto the City the men of his own Guard; one a Spaniard, another an Italian, and the third a German, all Renegade Christians; that every one of them might without an Interpreter speak unto their Countrymen in their own Language; These Men admitted into the City, offered great rewards and large entertainment in the Name of Solyman, to such as would in time yield; denouncing all torture and extremities unto them which should endure the fummons of the Cannon. Whereunto it was answered by the Captains, That those faithful and valiant Soldiers, who had repaid their last hopes in their Arms, were neither to be won by gifts, nor terrified with threats. With which answer the Messenger returned, and the same day the Turks great Ordnance were planted upon the Hill before the Gate of the City, and the weakest parts of the Walls round about the City, so well picked out by the Turks to be assaulted, as that they could not more skilfully or commodiously have been chosen out of them which had, within most diligently viewed every thing; so that it is to be thought that the Christians wanted not only Fortune against the Turks, but also Faith amongst themselves. Salamance distrustful the Fortifications of the Suburbs, retired into the City, contrary to that he had before vainly boasted. Alchomates General of the European Horsemen, laid siege to that part of the Wall which was next to the Bishops Gardens. Ulamus the Persian besieged the Tower near unto the Gate towards Buda: The Alapi or common Soldiers were by their Captains brought on to dig Trenches, and cast up Mounts, as was thought most convenient. It is incredible to be spoken, with what fury the great Ordnance were discharged without ceasing; inasmuch that the Tower with a great part of the Wall near unto it, shaken with continual Rattle, fell down with such violence, as if all had rarely, fallen down with a most terrible Earthquake; neither was any Man able to stand upon the Walls, but that the Janizaries with their Harquebuses out of their Trenches, and from their Mounts, would most certainly fetch him off; and many which stood within farther off, were with the Turks Arrows, falling from high as if it had been out of the Air, grievously wounded. But that which most troubled the Defendants, and did them greatest harm, was the Stones, which beaten in funder with the great Shot, and not to be avoided, did with their Pieces kill or maim the Soldiers near hand: With which dangers they were enforced to forsake the uttermost Wall, and to cast up new Fortifications within, that they might with less danger defend the place. Neither in the Enemy wanted courage to assail the Breach; thrice they desperately attempted to have entered, and were always with loss repulsed. In many assaults, amongst others, Bulucius the Samrac of Syngina, and a Man of great account amongst the Turks, was lost. Whilst the Defendants were thus busied, many of the Soldiers and Mariners which came up the River with all things necessary for the Army, from Buda, went on there, and lay in the Suburbs of the City in such security, as if there had been no Enemy nigh; which thing they in the City perceiving, suddenly fell out upon them before they could arm themselves, and drove the rest of their Fleet; so that betwixt fighting and flying there was about two hundred of them slain. Zimar a Persian, Admiral of the Fleet, in refusing of them which to save their lives fled unto the River, was shot through with a small Shot and slain. Whilst these things were doing, and the Turks having in many places fire shaken the Wall, did with greater force daily assail the City, and the Defendants with their continual loss, and out of all hope of relief, were more and more discouraged; an old Calabrian Engineer which had long time served King Ferdinand, fled out of the City to the Turks; who being courteously entertained by Solyman, and examined by him of Baffaes of many things concerning the strength and state of the City, satisfied them in all that they desired; and further, directed them in planting their Batteries in places most convenient for the speedy taking of the Town. In the mean time whilst the Turks were with restless labour battering the Walls, and working in their Mines, it fortuned that a gilt brass Cross which stood upon the top of the Scepter of the Cathedral Church, was by the continual shooting of the Turks thereat, at length beaten down; at the sight whereof, it is reported that Solyman after the superstitious manner of that Nation taking the chance as a token of good luck, cried out presently, Strigimium is won.

Lifcanus and Salamance fearfully consulting of the event of the Siege, and secretly conferring together, resolved to save themselves, and to give up the Town. Lifcanus was no great Soldier; and yet by continual spoil grown exceeding rich, and therefore thought it but folly to buy the Name of a resolute Captain at too dear a price, with the loss of his Life and Wealth. The like feeling was also in Salamance, who preferred the safety of himself and of that which he had got in long service, before all credit and honour, were it never so great. Their their purpose was not amongst the common Soldiers, of whom almost the third part was now either slain, or with wounds or sickness grown weak; yet were they all of opinion generally, that they were still strong enough to defend the Town. But the under Captains and Ancients using to flatter their Generals, liked well of the motion, to yield unto Solyman upon reasonable conditions, rather than to expose themselves to the certainty of death, which should nothing better King Ferdinand could. Not long after, an Ancient was by night led down over the Wall; and having by an Interpreter received the Turks Faith, called forth Salamance, that he might upon better conditions go through with them for the yielding up of the Town. Who without further delay coming out, went to Alchomates; before he went, commanding them yielding up of the Town.

which defended the Water Tower next to the River side, a place of great danger, for safeguard of their lives to get them into the City; who terrified with that news, and hastily retiring, were by the vigilant Turks which lay at the siege thereof, perceived; who suddenly breaking in, flew such as were not yet gone, and possessed the Castle. But Salamance being brought before the great Baffaes, when he had stood upon many nice terms, and required many things to have been granted him, obtained no more, but that they should without delay yield up the City, and put themselves wholly to the mercy of Solyman. So the Spaniard being there slain, himself writ to Lifcanus, how he had sped; willing him forthwith, if he loved his own safety, to yield the City, without standing upon further terms. Lifcanus Strigont, upon receipt of these Letters coming forth to the Soldiers, declared unto them the necessity of yielding up of the Town, and what hope there was to escape with life and liberty. But whilst the Soldiers filled with indignation, stood as Men in doubt what to do, Hala Commander of the Janizaries came unto the Gate, and with cheerful rather than stern countenance required to have it opened unto him, according to the agreement made by Salamance in the Camp; which was forthwith opened by Lifcanus, and the Keys delivered unto him. The Janizaries entering peaceably into the City, possessed themselves of the Walls and Fortresses. He then, commanding the Christian Soldiers to give place, out of whom they chose all the beardless Youts, and

and commanded the rest to cast down their Harquebuses and other Weapons in a place appointed, which they all for fear did, expecting nothing but some cruel execution to be done upon them by the barbarous Enemy. Which their fear was the more encreased by a strange accident then unlookingly chancing; for whilst the Soldiers did as they were commanded, with their Harquebuses cast down their Flasks full of Powder also, one of them suddenly took fire of a Match which was by chance cast in amongst them with fire in it, which firing the rest, blew about all that heap of Weapons among the Turks, which filled them with anger and fear of some sudden Treachery, that they fell upon the Christians and slew divers of them; until such time as Hala (perwaded that it was a thing hapned rather by chance than malice) commanded his Janizaries to flay their fury. This tumult appeased, Hala caused proclamation to be made, That all such Christian Soldiers as would serve Solyman in his Wars, should have such place in his Army as their quality required, with bountiful entertainment; yet of all the Christian Soldiers were found only twenty, which careful of their lives, accepted the offer, fearing that the Turks would upon such as refused, exercise their wanted cruelty. Halis entertaining them courteously, sent them away with the other youths whom he had before called out, down the River to Buda; the other Soldiers he took into his protection, and used their labour to help the Turks to make clean the Castle. But Lifcanus, who to save his Gold had made Shipwreck of his honour and reputation, was glad to give unto Hala the fair Chain of Gold which he had most covetously and insolently before taken from Jeremus; when as Halis (who would otherwise have scorned him by force) by way of military courtesy now craved it of him as a strange kind of ornament among the Turks; with which gift he was in hope to have saved the rest of his Coy. But fortune favoured not so much the covetous Coward; for when he was about to depart away with his Horses of service, which he kept very good, and had cunningly stuffed the Saddles full of Gold, thinking foily to have conveyed it, the Turk laughing at him, took from him his Horses furnished as they were, saying, That he which was to go by Water needed no Horses. So was the covetous Wretch at once quit of the great Wealth which he had in long time evil got. The Captains with the rest of the Soldiers dispoiled of the Arms, were conveyed over the River of Dambius, and to travelled on foot to Poffimium, where the Count Salme by the commandment of the King apprehended Lifcanus, Salamance, and some other of the Captains for suspicion of Treason, and committed them to safe custody, there to answer for their cowardly yielding up of the City.

Solyman entered into Strigimium the tenth of August in the year 1543, and there converting Christian Churches into Temples for the Mahometan Superstition, first sacrificed for his Victory (as he had before done in Buda) and after with all speed to strongly fortify the City, as if he would thereby for ever have taken from the Christians all hope of recovering the same again, deriding the slothful negligence of the Germans, who possessed it of fourteen years, had neglected all that time to fortify it. Not long after, Solyman leaving Offianus a valiant Captain Governor of Strigimium, and sending his Tartarian Horsemen to spoil the Country on the west hand, as Alde Regalis went himself to besiege the Castle of Tattis, called in some time Theodora. The Garrison Soldiers terrified with the loss of Strigimium, and the sight of the Turks Army, upon the first fummons yielded the Castle without resistance, and were so suffered quietly to depart. That Castle after the manner of the Turkish Discipline, (who with few and those very strong Holds keep their Provinces in subjection) was by Solyman commandment presently raised down to the Ground. Tattis General of the Italians called Humbal, Captain of the Castle, to have his Head struck off for his cowardly yielding up of the place he had taken charge of; thereby to admonish others, which had the charge of strong places, not to refuse an honourable death in defence of their Country, for fear of an ignominious death attending their Cowardly.

Tattis thus laid in the Dust, Solyman marched with his Army towards Alba, surnamed Regalis, for that the Kings of Hungary by an ancient custom used there to be crowned and also buried. Buda, Strigimium, and Alba Regalis, three principal Cities of the Kingdom of Hungary stand in manner of a Triangle, almost equally distant one from another, about a hundred miles in compass. Buda and Strigimium are situate upon the River of Dambius; but Alba standeth more into the Land, strongly fenced in the midst of a great Lake, but not so wholly, especially in the Summer time, the Winter Waters then decreasing, and growing arising from the heat of the Sun. From the City through the Marsh or Lake, unto the firm Land, his three broad and high Causeys (in manner of the Breaks of a Cart-wheel) well built, with fair Houses and Gardens on either side, and a broad way in the middle, whereby Men pass in and out of the City. At the end of every Causey toward the Land were cast up strong Bulwarks, which the Citizens used to watch but in dangerous times of War; so that by these Bulwarks the Houses of the Suburbs standing upon these Causeys, were safe from the danger of the Enemy, the Lake filling up all the spaces betwixt the Causeys; which, what for the Depth, what for Mud, Flags, and Bulrushes, growing in it, was not by Horse or Man to be passed through. And the City it self standing in the midst of the Lake, compassed round about with a strong Wall, and a deep Ditch always full of Water, was hardly to be besieged; for which cause a great number of the Country people upon the coming of Solyman, fled into it with their Cattel, as unto a most safe hold. In the City lay in Garrison two Companies of Germans, and two hundred Horsemen, unto whom were joyntly five hundred Hungarian Horsemen, such as in time of Peace lived by Robbing, and are by an infamous name called Tarvus, Solyman approach. Whereupon he in halt called together the other Captains, with Birron the Mayor of the City, and other the chief Citizens to consult with them, What was best to be done for the defence of the City, but especially, Whether the Suburbs of the City, standing upon those three broad Causeys, were to be destroyed or not? That so the City standing in the midst of the great Marsh, might both with less labour and danger be defended. This question was seriously debated, and great reasons alleged; at last the Citizens cried out with one voice against the matter, and fied. That they would never suffer those goodly Suburbs, wherein were so many Churches and fair Buildings as might compare with the City it self, to be so shamefully destroyed, to the utter undoing of so many rich Citizens; for what could be (said they) more dishonourable or lamentable, than to the encouraging of the barbarous Enemy, to shew such a token of extreme fear; and with their own hands to burn and destroy those stately Buildings, which might by strong hand be well enough defended against the Enemy, if they did not play the shameful Cowards. Of which opinion with the Citizens was also Offaviano Serasfatti an Italian Captain; alleging that both the City and the Suburbs might both with like danger be defended; forasmuch as they were equally fortified with the benefit of the Marshes, and yet the worst should happen, the Defendants might yet safely enough retire into the City. At last standing up as one thrust forward, both with the publick hard Fortune and his own, said, Valiant Gentlemen, what shew will you give of your valour, or what honour shall you have of your service, if you shall defend so famous a City, by deforming it of your selves, and cutting off the Suburbs, as it were the Arms thereof, before the danger, upon too hasty desperation? For you shall be wishing, either in the service of the King, or the honour of your selves, except this City (if God so please) be of you whole and sound valiantly defended. Upon this Speech they all arise, the wiser fort and of greater experience giving place to the importunity of the ignorant and simple. Barocius himself full of care, and overcome with the vain opinion of the greater part, yielded also unto the fatal resolution of leaving the Suburbs. For it often falls out, that they, who wisely weighing dangers in the balance of reason, and do therefore fearfully resolve of the event of things, and do thereupon oftentimes give more hard and resolute judgment of things than Men of greater courage, yield nevertheless to be partakers of other Mens follies, yea even to most assured death, rather than by maintaining their fearful opinion, to be deemed Cowards. So fell it out with Barocius the General, who fetching a good countenance on the matter which nothing liked him, went out to the Soldiers, declaring unto them the reasons why the Suburbs were to be defended; exhorting them with like valour on their parts to answer that honourable resolution, promising to provide whatsoever should be necessary for the obtaining of the Victory; assuring them of great rewards and preferment, which should by their good service deserve the same. Hereupon the Suburbs were by the common labour of the Soldiers and the Citizens quickly fortified, the great Ordnance in places convenient orderly planted, and Watch and Ward kept by the Captains and their Companies by their turns day and night. But the Turks drawing near to the City, bent their Forces only against the Suburbs of the Gate leading towards Buda; for that they perceived the Marsh was in that place drier than the other, and the sandy Ground more unfit for the making of Bulwarks and other Fortifications for the safety of the Defendants, than in other places where the ground yielded better Turf. Barocius perceiving the Enemies purpose, drew all the Italians and Germans from the other Gates into the Suburbs of the Gate of Buda, leaving the Country-people which were fled into the City and the Citizens, in their places. At the first coming of the Turks, the Hungarian and German Horsemen, with the Italian Footmen, killed out of the Suburbs, and after certain light skirmishes retired. Which manner of fight was continued by the space of three days without any great harm done on either side; for the Captains, had warily commanded, That the Soldiers should not adventure too far. But after that Solyman himself was come and had with the multitude of his Tents beset the City far and near, to the terror of the beholders, the Christians shut up all the Gates, and fell out no more. Which thing caused the wild Hungarian Uzras (used to open skirmishes) to provide for themselves in time, and not to suffer themselves to be couped up (as they termed) within the Walls of the City; so for fashion sake, asking leave to be gone (who were not against their wills to be slain) they by night departed, being not to be entertained by the General or Citizens to stay, and by known ways escaped through the Woods from the Enemy. In the mean time the Turks were come with their winding Trenches within forth, and with their Arrows and small Shot so foured the top of the Bulwark, that no Man could there possibly appear but he was straight wounded; and such was the fury of the great Artillery; that it had in short time battered in funder the Planks and Timber which kept in the sandy Mound, whereof the Fort was made, more for the fear than for strength; in such sort, that the great Shot flying quite through all, flew and wounded many there was a far off; in which distress of the Defendants, the Turks Alapi with small danger filled up the Ditches of the Bulwark, and divers places of the Marsh with Earth and Wood, which they brought continually from a Wood thereby with six hundred Waggon, so that in the space of twelve days, they had made a firm way for them to pass over upon, both to the Bulwark and the Suburbs; a work before thought impossible to have been performed. The Ditches thus filled up, the Turks valiantly came on, seeking by plain force to enter the Bulwark. First came on the Alapi, whom as Men of least worth the Turks Captains use to thrust to the first danger; after whom followed the Horsemen, now on foot, with Swords and Targets, or else their Horsemen's Staves, covering the Janizaries, who upon their Knees with their Harquebussiers fore gauged the Defendants. This hot fight endured above three hours with equal hope and courage; but the Turks still relieved with fresh Soldiers, repulsed the Christians, and gained the uttermost Bulwark; nevertheless the Italian Fort was that day valiantly defended, the very Women and Maids helping to defend it; in this assault a tall Hungarian Woman, whose courage far exceeded the weakness of her Sex, thrusting in amongst the Soldiers upon the top of the Fort, with a great Sythe in her hand at one blow struck off two of the Turks Heads, as they were climbing up the Rampier. This assault was given the nine and twentieth of August, on which day the Turks had before taken Belgrade, and also slain King Lepus at the Battle of Mohacs; and were therefore after their superstitious manner in observation of their fortunate and unfortunate days, in good hope to have then taken the City; wherein they were much deceived, being not able at that time further to enter, but enforced again to retire. Whereupon Solyman offended, sent for Abraham, Achmet, and Hala (the chief Captains in that assault) into his Tent, and removed them thence, for that the Bulwark being so valiantly and fortunately won, they had not with more courage prosecuted the Victory, but cowardly (as he thought) given it over, being in a manner already won; and therefore with stern countenance commanded them to prepare all things ready ready within three days for a fresh Assault, and never to return unto him, except they did win the City. Whereunto the Captains answered no more (for were they never so guiltless, they might not before him stand to excuse themselves) but that they would in short time accomplish his desire. Wherefore having made all ready, and encouraged the Soldiers to this last Assault, they terribly assailed the Rampiers, and brought a great fear upon the Defendants; for taking the benefit of a thick Mist (as it oftentimes chanceth in marsh grounds) they were with great silence (contrary to their manner) got up to the top of their Rampier, and came to handily blows, before they were well discovered. The Fight was for the time fierce and terrible; but the Janizaries prevailing, at length put the Germans to flight, and after them the Italians also, so that now well was he that could run safest towards the City. But that their hasty Flight little availed, when as they were to pass out by a little narrow Gate in manner of a Wick; and they into the City, without regard of them that fled, had plucked up the Draw-Bridge over the Ditch. For naturally it cometh oftentimes to pass, that the fear of the present danger, without blushing excuse our foul dealing. So the barbarous and fierce Enemy pursuing the flying Christians at the Heels all the length of those Suburbs with most cruel execution, many notable men, some fighting, some flying, were there slain; amongst whom was Offaviano Serasfatti, Author of the evil Council whereof infused the calamity. Barocius the General flying on Horseback to the little Gate, which was not to be passed through, and crying in vain to them that fled, to have the great Gate opened, was by the coming of the Janizaries slain; whose Head and right Hand fell of rich Rings, was by the barbarous Enemy carried about in decision upon a Lance. The rest of the flying multitude finding the little Gate shut up with the Bodies of the dead, and the Bridge maliciously drawn up, desperately threw themselves into the deep Ditch; where some of them labouring to swim out, were caught by the Legs and Arms by other that could not swim, and both together drowned. Some hardly crawling over, were forth in the Head or Back with the Turks Arrows; otherwise flitting fast in the Mud, were as if it had been in sport shot to death by the Turks; some few there were which got over, and were saved.

There was yet left in the City the General of the German Horsemen, and Offavio de Cremona, an Italian Captain; these two gathering the remainder of the Soldiers which were left, placed them upon the Walls; but the Citizens were struck with such a fear, that they could not tell which way to turn themselves. For now Bircus the Mayor, with the Aldermen and other chief Citizens, seeing the slaughter of the Italians and Germans, were so overcome with despair, that they thought no hope of their well doing was to be repaid in making of any farther resistance, but only in the mercy of Solyman. Wherefore Bircus sent unto the Turks from the Wall, That he might safely send Embassadors to Solyman, to treat with him upon reasonable conditions, for the yielding up of the City; which thing Achmet easily granted. With these Embassadors for the Citizens, went also the Generals of the German Horsemen, and Carole Rufus an Italian Captain (who of all others had born himself most valiantly in all the Assaults, to the great admiration of the Turks) a treatise for the safety and liberty of the Soldiers. The Embassadors being brought before the great Baffa, requested, That yielding the City, the Citizens might enjoy their Lives and Liberty; whereunto they were so answered, as that it seemed they should not all be pardoned; yet was the general fear well diminished, for that the punishment expected, was but some few. Rufus was courteously entertained; and easily obtained, that the Italians might in safety depart with Bag and Baggage to Vienna; the like grace also had the General of the Germans for his Soldiers. Solyman the Eunuch Baffa, offered unto Rufus honourable entertainment, if he would have served Solyman; which when he refused as bound to King Ferdinand by Oath, in honour of his Valour he gave him a Ramich Cloak wrought with Flowers of Gold. The Embassadors returning into the City, and telling how they had sped, delivered the Citizens of a great fear. Shortly after the City being yielded, Achmet by open Proclamation in the Market-place, commanded the Italians and Germans to make themselves ready against the next day to depart, and to take good heed that no Hungarian went with them; he also frantically charged the Citizens to keep their Houses until the strange Soldiers were departed. At the time appointed, the Italians and Germans set forward, conducted by Homares with a Company of the Turks Horsemen, who faithfully defended them against the Tartars, running up and down the Country after the Spoil; neither was any thing taken from them but their Bags, which the German Horsemen gave a new fashion carried at their Saddle Bows; these the Turks greatly desired, delivered with the novelty of the invention, to see them throw off with a Firelock without a Match. But after the departure of Homares, they were in their travel set upon by the Hungarians, with whom they had many hot skirmishes, and had hardly escaped unspoiled, had they not been rescued by the Kings Soldiers lying in Garrison in the Castles as they passed along the Country. The few which remained, after many cruelties came at last to Vienna, more like Ghosts than Men.

Solyman entering quietly into the City, first visited the Sepulchres of the Hungarian Kings, and gave up Proclamation, That the Hungarians to Alba should fear of him no harm; for that he was not Regis, come to conquer them, but to deliver them from Solyman the Bondage of the Germans, and to restore each his again that entire Kingdom unto Stephen the right Heir of King John. But within three or four days after, he called out the chief Citizens of Alba to a Field not far off, wherein the Bodies of some condemned men were wont to be buried, as if he would have there taken an Oath of their Fidelity; whither, after they were all assembled in the best manner they could, as to some solemn Feast, the Tyrant (without regard of his Faith or Promise) caused them all to be slain. Howbeit some report, that he caused them only to be put to death which bare office in the City, at such time as they revolted from the Obedience of the Queen and the Infant King, unto Ferdinand, and had then brought in German Soldiers; and that he sent the rest into exile to Buda and Belgrade. So Solyman leaving Balibius Governor of Alba Regalis, and Adomantes sometime Governor of Belgrade, his Lieutenant General for the whole Government of that Kingdom, returned again towards Constantinople (Winner now beginning to approach) after Hademet had that Summer won Strigonia and Alba Regalis, two of the chiefest Cities of Hungary. All this while King Ferdinand had raised no Power worth the speaking of, to withstand so mighty an Enemy; only at Vienna lay seven thousand Germans and four thousand Italians, at such time as Solyman departed from Alba Regalis, which were shortly after discharged.

Winds driven first to Cajeta, and afterward to Naples, where he was by the Viceroy honourably entertained, and a Houle appointed for him richly furnished; the Neapolitans wondering at the strange Attire of the People, with the manner of their feeding, and curious plenty of all manner of sweet Perfumes; for into every Ditch they put in Orders of exceeding price, so that it was well known, that a Peacock and two Pheasants dressed after the manner of the Kings Kitchen, cost above an hundred Ducats; so that not only the Dining Chamber, when they were carved up, but all the Houle was so filled with the strange and fragrant smell, that all they that dwell near thereabouts were partakers of that unufual and delicate Perfume. From Naples he was about to have travelled by Land unto the Emperor, being then in conference with the Pope at Bavatum, (bearing to adventure the Sea, possessed by the Enemies Fleet) had not the Emperor by his Letters willed him to stay till where he was. But whilst he made his aboad at Naples, and carefully attended what Courte Barbaruffa would take, (who furnished with so great a Fleet, was departed from Nice disappointed of his purpose) he was by certain Messengers advertised of Africa, That Amida his Son was risen up against him, and possessing himself of the Kingdom, had slain his Captains, polluted his Wives, and taken the Castle of Tunee. With which news he being exceedingly troubled, determined without delay to pass over into Africa, and though late, yet as he might to remedy his domestical troubles, in hope to oppress that Rebellion in the beginning, and his Son also, before he could gather any strength to resist upon. Wherefore he with all the haste he could opened his Coffers and entertained Souldiers, the Viceroy giving leave to all such banished Men as would, to come and give their names to pass over as Souldiers into Africa; upon report whereof, such a number of Malefactors and condemned persons came flocking to Naples, that it was thought a sufficient Army might have been made of such kind of men; every one of them chusing rather to enter into Pay, and blot out the infamy of banishment, and prove the fortune of Wars, than to live wandering up and down the Woods and in danger every hour to be hanged. Of these infamous Men, one Joune Baptista Lofredus (a Man well born, but of a fierce and covetous disposition) undertook the leading; he covenuing with Muleless to have three months Pay before hand, levied a thousand, and eight hundred Men, which he presently shipped, and keeping the greatest part of their Pay to himself, passed over with the King into Africa, and landed at Guleta. But how Amida rose up against his Father, and what was the end of that bloody Rebellion, shall not be amiss briefly to rehearse. There were certain Noblemen of great Authority about Amida when Muleless departed, which at their pleasure ruled the young Prince, who easily hearkened unto their Counsel, and followed the fumes; the chief of these was one Mabometes Son of Bahamer, who in the Reign of Mabometes, Muleless his Father, was Maniphet, whom Muleless (possessed of the Kingdom) put shamefully to death by cutting off his Privities, because he had by hasty Marriage deceived him of Rishomata a Maiden of incomparable Beauty, the Daughter of Abderrah Captain of the Castle, whom he most passionately loved; for which cruel fact, Mabometes his Son had long time conceived a deadly hatred against Muleless, which he had many years dissembled, that he might as occasion served be the more cruelly revenged. Next unto him was another Mabometes firmamed Adulzee, whom Muleless was wont commonly to call his worst Servant. These two with a few others conspiring together, gave it out, that Muleless was dead at Naples, and before his death had most irreligiously (as they accounted it) revolted to the Christian Religion. With which report they perceiving Amida moved, came unto him and perswaded him quickly to enter into his Fathers Seat, lest Mabometes his younger Brother (then lying in hostage with the Christians at Guleta) should by the favour and help of Touarres, whose Garrison was ever ready, be preferred before him. For Mabometes was eighteen years old, resembling his Grandfather in Name, Favour, and Disposition, and therefore of the Citizens of Tunee best beloved. Wherefore Amida came in post haste out of the Camp to Tunee, to lay first hands upon his Fathers Kingdom. The People which as yet had heard nothing of the Kings death, received him with doubtful countenance; and as many stood marvelling that he was so rashly come into the City without his Fathers commandment, Mabometes (appointed by Muleless to govern the City) came out and sharply reproved him as guilty of high Treason, perswading him to return again into the Camp; and seeing him fly by force of multitude thrust him out of the City. Amida deceived of his expectation, got him out of Tunee the way into the pleasant Country of Martia of Tunee. Between Utica and the ruins of old Carthage. But Mabometes Governor of the City, after he had repulsed Amida, got him with all speed by Water to Touarres at Guleta, to know of him more assuredly, if any false News were brought from Sidon of the death of the King; and to complain of the rashness and intollerable presumption of Amida. Where staying some what long in discoursing with the Captain, and afterwards returning to the City, he was suspected to have practised with the Captain to make Mabometes (the Pledge in Guleta) King in his Fathers stead; for so the common voice went. The Moors are by nature a faithless People, hasty, suspicious, desirous of News, which true or false, they for the time interpret as fervent best their Factions, whereunto they are exceedingly given. So at the first there rose in the City a doubtful rumor of the making of a new King; the suspicion whereof more and more increasing, set all the City on an uprose. By occasion whereof, certain of the Citizens, to whom the very name of Muleless was odious, secretly certified Amida (then in the Gardens of Carthage fighting and grieving at his hard Fortune) how all stood, and that now was the time to do himself good. He revived with that unexpected News, and encouraged by the persuasion of Bahamer and Adulzee, and other his Followers; resolved to take hold upon that good offer of Fortune, which would not always frown, and to follow his good hap. So in haste returning to Tunee, and entering in at the Gate, which he then found open, ran presently to the Governors Houle, and finding him not at home, cruelly flew all his Household, and with his bloody company went presently to the Castle; where Feres the Captain seeking to have kept him out, and boldly laid hands upon his Horses Bridle to have thrust him back, was by a desperate Ethiopian, one of Amida his Followers, thrust through with a Sword and slain; over whose Body yet sprawling, Amida forcing his Horse, brake into the Castle with his Friends, and finding Mabometes Governor of the City, presently flew him also. And so by this means Amida in the space of an hour (a little before, a man in despair) obtained the City, the Castle, and the Kingdom together. After that, he murdered his younger Brethren, and embred with blood, without shame polluted his Fathers Concubines. Muleless landed as he had said) at Guleta, with such Forces as he had brought with him out of Italy; was received by Touarres the Spaniard, not to adventure with such an handful of Men to go to Tunee, before he were well assured of the good disposition of the Citizens towards him; and was the more earnest with Lofredus not to go, because the Viceroy had expressly written, That he should in no case go any further than Guleta, except the King according to his promise had a good strength of the Numidians to join with him. But certain of the Noblemen amongst the Moors, which under the colour of Friendship were fled out of the City, and had after the folemn manner of their Nation put their Swords unto their Throats, and sworn to be faithful unto him, wonderfully prick forward both the King and Lofredus (too hasty of themselves to their own Destiny) bearing them in hand, That Amida upon the first sight of his Father would forsake the City, and betake himself to flight. So without more staying, Muleless with Ensign displaced set forward towards Tunee, Lofredus cheerfully following him; Touarres requesting them in vain to beware of the Moors Treachery. Muleless marching till forward, was come to nigh the City; that they might from the Walls descry him; when suddenly a strong Troop of Moors fell out of the Gate with a terrible Cry, and fiercely assailed him; whom the King's Horsemen valiantly received, many falling on both sides. Adulzee in this hot skirmish fighting courageously against his Enemies, was wounded in the Face, and bled exceedingly; which so discouraged them about him, that they doubting of his life, turned their Backs and fled; when presently a wonderful number of Horsemen, had before Lofredus and his Souldiers round; upon whom the Italians discharged certain Field-Pieces; but after they had once discharged them, they had no leisure to charge them again; for the barbarous Enemy came on so thick and so fast, that the Italians seeing themselves too weak, and compassed in round, let fall their Weapons as Men discouraged, and cast themselves into the Lake, for by swimming and taking hold of the little Boats, to save themselves from the Enemies Sword; which Boats stood those distressed Men in great stead; for being furnished with small Pieces, they did beat back the Moors, who eagerly pursued them even unto the Lake with their Horses. Lofredus as a Man amazed with the sudden coming of the Enemy, took the Lake with his Horse, and was there unhurt by the Enemy and slain, as were divers with him. Some few there were that fought courageously, chusing rather honourably to die in the midst of their Enemies, than shamefully to be fringed in the sinking Lake. Muleless soiled with his own Blood and with the Dust, flying amongst the rest, was known and taken; nothing more bewraying than his odoriferous Perfumes. In this conflict a thousand three hundred Italians were lost; the rest which escaped, Touarres relieved, and shortly after shipped them over into Sicily, from whence as we travelled home to Naples, but so poor as we showed the misery of their Fortune. Amida having thus obtained the Victory, was more careful of nothing than to make his Father unfit for Government, which he did by the cutting the right of both his Eyes with a hot Penknife; the like Cruelty he used upon Nabazar and Abdalla his Bro-theren, then taken with his Father. After that, he certified Touarres Captain of Guleta, That he had taken a few Youths Prisoners, which he would deliver unto him; and that he had bereft his Father of his sight, who had deserved a worse punishment, as he that had long before done the like to his Brethren; but had yet left him the life, as an example to other Tyrants, and to shew that he dealt not altogether unmercifully with so perfidious a Father; left off all he continued (upon certain conditions) the same League which his Father had with him; which he well saw was to great purpose, especially in the newness of his Kingdom. Neither did Touarres refuse the same as standing with his present profit; for upon this agreement, Amida was to give him certain Money to pay his Souldiers, and to deliver him the Prisoners he had taken, with the Ensigns and Body of Lofredus. For more assurance whereof he gave Sebites his Son, then nine years old, in Hostage; yet upon condition, that if an assured Peace could not be agreed upon, but that they must needs enter into War, then Touarres should forthwith restore him his Son Sebites in safety. These Capitulations, although they seemed not unreasonable, and were of them well liked; yet Touarres thought it not altogether agreeing with the honour of the Emperor, that he should enjoy the Kingdom, who by most horrible Treason and detestable Villany had thrust himself thereinto without the Emperors leave. Wherefore he entered into a new device to call in the rightful Heir, who might at the Emperors pleasure (offended with the injury done by Amida) reign in Tunee.

There was an exile amongst the Numidians one Abdamelech, ever since the time that Refestes fled to Barbaruffa. Him because he was Muleless affe natural Brother, Touarres sent for, putting him in hope of the Kingdom, supported by Abdamelech a great Prince amongst the Numidians, who had all that long time courteously entertained him. Neither was Abdamelech slow to accept the occasion presented, especially encouraged thereunto by the Numidian Prince his good Friend, and the predictions of the Astrologers, who had foretold him, That he should die King of Tunee. Which vain kind of Divination having in it no manner of assurance, yet caught great minds oftentimes to undertake great attempts beyond reason, which falling out with more hap than they were with reason foretold, giveth some credit to that Vanity, and causeth those cold Prophets to be of some accounted as great Wizards. And to work this feat, such a time was offered, as a better could not be wished; for Amida having set all things in order as he pleased in the City, and casting no peril, was gone to Bahamer, to take order for his Customs, which was then great upon Fishing. Wherefore Touarres to keep his promise, sent back Sebites, Amida's Son, in a Boat to Tunee, and received Abdamelech, who travelling most part by night, was secretly come to Guleta, and there reitting himself and his Horses a few hours, to prevent the fame of his coming, posted in haste with a Troop of his Numidian Followers to Tunee, and passing through the City, went directly to the Castle, which he entered without resistance of the Wardens, supposing him to have been Amida come from Bahamer; for Abdamelech had after the manner of the Jews to have kept him from the Sun and the Dust, and by that happy light got into the Castle before it was known who he was. The Wardens perceiving their error, began as Men amazed now too late to betake themselves to their Weapons, for of the greatest Prince on Earth) if they would pay the whole charges of the Army, he would confederate to their request; or if they would not thereunto consent, that for recompence, all they within the Castle should continue his Slaves and Prisoners; notwithstanding if they incontinently and without delay did surrender the place, he would exempt out of them two hundred. Whereupon the Messengers returning in despair, were slain by Dragut and Salla Rais, with flattering words and fair promises, that they would do much as lay in them, to persuade the Baffa, to confederate to a more gracious composition; fearing indeed that the besieged through despair would resolve (as their extreme refuge) to defend the place even to the very last Man. Wherefore they went presently to the Baffa, to declare unto him his oversight in refusing them who voluntarily would have put themselves into his hands, whom reason would he should with all courtesie have received; for that after he had the Castle and the Men in his power, he might dispose of them as he should think good. The Baffa liking well of his counsel, caused the Messengers to be called again, and with fained and dissembling words told them, That at the instance of Dragut and Salla Rais there present, he did discharge them of all the costs and charges of the Army, swearing unto them (the better to deceive them) by the Head of his Lord and his own, inviolably to observe all that he had promised unto them; which they too easily believed, and forthwith went to declare the same to the Governour, and others within the Castle. The Baffa, the better to come to the effect of his desire, after these Messengers sent a crafty Turk, whom he charged expressly to persuade the Governour to come with him into the Camp, for the full conclusion of the giving up of the Castle, and for the appointing of such Vessels, as should be needful for their safe conduct to Malta; and that if he made any doubt to come, he should make shew as if he would there remain in Hostage for him; but above all things, to consider of the strength and assurance of the besieged, and of the disposition of all things there. Which the subtil Turk so finely handled, that the Governour by the counsel of those who had perswaded him to yield (notwithstanding the reasons of Wars and Duty by his Office forbid him in such manner to abandon the place of his charge) resolved upon, so small an assurance of the Baffa, and gave ear to the miserable end of his Fortune. So taking with him a Knight of his Household (to send back unto those of the Castle, to declare unto them how he sped in the Camp) under the conduct of the Turk that was come to fetch him, he went straight to the Tent of the Baffa; who by the Turk that went first in, was advertised of the small courage of the Defendants, which he assured him to be no better, but that if he thought it good, he might bring them to such order and agreement as he would himself. Upon whose perswasion calling in the Governour Valier, after he had rigorously reproved his rashness, said unto him, That forthwith as he had once given his word, if he would pay the charges of the Army, he was content to let them go with Bag and Baggage, otherwise he would discharge but two hundred. Whereat the Governour greatly moved, answered, That that was not according to his last promise unto the Knights before sent. But when he saw it would be no better, he requested him that he might again return to the Castle to know the minds of the rest; which the said Baffa would by no means grant, but only permitted him to send back the Knight that he had brought with him, to make report of these hard News to the besieged; as for the Governour, he was sent to the Gallies with Irons on his Heels. When they of the Castle understood what had passed betwixt the Baffa and the Governour, they began exceedingly to fear the mischief then at hand; yet took no other resolution, but to return the said Knight to the Baffa, to know whether they should expect from him no better answer. Who as soon as he was come before him, the Captain of the Castle was brought in, of whom the Baffa asked, Which of the two he would chuse, either to pay the expenses of his Army, or else both he and all the rest to remain his Prisoners? Whereunto the Governour answered, That a Slave had no other authority than that which by his Master was given him; and that having lost (besides his liberty) the power to command, if any thing were yet reserved in him, could not counsel him to command others to agree unto any thing, but that which was concluded with them which were before sent. Which thing the Baffa hearing, for fear that such a resolute answer should come to the knowledge of the besieged, and cause them to become desperate; having taken counsel with his other Captains, he took the Governour by the Hand, and with a smiling and dissembling Countenance told him, That he would without any doubt let them depart as he had promised; and that therefore without troubling any thing, he should cause them all to come out of the Castle. But the Governour, because he had been before deceived, would not trust to his word, but said unto him, That he might command him that was come from the Castle, for that he knew they would now do never a whit the more for him. So the Baffa turning towards the other Knight, commanded him forthwith to go unto them in the Castle, and to cause them to come forth, swearing again as before, by the Head of his great Lord, and his own, That they should all be delivered at last at liberty, according to the conventions first agreed upon. Which the Knight believing, went to report to them this good news; which they received with such joy, that without further care or consideration of their mishap to fear, they ran in haste with their Wives, Children, and best Moveables, striving who should first get out. But they were no sooner issued, but they were by the Enemies spoiled of all they had, and taken Prisoners: part of the Knights were sent to the Gallies, and the rest to the Baffa. Who being by the Governour put in remembrance of his Faith twice given, answered, That there was no Faith to be kept with Dogs, and that they had first violated their Oath with his great Lord, unto whom at the giving over of the Rhodes, they had (as he said) sworn never more to bear Arms against the Turks. The Castle was forthwith taken and spoiled, and about two hundred Moors, cut of that Country that had served the Knights, cut in pieces, and thereupon, a great Peal of Ordnance discharged, with great cries and shouts in sign of their Victory. Thus the strong Castle and ancient City of Tripoli in Barbary was delivered unto the Turks the fifteenth day of August, in the year 1551. Whilst the Baffa lay at this Siege, the Lord of Astracan, who had many years been Ambassador from France to the French King at Constantinople, and was now sent again by Henry the Second, came to the Turks Camp, being requested so to do by the great Master of the Rhodes, to have disswaded the Baffa from that Siege; wherein he nothing prevailed. Yet now grieved to see how the faithless Turk, contrary to his Oath, most villainously treated the

Governour and the other Knights, lying at his feet as Men half desperate; was so bold as to put him in mind of his promise, confirmed by his Oath; which if he would not keep, that were at the least according to his own voluntary offer, he would release two hundred of them; but he excused himself as before, saying, That no Faith was to be kept with Dogs, which had first broken their own Faith. Yet afterwards he contended, that two hundred of the eldest and such as were most unfit for service (amongst whom was comprehended the Governour and certain other old Knights) should be set at liberty; who were forthwith sent aboard the French Embassadors Gallies, and by him transported to Malta; where they were but hardly welcome, for that they had so cowardly surrendered a place, which they might much longer have defended. The next day after the Castle was delivered, which was the sixteenth of August, the proud Baffa for joy of this Victory made a solemn Dinner, whereunto he invited the French Embassadors, and Valier the late Governour; which they refused not to come unto, in hope to recover some more Prisoners. This great Feast for the more Magnificence was kept in the Castle-Ditch against the Breach, where were set up two itately Pavilions, the one for the Baffa, and the other for the Embassador and his Company, where he was honourably Feasted with wonderful plenty both of Flesh and Fish and good Wines, all which he had found in the Castle; which service was done with Musick of divers sorts, and Officers in number above a hundred, apparelled for most part in long Gowns of fine Cloth of Gold, Tufted or Fringed; and the other of Velvet or Damask. The Baffa was no sooner fed down, but all the Ordnance of the Fleet were discharged with such a noise and thundering, that it seemed the Heavens and Skies did shake. The Table being set up, the Embassadors and the late Governour Valier entered into the Pavillion of the Baffa, and beside the two hundred Men which he had promised, obtained twenty more, upon the Embassadors promise, That he should for them cause to be released thirty Turks taken at Malta, at the landing of the Army there. The Turks having in their hands an ancient Gunner of the Castle, called John de Chabas born in Danmark (so the end that this triumphant Feast should not be unperfected of some cruel sacrifice of the Christian Blood) for that he had in time of the Siege shott off the Hand of the Clerk General of the Army, brought him into the Tower, and when they had cut off his Hands and his Nose, put him quick into the Ground to the Waist, and there for their pleasure shot at him with their Arrows, and afterward to make an end of him cut his Throat. The Baffa shortly after departing out of Barbary, left Dragut the Governour of Tripoli, honouring him with the Title of the Sanzack of that place; from whence he many years grievously molested the Moors near unto him by Land, and the Christians by Sea. The same year 1551. Solyman notwithstanding the five years Peace before sent with King Ferdinand at his going into Persia, sent Achemates, his Lieutenant in Europe with a great power into Hungary, who with Hala the Baffa of Buda invaded the upper part of Hungary, and first took the City of Temeswar; and contrary to their Faith given, slew the Garrison and Soldiers; after that, they took also the Castle of Zolmek, forsaken by the Christians, and certain other small Castles. But laying Siege to Essem, they were partly by the valiancy of the Defendants, and partly by the coming of of

Winter enforced to forfake the Siege, and to get themselves into their Wintering places. Queen Isabel, King Fohn his Widow, seeing the Turks daily encroaching upon that little they had left her, and that she was not able by any means to defend Transylvania against them, by the advice of George, Bishop of Veradum, her old Counsellor, agreed with King Ferdinand to deliver unto him the Government of the Country, with all the Royal Dignity of Hungary, for which she was to have of him Cassovia, and a yearly Pension of an hundred thousand Ducats. Which agreement made and thoroughly concluded by Baptista Casplani an Italian (whom Charles the Emperor had but a little before sent to aid King Ferdinand) the Queen returned into Polenia, her native Country; and to King Ferdinand by that means obtained almost all the Province of Transylvania, and what else the Queen had in Hungary. But the Bishop a little before made a Cardinal, being suspected by Baptista the Italian, that he favoured the Turkish Faction more than King Ferdinand, and by that means sought to get the Government to himself, was by the Italians device suddenly murdered in his own House at Veradum; an end good enough for a troublesome a Prelate. Hala the Baffa of Buda proud of his good success he had the year before, understanding that divers of the chief Hungarians had withdrawn themselves into the Castle of Agria, purposed in himself with all his power to besiege it, and there to take them. So aided by Achemates, Chafas, and other of the Turks Sanzacks and Captains by Solyman appointment ready at his call, he came with an Army of thirty thousand Turks, and the tenth of September in the year 1552, encamped round about the Castle; where after he had placed his Artillery, he began a most furious Battery. But doubting to prevail that way, he attempted also to undermine the Castle, omitting nothing that could be devised for the taking thereof; but all in vain, for the Hungarians by the good direction of Stephanus Dobos their Captain, courageously endured the Siege and very manfully repulsed the Enemy. At length, the twenty ninth of September the Enemy with twenty eight Esquifs of select Soldiers gave a fresh assault to the Castle, and were by the Defendants enforced shamefully to retire; at which time four and twenty Barrels of Gunpowder by mischance caught Fire, and besides that it blew up divers Captains and Soldiers, did much harm in the Castle, to the great dismay of the Defendants. After that, the Turks with incredible pertinacity the twelfth of October fiercely assaulted the Castle from morning until night, and for desire of revenge and hope of spoil left nothing unattempted for the gaining of the place; but were by the greater valour of the Hungarians beaten back, and with great loss enforced at last to give over the assault. Thus the Baffa nothing prevailing by force, attempted by great promises and large offers to have brought them out; which he understanding to be nothing regarded, and his Letters scornfully burnt, brought on his Soldiers again, and gave unto them in the Castle a most furious assault, but with no better success than before; for having lost many of his best Soldiers, he was enforced to retire. So after he had in vain six weeks besieged the Castle, he was glad to raise his Siege, and to retire to Pessin. After which departure there were found twelve thousand great shot, whereas he had battered the Wall. In this Siege six thousand Turks were slain, and of the Hungarians but three hundred. King Ferdinand glad of this

Victory,

Victory, made Stephanus the worthy Captain, Vayvod of Transylvania, and bountifully rewarded the other Captains and Souldiers as they had well deserved.

Henry the French King, who together with his Kingdom had (as it seemed) received the hereditary Quarrels of France his Father against Charles the Emperor, had by his Embassador the Lord of Ararant to wrougth the matter with Solymán, that the more to trouble the Emperor, he sent a great Fleet into the Tyrrhenum or Tufcan Sea, which in the year 1553, and the year following, did great harm upon the Coasts of Calabria, Sicilia, Sardinia, as also in the Islands of Elba, Corfica, Cerde, and Mallorca, and such like places on the Frontiers of the Emperors Dominions; yet were the Turks in most places notably again repulsed by the people of those Countries. The same year Solymán, seduced by Roxelana (sometime his fair Concubine, but then his imperious Wife) and Ruffan Bassa his Son in Law, most unaccountably murdered his eldest Son Mulapha, the mirror of the Ottoman Family; Which tragical Fact (the like whereof both for the treacherous contriving and inhuman execution hath seldom times been heard of) I have thought good here in due time to set down, in such sort as it is by most credible Writers of that time reported.

Solymán after the manner of the Ottoman Kings (who to avoid the participation of their Sovereignty, use not oftentimes to Marry, but otherwise to satisfy their desire with such beautiful Concubines as is pleased them to make choice of out of the fairest Captives of all Nations, most daintily brought up for that purpose in the Court) had by a Circassian Bondswoman a Son called Mulapha, who for his wonderful towardsness and rare perfection, was amongst the Turks had in such expectation and admiration, as that they in nothing accounted themselves more happy, than in the hope laid up in him; whose noble carriage was such, as thereby he so possessed the minds of all Men in general, (but especially of the Men of War) that he was reputed the glory of the Court, the flower of Chivalry, the hope of the Souldiers, and joy of the People. Whilst he thus grew, encreasing both in years and favour, it fortuned with Solymán as it doth with Men delighted in change, that he became amorous of Roxelana, of some called Rofa (but more truly Hazrat) by condition a Captive, but who graced with beauty and courtly behaviour, that in short time she became Mistress of his thoughts, and Commandress of him that all commanded; and that which more established her in possession of his love, she had in time made him Father of four fair Sons, Mahomet, Solymán, Bajazet, and Tschanger, and one Daughter called Chamaria Married to Ruffan or Ruffenes the great Bassa. In this height of worldly Bliss nothing troubled her more than the exceeding credit of Mulapha, Solymán eldest Son by the Circassian Woman; who honoured of the greatest, and beloved of the rest, stood only in her light, impairing her and hers (as she thought) of the hope of the Empire, which he now above all things fought to bring to one of her own Sons; which the better to compass, the under the colour of great good will and love, procured that Mulapha the young Prince and his Mother should as it were for their greater honour and fame, with a Princely allowance be sent into Garamania to govern that great Country, far from the Court. Which was no great matter for her to bring to pass; for that the Turkish Emperors usually send for Sons after they come to any years of discretion; unto such Provinces as are far from the Court, attended upon with one great Bassa and some grave Doctor of their Law, to acquaint them with the manner of Government; the Bassa instructing them in matters of civil Policy, and the Doctor in matters concerning their superstition; and yet by sending them afar off, to keep them from aspiring to the Empire by the favour of the Court; (a thing of the Turkish Emperors not unworthily feared even in their own and beloved Children.) Roxelana having at this once thus cunningly rid the Court of the great Competitors both of her Love and the Empire (things of all others enduring no Partners) rested not so, but began straightway to plot in her malicious Head the utter destruction of him, to whom all others wished all happiness. This she saw was not to be brought to pass without some Complices; wherefore after she had in her secret conceit discarded many, of whom at first she had reasonable good liking; at last she made choice of Ruffan Bassa her Son in Law, upon whom she would fix up her rest. This Ruffan was a Man basely Born in Epirus, altogether composed of dissimulation and flattery, ever serving his own turn, were it never so much to the hurt or grievance of others; by which means he, although none of the best Souldiers, was yet by many degrees grown up to be the greatest Man in the Court, and Solymán Son in Law; him she probably thought to win the succession of the Empire to one of her own Sons, his Wives full Brethren, rather than to Mulapha her half Brother. Beside that, she was not ignorant how that Ruffan as one careful of the Emperors profit (the readiest way to preferment) had abridged the Pensions and Fees of the Officers and Servitors in Court; which he perceiving to please the Emperor, proceeded to far therein, that he attempted to have cut off, if it had been possible, some part of Mulapha his princely allowance; for which doing she knew how odious he was to all the Courtiers (whereof he made small reckoning) but especially to Mulapha, inasmuch that it was thought he would not forget so notorious an injury, if ever he should obtain the Empire. Hereupon the brave with Ruffan upon the matter, whom she found ready enough of himself to do what in him lay to further her mischievous desire.

To begin this intended Tragedy, she upon the suddain became very devout, and being by the favour of Solymán grown exceedingly rich, pretended as if it had been upon a devout Zeal for the health of her Soul, after the manner of their Turkish Superstition, to build an Abbey, with an Hospital and a Church; which to godly a purpose she imparted to the Mufti or chief Mahometan Priest, demanding of him, if such works of Charity were not acceptable to God, and available for her Souls Health. Whereunto the Mufti answered, That those works were no doubt gracious in the sight of God, but nothing at all meritorious for her Souls Health, being a Bondswoman; yet very profitable for the Soul of the great Emperor Solymán, unto whom as unto her Lord, both she and all she had appertained. With which answer of the great Priest she seemed to be exceedingly troubled, and thereupon became wonderful penitent, and Melancholy; her cheerful countenance was replete with Sighs, and her fair Eyes flowed with Tears, her mirth was mourning, and her joy heaviness. Which thing Solymán perceiving, and sorry to see his love upon conceit so to languish, sent her word to be of good cheer, and to comfort her self; promising in short time to take such a course as should ease her of all her grief; which he forthwith did, solemnly manumitting her from her bond Estate. So great a favour obtained, Roxelana with so great cheerfulness began those meritorious works by her before intended, as if she had thought of nothing but Heaven, whereas indeed her thoughts were in the depth of Hell. When she had thus a good while busied her self in paying the way to Heaven, as was supposed; Solymán not able longer to bear the company of her, in whom his Soul lived, after his wonted manner sent for her by one of his Eunuchs, who should have brought her to his Bed-Chamber. To whom she with her Eyes cast up to Heaven, demurely answered, That her life and whatsoever else she had was at her dread Sovereigns command, but again to yield her Body unto his Appetite might not in any case do, without the great offence of the High God, and manifest Breach of his sacred Laws, which nevertheless he not now voluntarily to yield him that, being free, which he before without offence might command of his Bondswoman; and because she would not seem to use this as an excuse, she referred her self all in things to the grave judgment of the learned and reverend Mufti, with whom she had before at full conferred. This she did, presuming of the Sovereignty she had over that great March, whom she might well know she had so fast bound in the pleasing Fetters of his affection towards her, as that she was sure enough of him without a Keeper. Solymán ravished with her love, and well the more for her demerit; sent for the Mufti, requiring his judgment in the matter; who before intruded in all points, agreed with that Roxelana had said, aggravating the heinousness of the Fact, if he should give assent to subvert her of a Slave, who being now free, he might not lawfully so without great offence touch unmarried. Whereupon Solymán more and more burning in his desires, became a fresh Suter to her for Marriage, whom he had to often before commanded; which his Sute easily obtained, (as the Mark she had all this while aimed at) he with all speed to the great admiration of all Men, and contrary to the manner of the Mahometan Emperors, solemnly Married her, appointing for her yearly Dowry five thousand Sultanyne.

This Woman of late a Slave, but now become the greatest Empress of the East, flowing in all worldly Felicity, attended upon with all the pleasures her Heart could desire, wanting nothing she could wish, but how to find means that the Turkish Empire might after the death of Solymán be brought to some end of her own Sons. This was it that had (as it before said) long troubled her aspiring mind, and in the midst of all her Bliss, suffered her yet to take no rest. Noble Mulapha, Solymán eldest Son, and Her apparent of the Empire; although far absent, was yet still before her Eyes present; his credit, his valour, his virtues, his perfections were all bars to her desires; he was the only Cloud that kept the Sun from shining on her; if he by any means might be taken away, then wanted no part of the desired. Which to bring to pass, the wicked Woman laboured cunningly, by little and little to breed in Solymán Head no small suspicion of Mulapha, That he being a young Man of a haughty Spirit, desirous of Sovereignty, generally beloved, and dwelling with the immoderate favour of the Men of War, which were all at his devotion, led nothing else to be expected from him, but when he should (as did his Grandfather and Solymán) lay hand upon the Empire, and work his aged Fathers destruction. This mischievous Plot by her devised, was not a little furthered by Ruffan the great Bassa, by whom passed all great matters; who nothing omitted, that could be fitly devised for the disgrace or confusion of the young Prince. For he as a great secret, craftily told all them that were sent Governors into Siria, that Mulapha was secretly suspected by his Father, of aspiring to the Empire, and therefore charged them particularly, carefully to observe all his actions, with the manner of his Life and Government; and by their Letters diligently to advertise him of whatever they should see or hear; bearing them in hand, that the more suspiciously or oddly they should write of him, the more gracious and acceptable it would be unto the great Sultan. Wherefore he by these Men oftentimes certified of the princely disposition, courage, widom, valour and bounty of Mulapha, whereby he had won all Mens Hearts; he doubted that he would at length be preferred to the Empire, yet durst he not for all that adventure to temper with Solymán about that detestable conspiracy against the innocent Prince, but still delivering the Letters to the malicious Woman, left the rest by her ungracious head to be wrought. And the still as occasion best served her purpose, ceased not with pleasing allurements and flattery (wherein she was most excellent) to infect Solymán mind, that whensoever he should chance to have any speech of Mulapha, she might take the fitter occasion to bring forth those Letters. Neither was she in her drift deceived, but having found a fit opportunity, with Tears trickling down her Cheeks (which to serve their turns subtil Women seldom want) she told the Emperor in what danger he stood; recounting amongst other things, how Solymán his Father had by such means deprived Bajazet his Grandfather both of his Life and Empire together; and therefore, most instantly besought him, as if it had altogether proceeded from a parental love, by that example warned to look to himself. But the slight arguments of suspicion seemed as they were indeed, unto Solymán scarce probable; for that the little prevailed thereby. Which thing the well perceiving, and inwardly grieved thereat, converted her cruel mind to other mischievous devices, and fought by all means how to poison the young Prince; neither wavered she therein, as it were vowed to kill all kind of mischief and villany, ready to have performed what she desired, had not Gods providence withstood so horrible a practice. For whereas certain rich Apparel was by her sent unto him in his Fathers name, he fearing the worst, would not touch it before he had caused curious variances (as it was thought) by which that time prevented the Treason of his wicked Stepdame, and made her malicious practice manifest to the World. Yet defied she the not so, but was still plotting new devices, tending all to one purpose; for being grown to that height of honour and power as never was Woman in the Ottoman Court, and by the means of Tromilla a Jew (as it was thought) having bewitched the mind of the Turkish Emperor, the fill grew more and more in favour, and obtained that her Sons might by turns be still present in Court; of purpose, that by their daily presence and continual flattery, they should more and more procure their Fathers love; and if by chance Mulapha should come thither, the might have the better means to dispatch him; if not, to expect some other fit time, when the might by some one or other mean take him away. But Mulapha never coming (for why, the Emperors Sons ule not without their Fathers leave to go out of the Provinces assigned unto them, or to come to Constantinople, but after the death of their Father to receive the Empire, attended upon with a number of Soldiers) the easily deviled another practice, that her Sons should visit upon their Father, not in the City only, but in the Provinces also; for that Tschanger, surnamed Crookback, always followed his Father in the Camp. Certain years thus spent, and the still hammering her mischievous devices; at length Fortune favouring her wicked desire, got from the Bassa which had the Government of Mulapha and the Province of Amasia (as we have said, every one of the Kings Sons hath with him one Bassa, which is as it were his Lieutenant in administration of Justice and Martial Affairs) certain suspicious Letters, wherein was contained, that there was a Speech of a Marriage to be made between Mulapha and the Persian Kings Daughters; which thing he thought good to give knowledge of to the Council, that if any harm should ensue thereof, he might be out of all suspicion. Those Letters being brought to Ruffan, he thought he had now as good as half brought to pass the long desired ruin of Mulapha; so making no stay, he opened the matter to Roxelana, and afterwards both together went to the Court, and declared all the matter to the Emperor; in doing whereof, they forced both their ungracious wits to fill his head, yet doubtful, with suspicion, and to possess his mind with the fear of his own most dutiful Son; saying, That he as a proud and ambitious young Man, ravished with the desire of to govern an Empire, fought against the Laws both of God and Nature, to take his Father out of the way, that so he might with more speed satisfy his aspiring mind. And to give the more credit to this their most false suggestion, they warned him of the alliance by him purposed with the Persian King the ancient Enemy of the Ottoman Emperors; wishing him to beware lest Mulapha supported by the strength of Perfia, and the favour of the Sanzacks and Janizaries, whose love he had by bounties purchased, should in short time when he feared least, together deprive him both of his Life and Empire. With these and such like accusations they so prevailed with the aged Man, whom they never suffered to rest in quiet, that he at length resolved to work his falsity (as he supposed) by the death of his own Son, in this sort:

In the year 1552 he caused proclamation to be made almost in all the Provinces of his Kingdoms, That forasmuch as the Persians without resistance with a great Army invaded Syria, burning and destroying the Country before them, he to repress their outrageous insolency, was enforced to send thither Ruffan Bassa with an Army; which according to his appointment was in short time raised. Now when all things were in readiness, as if it had been for such a War as was pretended, he commanded Ruffan, with as much secrecy and subtle tumult as was possible, to lay hands upon Mulapha, and to bring him bound to Constantinople; which if he could not conveniently effect, then by any other means so take him out of the way.

With this wicked and cruel charge Ruffan with a strong Army marched towards Syria. Mulapha understanding of his coming, without delay with seven thousand of the best Horsemen in all Turkey made towards Syria also; whereof Ruffan hearing, and perceiving that he could not (as he desired) conveniently execute the cruel command of the unnatural Father, forthwith turned his back, and treading the same steps he came, returned with his Army to Constantinople with such speed, that he endured not to behold the very Dust raised by Mulapha's Horsemen, much less his presence; giving it out, That he certainly understood that the Province was in quiet, (as indeed it was) and that he thereupon returned. But unto Solyman he told another Tale in secret, which he maliciously had devised, That he by most apparent signs and manifest presumptions had perceived the whole Army to incline towards Mulapha, that if he should have attempted any thing against him by plain force, he should have been utterly forsaken, and had therefore in so dangerous a case left the matter as it was his grave further direction. This Tale suspiciously told, raised in the wicked Emperor's Father (nothing degenerating from the natural cruelty of his Ancestors) a new and great suspicion, whereof to disburden his disquieted mind, he conceived with himself a most horrible device. Wherefore the year following, which was the year 1553, he raised a great Army; giving it out, That the Persians had with greater power than before invaded Syria, and that therefore he for the love of his Country, and defence of his Empire, was determined to go thither with his Army, and in person himself to repress the attempts of his Enemies. Wherefore the Army being assembled, and all things necessary orderly provided, he commanded to rest forward, and in few days after followed himself; who coming at length into Syria, presently by trusty Messengers commanded Mulapha to come unto him his camp, for there he should be expected. And yet for all these shadows, the matter was not so cloaked by Solyman conveyed (although he was exceeding careful thereof) but that his mortal and deadly hatred against his Son was perceived by the Bassas and other great Men about him; inasmuch that Aschmat Bassa by a secret and trusty Messenger gave him warning thereof, that so he might in time the better provide for the safeguard of his life. Neither could Mulapha himself but marvel, that his aged Father without any apparent reason should come so far with so great an Army; yet trusting to his own innocence, though wonderfully troubled and perplexed in mind, he resolved (although it were with the extremest danger of his life) to obey and yield to his Fathers command; for he thought it more commendable and honourable to incur the danger of death, than living to fall into the cruel suspicion of disloyalty. In so great a perplexity of mind, after he had with himself much discomfited road and fro, what course he were left to take, at length he boldly and resolutely asked the Doctor, whom (as we have before said) he had always with him in his Court, Whether the Empire of the World, or a blessed Life were of Man more to be desired. To whom the Doctor frankly answered, That the Empire of the World, to him that would enter into the due consideration thereof, brought with it no felicity more than a vain desire and outward appearance of good, nothing being more frail or uncertain than worldly Honour, bringing with it fear, vexation of mind, tribulation, suspicion, murder, wickedness, spoil, ruin, and captivity, with infinite mischiefs of like nature, not to be desired, of him that would attain to true felicity; by which means the blessed Life was to be left and not gained; But they that unto whom God hath given the Grace rightly to consider and weigh his felicity and blessedness of this outward Estate (as the common sort deemeth to be the only life) and to strive against the Vanities of this World, and to embrace and follow an upright kind of life, had undoubtedly a place assigned for them in Heaven, and prepared by the great God, where they should at length enjoy life and bliss eternal. This answer of the great Doctor wonderfully satisfied the troubled mind of the young Prince, foreseeing as it were the approach of his own end; and to laying not any longer discourages, forthwith forwards towards his Father, and making great haste came at length to his Fathers Camp, and not far off pitched his Tents in the open Field. But this his haste coming the more increased the suspicion in the mind of his wicked Father; neither spared Ruffan in the mean time with his crafty and subtil devices to augment the fame; for by a sign given he caused the Janizaries and chief Men in the Army to go as if it had been for Honour sake to meet Mulapha; which they all without delay presently did at his command, and so all together set forward. In the mean time he the most crafty Varler, with troubled countenance (for he could notably dissemble) as a Man half dismayed came in haste unto Solyman's Pavilion, and fully told him, That the Janizaries and almost all the best Soldiers of the Army were of themselves without leave gone to meet Mulapha, and that he feared what would ensue thereof. Which news so troubled the old Tyrant, that he became pale for fear, and going out of his Tent, and finding them gone, easily believed all to be true that the false Bassa had told him. Neither wanted Mulapha strange warning of his end: for near at hand for the third day before his setting forth was toward his Father, falling asleep in the Evening, he thought he saw his Prophet Mahomet in bright Apparell to take him by the hand and lead him into a most pleasant place, beautified with most glorious and stately Palaces, and most delicate and pleasant Gardens; and pointing to every thing with his Finger, to say thus unto him, Here rest thy for ever, which in this World have led an upright and godly Life, following Vertue, and detesting Vice; and after that turning his Face to the other side, to have shewed him two great and swift Rivers, whereof the one boiled with Water blacker than Pitch, and in them appeared (as he thought) numbers of Men wallowing and tumbling, some up, some down, crying horribly for mercy; And there (said he) are punished all such as in this frail life have been malicious workers of iniquity; the chief of whom: (as he said) were Emperors, Kings, Princes, and other great Men of the World. Mulapha awaking, and having told him all this, and having said unto him his Doctor, asked him what the fame might signify? Who standing a great while in a muse (for the Mahometans are exceeding superstitious, attributing much to dreams) full of sorrow and grief at length answered, That this Vision (for so it pleased him to term it) was undoubtedly to be feared, as presaging unto him the extremest peril of his Life, and therefore requested him to have great care both of his Life and Honour. But Mulapha as he was of a noble spirit and courage, regarding nothing that answer, stoutly replied, What, shall I suffer my self to be terrified and overcome with childish and vain fear? Why rather haste I not courageously and resolutely to my Father? And so much the more boldly, because I know assuredly I have always (as reason was) revered his Majesty, that against his Will I never surmounted him in felicity and greatness of this outward Estate (as the common sort deemeth to be the only life) and to strive against the Vanities of this World, and to embrace and follow an upright kind of life, that for I might at length without Murder, without Blood, without Tyranny, well and justly reign in Love and Peace, and invite alive with my Brethren; for I have fed down with my self, and chosen, if it be my Fathers pleasure so, rather to die in his Obedience, than reigning many years; to be reputed of all Men, especially my Competitors, a Rebel or Traitor. Having thus said, he came unto his Fathers Camp, and pitching his Tents (as we have before said) fired him self all in White, in token of his Innocency, and writing certain Letters (which the Turks when they are about to go to any place of danger, use to write, and always to carry with them, for they are wonderful foolish in their Superstition) and putting them in his Bosom, attended upon with a few of his most trusty Followers, came with great reverence towards the Tent of his Father, fully resolving to have kissed his Hand, as their usual manner was. But when he was come to the entrance of the Tent, remembering that he had yet his Dagger girt to him, he enred not until he had put it off; because he would not come into his Fathers fight with any Weapon, if happily so he might clear himself of his Fathers needless suspicion. So when he was come into the more inward Rooms of the Tent, he was with such honour as belonged to his state cheerfully received by his Fathers Eunuchs. But seeing nothing else provided but one Seat whereon to sit himself alone, he perplexed in mind, stood still a while musing; at length asked where the Emperor his Father was? Whereunto they answered, That he should be by and by see him; and with that casting his Eye aside, he saw seven Mutes (these are strong Men bereft of their Speech, whom the Turkish Tyrants have always in readiness, the more secretly to execute their bloody Butchery) coming from the other side of the Tent towards him; at whose sight stricken with a sudden terror, lay no more, but Levy death; and with that, a-riding, was about to have fled; but in vain, for he was caught hold on by the Eunuchs and Mutes, and by force drawn to the place appointed for his death; where without further stay, the Mutes cast a Bow-string about his Neck, he poor Wretch still striving, and requesting that he might speak but two words to his Father before he died. All which the Murderer (for no addition is sufficient significantly to express his unnatural Villany) both heard and saw by a Traverser from the other side of the Tent; but was so far from being moved with compassion, that thinking it long till he were dispatched, with a most terrible and cruel voice he rated the Villainsenured to blood; saying, Will you never dispatch that I bid you? Will you never make one Night the less to me? In which horrible commanding speeches, yet thundering in their Ears, those butcherly Mutes threw the poor innocent Prince upon the ground, and with the help of the Eunuchs forcibly drawing the knotted Bow-string both ways, by the commandment of a most wicked Father, strangled him. With like barbarous Cruelty, he shortly after caused Mahomet his Nephew (Mulapha's his Son) to be strangled also.

This unnatural and strange Murder committed, he presently commanded the Bassa of Amasia, Mulapha's Lieutenant to be apprehended, and his Head in his own preference to be struck off. Which done, he sent for Tschanger the Crooked, yet ignorant of all that was happened; and in sporting wife, as if he had done a thing worth commendation, bid him go meet his Brother Mulapha; which thing Tschanger with a merry and cheerful Countenance hasted to do, as one glad glad of his Brothers coming. But as soon as he came unto the place where he saw his Brother lying dead upon the ground strangled, it is not to be spoken how he was in mind tormented. He was scarcely come to the place where this detestable Murderer was committed, when his Father sent unto him certain of his Servants to offer unto him all Musapha's Treasure, Horses, Servants, Jewels, Tents, and withal, the Government of the Province of Amassia; but Talhaner filled with extreme sorrow for the unmerciful death of his well beloved Brother, spake unto them in this sort. A wicked and an ungodly Cain, Traitor (I may not say Father) take thou now the Treasure, the Horses, the Servants, the Jewels, and the Province of Musapha. How came it into thy wicked, cruel, and savage Breast, so ungraciously and contrary to all Humanity, I will not say the Reverence of thine own Blood, to kill thy worthy, warlike, and noble Son, the Mirror of Courtiers, the Prince of great Soul, the like of whom, the Osman Family never yet had, nor never shall? I will therefore my self provide that thou, nor none for thee shall ever hereafter in such sort shamefully triumph over a poor crooked Wretch. And having thus much said, flaid himself with his own Dagger into the Body, whereof he in short time died; Which so soon as it came to the old Tygers Ear, it hard to say how much he grieved. His dead Body was by his Fathers commandment carried from Alapa in Syria, to Constantinople, and afterwards honourably buried on the other side of the Haven at Pera. For all this bloody Tragedy, his covetous mind was not so troubled, but that he could forthwith command all Musapha's Treasures and Riches to be brought to his Tent; which his Soldiers in hope to have the same given among them for a Prey, willingly halted to perform. In the mean time the Soldiers which were in Musapha's Camp, not knowing why was become of their Master, first seeing such a multitude of Soldiers thrusting into their Camp without all order; to repress their tumultuous infidelity, stepped out in their Armor, and notably repressed them, not without much Bloodshed.

At length, the noise of this stir was heard by the rest of the Kings Soldiers, who seeing the Tumult to increase more and more, ran in to help their Fellows; so that in short time there began a hot skirmish and cruel fight on both sides, in which that two thousand were slain, and more wounded; neither had the broil so ended, had not Achmet Baffa a grave Captain, and for his long experience of no small Authority amongst the Soldiers, kept back the Janizaries, and staid their fury; and turning likewife to Musapha's Soldiers, by gentle and mild words and courteous persuasions, in this manner appeased their rage, What my Brethren (said he) will you now (degenerate from your ancient Loyalty, for which you have been for so many Ages commended) impugn the command of the great Sultan our dread Sovereign? Truly I cannot sufficiently marvel what thing should move you, whom I have hitherto proved to have been most worthy and valiant Soldiers, in this civil conflict to draw those Weapons against your Fellows and Brethren, which you have most fortunately used against the Enemies of the Osman King; except you mean thereby to make your selves a fearful spectacle unto your Enemies, who grieving to see themselves overcome by your Victorious Weapons, may yet rejoice among themselves to see you turn the same one upon another. Wherefore my Son, for your ancient honours sake, be careful that you do not by this your infidelity lose the reputation of your Wisdom, Loyalty, and Valor; for which you have hitherto been above all others commended; reserve these your Weapons, which you have now too much used among your Fellows, against your Enemies, of whom you may yet more Praise and Honour. This Speech of the old Baffa so mollified the stout Souldiers, that they freely permitted all that was in Musapha's Tents to be carried to Solyman; but so soon as the death of Musapha was blown into the Ears of the Janizaries and the rest of the Army in Solyman's Camp, another Tumult rose among them worse than the first: They were quickly all up in Arms again, and with a great noise confused with Tears and Lamentation, as they were in rage and fury, brake violently into Solyman's Pavilion with their drawn Swords; which struck the Tyrant into such a fear, that destitute of all Council in himself, he was about being holden by his Friends, and making a Virtue of Necessity, upon the sudden adventured to do that which at better leisure he would scarcely have thought upon; for going forth out of his Tent, but with a pale and wan Countenance, he spake unto the enraged Souldiers thus: What Breil (said he) is this? what Stir? what so great Infidelity? what mean your inflamed, fierce and angry Looks? know you not your Sovereign? and him that hath power to the command you? Have you so refused to fight the ancient and invincible bones of your fathers and your country, with the blood of your Lord and Emperor? Whilst he was yet thus speaking, the Souldiers boldly answered, That they denied not, but that he was the Man whom they many years before had chosen for their Emperor; but in that they had by their own Valour got for him a large and mighty Empire, and in like manner preferred it; that was therefore of them done, that he should for the same govern them verily and justly, and not to lay his bloody hands without discretion upon every just Man, and most wickedly embrace himself with innocent Blood; and that they came thither armed, they did it (as they said) moved with just cause to revenge the unworthy death of guidless Musapha; and that for that matter, he had no just cause to be angry with them. Wherefore they required, that they might publicly clear themselves of the Treason wherewith they were accused by Musapha's Enemies, and that the Accuser might be brought forth to justify his Accusation; protesting, that they would never lay down their Weapons, until the Accuser made his appearance in Judgment, and commenced his Accusation judicially, upon pain to endure the like punishment if he failed in proof. Whilst these things were in doing, the haughtiness of the late committed fact moved every Man to shed Tears; so that Solyman himself seemed to be sorry for the Murder so lately by himself committed; wherefore he promised unto the Souldiers whatsoever they required, and did what he could to appease their angry minds. For all that, they in the mean time, left he should craftily slip away and deceive them: of that he had promised, and of the expectation of such things as they had required, with a marvellous care and diligence all kept Watch and Ward.

Solyman to appease this rage of the Janizaries, deprived Rufan Baffa of all his Honours, and took from him his Seal wherewith he had the keeping, and delivered it to Achmet Baffa. But Rufan worthily stricken with fear and horror, seeing himself now in no safety in his own Tents, fled secretly to Achmet; asking his Council what were best for him to do, and what Course to take in so doubtful and dangerous a case? To whom the Baffa answered, according to what he commanded. Which answer well satisfied Rufan; and so he which of late gave other Men access unto unto the Emperor at his pleasure, was now glad by his old Acquaintance and Friends to prester this poor suit. To know his pleasure what he would have him to do; from whom he received this answer, That he should incontinent without delay quit him of his fight, and out of the Camp; which the Baffa did he could not conveniently do, being by his displeasure and the Souldiers rage disurnished of all things necessary for his departure. Whereunto Solyman sent him answer again, That he could give him neither longer time nor delay, and that they were best for him without more ado to be gone for fear of further harm. Whereupon Rufan guilty in conscience of his most horrible Villany and Treachery, accompanied with eight of his most faithful Friends instead of his late world of Followers, posted in haste to Constantinople, and there (not without danger of his Head) with Roxelana and other the complices and contrivers of the Treason against Musapha, in great fear expected the event of his Fortune.

This young Prince Musapha thus shamefully murdered by his own Father, was for his rare Virtues generally beloved of the Turks; but of the Souldiers most for his Martial Disposition, and readiness for the effusion of Christian Blood. The opinion they had conceived of him was such, and their love so great, that they never thought there was any in the Osman Family, of whom they expected so much for the enlarging of their Empire; in which, that evanescence, when in their private or public Actions they fail of any great hope, they use this Proverb even at this day, taken from him, Quis Sultan Musapha, Sultan Musapha is dead; as who should say, our hope is all lost. Achmet Baffa the great Champion of the Turks, a Man of exceeding Courage, not ignorant of the small affluence of the great Honours of that State, at such time as he received the Seal from Solyman, boldly told him, That as he did then frankly bestow it upon him, so he would at one time or other to his no less disgrace take it from him; to whom Solyman solemnly promised with an Oath, not to displace him so long as he lived. For all that, he had not long enjoyed that honour, but that Solyman falling in dislike with him, and willing again to promote Rufan Baffa to that great honour, greater than which there was none in the Turks Court, which by reason of his Oath he could not do so long as Achmet lived; To have his Oath, and to prefer his Son in Law (whom he had indeed displaced only to please the tumultuous Janizaries) refused to have Achmet any longer to death. Of which his purpose Achmet altogether ignorant, and one Morning after his wonted manner coming into the Divane in all his Honour, upon the sudden received word from Solyman, that he must presently die, and forthwith was the Hangman ready to have strangled him, as was given him in charge; whom the stout Baffa thrust from him with his hand, with countenance as clear as flower no more troubled than if the matter had nothing concerned him. And looking a good while round about him, espied at last an honest Man whom he had before many times pleased, whom he most earnestly requested for all the kindness shewed unto him, to do him that last favour as to strangle him with his own hand, which should be unto him the greatest good turn that he could possibly devise, desiring nothing more than to die with the hand of the Hangman. Which thing when he after much intreaty had undertaken to perform, Achmet would him, that he should not at one twich strangle him outright, but letting the Bowstring slack again, give him leave once to breathe and then to dispatch him; which his request was by his Friend accordingly performed, and he in that sort strangled; wherein it seemeth, that he was desirous, first to taste of Death, and not to die all at once. Immediately after whose death, Rufan Baffa was again restored to his place of chief Viceroy, and had the great Seal delivered unto him; which honour he enjoyed about six years after, and so at last died of the Dropsie. This was the end of these two great Baffas Achmet and Rufan, who in that time failed that great Empire, under Solyman, and of whom we have so much spoken. It is reported, that Solyman having appointed Achmet to die, should say, It is better for his great Heart once to die than to die a thousand times, in seeing his Honour taken from him and bestowed upon another.

The Turks Gallies by the solicitation of the French before brought down into the Tufcan Sea, did much harm upon the Coasts of Calabria and Sicilia in this year 1554, as they had the year before, and so did divers years after. At which time also Pandulphus Contarenus the Venetian Admiral scouring along the Seas, carefully looking to the Frontiers of the Venetian Estate, chanced to meet with the Baffa of Callipolis, who in the year before had rifled certain Venetian Merchants; in revenge of which injury he set upon him, and after a great Spoil made both of the Turks and their Gallies, he ransacked Durrachium then one of the Turks Port Towns in Dalmatia.

The next year 1555, the same Baffa recovered his strength; but not daring to be too buffe with the Venetians, first of all he sent of Bianco, Elia, subject to the Duke of Florence, and whilst Letter sent to Solyman, to persuade him to take up Arms against the Venetians, as they which had broken the League.

At the same time, Haly the Baffa of Buda by Policy surprised the strong Castle of Babova in Hungary; and was in good hope by the like success to have taken the Town and Castle of Zagreb, a place of great importance; but failing of his purpose, he came the next year 1556, with a great Army, and the thirteenth day of June encamped before the Town, wherein was Governor Marchus Horvath a valiant Captain, with a Garrison of notable Souldiers. Shortly after he began a most terrible Battery; during which time the Christians falling out divers times, slew many of his Men; who for all that used such diligence, that the twentieth of June they had the uttermost Wall, and after five hot Assaults were in hope at the sixth to have won the Castle also; but the Christians perceiving the danger, resolutely sallied out, and having slain eight hundred of them, drove the rest again from the Wall. Yet the Turks gave it not so over, but with a great number of Carts laboured to have filled up the Marriah and Ditches about the Town, which their Attempt was by the industry of the Defendants also defeated. The Baffa perceiving how hardly the Town would be won by force, attempted to have persuaded them to have yielded it up by composition; but failing therein of his purpose, began again the twelfth of July to assault the City, which Assault he maintained five days together without intermission, still sending in fresh Men instead of them that were wearied or slain; yet was the City for all that by the Valour of the Christians nobly defended. So when he had in vain persevered the uttermost of his Forces, he raised his Siege the one and twentieth day of July and departed; but within six days after, he returned from the City Quinque Ecclesie, and and assaulted the City afresh; but was at length glad to give over the Siege and be gone, when he had lost of his best Soldiers above ten thousand, and of the Defendants slain but an hundred and twenty. After his departure there was ten thousand great shot found, whereof he had battered the Town and the Castle, which was for this time worthily defended. The Turks in the mean time after their wonted manner ceased not to do what harm they could in the Tufcan Sea, and had again miserably spoiled the Island of Corfica; for withstanding of whom the Bishop of Rome exacted of his People a great Subsidy, and finely dript the Jews of the Money, and seized upon their rich Merchants Goods in his Territory. At whose earnest suit Solyman in their behalf writ unto the Bishop as followeth:

Sultan Solyman, most Mighty Emperor of Emperors, the Son of Selymus, Emperor of Emperors, to whom God give eternal Victory; to Pope Paulus the Fourth, Greeting.

*M*ost excellent and most mighty Lord of the Professors of the Meliss Tels, and Lord of Rome, the Almighty keep thee. As such time as thou shalt receive our Seal, thou shalt understand by our Letters, that certain Hebræus have come unto us, complaining that they are oppressed of thee with too grievous Exactions, when they come to traffique at Ancona; This burden I request thee to take from them, and to restore again unto them their Goods, that thereby they may be able to pay to us our Tribute; which if thou (as I hope thou wilt) shalt do, thou shalt feel my Favour. Farewell. From Constantinople the last of the blessed Month * Ramelembol, in the year of our great Prophet Mahomet, nine hundred three score and four.

* The ninth of March, Anno 1556.

Haly Bassa Zigeth again.

Haly Bassa (a overture).

Haly Bassa given with the late repulse he had received at Zigeth, came again the next year, and besieged it, at which time King Ferdinand sent Nicolaus Pöblicher and the Count Serinus with a Power raised in Suecia and Austria, to recover Baboeva, a Castle between Zigeth and Stria, before surprised by the Turks; of whose coming the Bassa having intelligence, rose with his Army and departed from Zigeth, which he had for certain Months hard besieged, and not far from Baboeva met with Pöblicher and Serinus; who joining Battel with him, after a hard and sharp Fight overthrew him and put him to Flight. This Victory with the coming down of young Ferdinand, King Ferdinand, Son, Archduke of Austria with new Supplies, so terrified the Turks in that part of Europe along the River Drauwa, that they for fear forsook Baboeva, Sammartin, San-Laurence, and divers other small Castles which they had before taken, and fled to Quinke Ecclesia.

The Governor of Zigeth encouraged herewith, rallying out with his Garrison, flew many of the Turks in their Flight towards Quinke Ecclesia, and meeting by chance with a Troop of Horsemen, which were bringing the Turks Pay, overthrew them, took the Money, and so with an exceeding rich Prey returned to his Castle. At which time also Adam the Governor of Rab, otherwise called Tovarum, having burnt the Suburbs of Alba Regalis, and driven away many thousands of Cattle, at a Town called Siga overthrew five hundred Turks, and as many fugitive Christians, and so with a great Prey and little or no loss at all of his Men returned.

Henry the French King, at the same time in Wars with Philip King of Spain, and troubled with the loss of his Army, overthrown not far from Saint Quintin (at which time the Duke Montmorency Countable of France and General of the Army, with his Son and divers other of the Nobility of France were taken Prisoners) by his Ambassador Michael Condignac solicited Solyman to have by Sea invaded Naples and Sevilla, so to have withdrawn the Spanish Forces out of France, to defend their own Frontiers. Which thing Solyman, offended with the insolency of the Ambassador, refused to do; yet nevertheless commanded his adventures all along the Coast of Affrica, to infest those Seas, and to do what harm they could upon the Coast of Italy and Sevilla; which they so diligently performed, that the Viceroy of Sevilla was slain for defence of those Countries to lie in readines with his Gallies in the Ports of Cajeta and Naples.

In the mean time the Guise, Lord Grand Prior of the Knights of Saint Pons in France (and Brother of Francois the Duke of Guise, General of the French Kings Army in Italy, who upon the overthrow received at Saint Quintin, called out of Italy, shortly after took Cajeta) Admiral of the Gallies of Malta, went out toward the East with four Gallies well appointed, to lie in wait for the Turks, and by fortune met with two great Ships laden with the Turks Merchandise, which he took; and by and by after, light upon four of the Turks Gallies, with whom he had a great Fight; yet at length having sunk one of them and burnt another, he took the other two. After which Victory returning towards Malta to have repaired his Gallies and cured his wounded men, he was met with four other great Gallies of the Turks; who desirous to revenge the loss of their Fellows, set upon him, and he feeling now no remedy, but that he must needs fight courageously, continued them. But for some time the two Fights before lost some of his Men, and seventy two of the Knights in the Gallies lay fore wounded, he, by the Council of the Captains retired towards Malta; but by the way one of his Gallies was taken by the Turks, with two and fifty Knights of the Order; yet with the rest and the Prizes before taken, he recovered the Island of Malta; where he staid that Winter; and the next Spring sailed into France to be partaker of those troubles, which beginning shortly after, have but of late taken end.

The immoderate Fortune of the great Sultan Solyman, was not in any thing more contrary to his desire, than in the proof of those his Children, of whom the World held the greatest expectation. Musapha his eldest Son, the Mirror of Courtship, and rare hope of the whole Turkish Nation, the suspicious Tyrant had most unaturally caused to be murdered in his own presence, to the grief of all his Subjects in general, as is before declared; poor Tschanger was dead for sorrow; and Mahomet his eldest Son, by his best beloved the fair Roxelana, was departed this life also. So that now remained unto him only Selymus, the unworthy Heir of so great an Empire, and Bajazet his younger Brother, the lively image of his Father, both Men grown, and the Sons of the same Roxelana; but so far differing the one from the other both in Feature of Body and Disposition of Mind; as if they had not been of the same Kindred and Line. Solyman the elder Brother, most like unto his Mother, was in the secret determination of the aged Emperor his Father appointed Heir of that most mighty Empire. Bajazet much resembling his Father, was on the other side strongly supported by the care, and

Solyman the elder Brother, most like unto his Mother, was in the secret determination of the aged Emperor his Father appointed Heir of that most mighty Empire. Bajazet much resembling his Father, was on the other side strongly supported by the care, and entire love of his Mother; which whether it proceeded of a fecund consideration of his inevitable Destiny, or that he had by Loyalty or otherwise won her Favour, is not known; but every Man saw, that if it had been in her Power, the would undoubtedly have preferred him before his elder Brother Selymus, and have placed him in the Empire; but she must needs give way to her old Husbands Will, firmly and irrevocably set down, that the Destinies so permitting, none should reign after him but his eldest Son Selymus. Of which his purpose and resolution Bajazet being not ignorant, began most circumspectly to look about him, if he could by any means frustrate that forcible necessity, and exchange his certain destruction with an Empire; in which his deep and dangerous cogitations he was not a little comforted by the favour and love of Roxelana his Mother, and of Rafsan the great Bassa his Brother in Law; who together had in any other matter been able to have overruled the aged Emperor. Whereupon he resolutely for down himself, rather to end his days by making proof of good or bad Fortune, than upon the death of his Father (which by Course of Nature could not now be far off) to be as a Sacrifice basely butchered by some vile Hangman of his Brothers. Bajazet so resolved, and now already fallen out with his Brother Selymus, took occasion upon the general discontentment of the People and Army, for the unworthy death of Musapha their late joy to begin those things which he had before with himself plotted, and so to make a Head, whereunto he might afterward join the Body also; for why, that worthy Musapha had left behind him so great a desire of himself, that now it wearied many to live after him, they had so placed all the hope of their good Fortune in him, unto whom nothing was more desired than to revenge the wrong done unto him, or else to run the same hard Fortune with him; otherfore guilty of the immoderate Affection they had born unto him yet living, and fearing to be called to give an account thereof, thought any flate better and more assured than that wherein they presently stood, and therefore fought all occasions of new fits, how to set all in an hourly buny; only a Captain was wanting, Musapha could not again be revived, yet might he be strongly supposed to live. This device pleased Bajazet, as best fitting his purpose, being not ignorant of this disposition of the People. Wherefore by certain of his most faithful and trusty Followers he found out a certain obscure Fellow of a notable audacity, which should take upon him the Name and Person of Musapha, whose Stature also and Countenance and Proportion of Body differed not much from Musapha himself; he, as if he had by chance escaped, first began to show himself in that part of Thracia, which is above Constantinople, and lieth toward Danubius, not far from the Countries of Molavia and Valachia; and was for that cause both fitted for Rebellion, and also best stored with Horsemen, who of all others most honoured Musapha. Either he comes as if it had been from a long journey, suddenly accompanied, and as if he had been desirous at the first not to have been known; his Followers being demanded (as it chanced) who it was, did rather fearfully give them that asked, occasion to guess, than plainly to tell them, that it was Musapha; neither did he himself much deny it; whereby the People became more and more desirous to know him. Which beginning thus laid, he afterward began to rejoice of his means coming thither, and to give God thanks for his safe arrival there amongst his Friends; he tells them, That at such time as he was sent for by his Father, he durst not come into his fight, or commit himself unto him in his Fury, but by the counsel of his Friends to have with great promises persuaded one that was marvellous like unto himself to go in his stead; by whose danger he might make proof of his Fathers mind towards him; who before he was admitted to the speech of his Father, was without hearing miserably strangled, and so cast out before his Pavilion; at which time there were many (as he said) which perceived the deceit, but the greater part remained in error, deceived with the Lineaments and Countenance of the miserable dead Man, who was much altered with the terrible pains of death, and supposing it to have been him indeed that was slain. Which thing as soon as he understood, he thought it not good longer to stay, but presently to flee and to provide for his own safety; and so flying with a few of his own Followers, thereby the more secretly and safely to escape; and having passed above Ponaris by the People of Bosphorus, was now come thither, where he was in good hope to find much help and comfort in the Fidelity of his Friends, whom he requested not now to forsake him, or to make less account of him disgraced by the malice of his Step-Mother, than they had before in time of his Prosperity. For that he was amended to revenge the injury done unto him, and by force of Arms to defend himself; for what else had he now left? being by no other means preserved, but by the death of another Man; that he had sufficiently proved how his Father stood affected towards him, and that he now lived by his mistaking, not by his Kindness. The cause of all which his troubles was his Stepdame, who (as he said) with her incantments led the silly old Man (now almost doating for Age, and mad for love) whither she would at her pleasure, and by her Agent Rafsan Bassa forced him forward heading into all kind of mischief; but that God be thanked he wanted not his Friends, by whose help he would find a way out of these miseries, and take revenge of his Enemies; for why, he had as yet courageous Hearts, and the Janizaries with the greater part of his Fathers Family on his side, and that great multitudes of People would flock unto him upon bruse of his Name; so that they which did now mourn for him as dead (in number many) would by heaps run to help him being alive; so that they there present would only courteously receive him as a Guest, and protect him now distressed, till such time as his wellwillers and Friends might repair unto him. And this at last he gave out not in secret, but openly to all Men wheresoever he came. The same things did they also report, whom he made the People to believe to have been the Companions of his Flight; which was also confirmed by divers of good Account and Authority, whom Bajazet had before dealt wital to that purpose. So that a great number of Men altogether unknown to Bajazet, were by that means seduced; for this matter was so cunningly wrought; that many of them that had known Musapha alive, and seen him laid dead before his Fathers Pavilion, yet lifted not greatly to believe that they knew, but easily suffered themselves to be persuaded that this was the true Musapha. But the Companions and Followers of Musapha (in whose minds the lively Countenance and Remembrance of him was thoroughly engraven) nothing could deceive; yet blinded partly with fear, partly with grief and desire of revenge, and willing rather to adventures any thing, than longer to live without Musapha, were the first Men that came to offer their service service to this counterfeit Muffapha; and would not suffer other Men to doubt but that this was the very Muffapha, which was falsely reported to have been slain. As for the deceiver himself, he either kept with him, or entertained them that came, some with fair promises, some with courteous Speeches, and many also with Money and Rewards, which he made them believe he had reserved of the Relicks of his better Fortune; for Bajazet had before now provided, that nothing should in this behalf be wanting unto him for the countenance of his Credit. So within the space of a few days such a multitude of Men was resorted unto him, as might almost have made a whole Army. When Solyman upon the suddain was advertised by the fearful Messengers and Letters of the Sanzacks thereabouts, that a danger was like to ensue by the concurrence of so great a Multitude of People to this counterfeit Muffapha; he presently suspecting (as the truth was) that this was not done without the privy of one of his Sons, thought it not a thing to be neglected, and therefore by his Letters reproved the Sanzacks thereby, that they had suffered the matter to run so far, and had not in the beginning as their Duty was, suppressed the fame, grievously threatening them, if they did not with all speed send unto him in bonds that counterfeit Companion with the rest of his Complices. Which thing might be the easier by them performed, he promised to fend one of the chief Baffas, namely Paraua Baffa (who had married the Widow of Mahomet the eldest Son of Roxelana, of whom we have before remembered) and with him a strong power of the Soldiers of the Court; but if they would have themselves excused, that they should of themselves dispatch the matter before the coming of that Aid. This Paraua led after him certain Squadrons of Soldiers, not so many in number, as might be requisite for so great a business; he had caused the most faithful of his Colonels, Captains, and Corporals, to be culled out; wisely doubting lest his Soldiers, either led with Affection, or corrupted with Reward, might take part with him against whom they were sent. For the common sort of the Janizaries standing in suspense at the fame of Muffapha, and expectation of some great novelty, favoured that broil, and wished all on an hourly fury; neither was the matter indeed without danger. The Sanzacks after they had received this first charge from Solyman, considering how much it flooded them upon to make a speedy dispatch, began now to incourage one another to bestir themselves, to make all the speed possible, and with all their Power on every side to oppose themselves against the attempts of this new found Muffapha, labouring to flay such as were coming unto him, and to disperse such as were already come, by showing them the greatness of the danger, and threatening them with all extremities. In the mean time Paraua Baffa came on with his Army, and was not now far off; when (as in like case it oftentimes falleth out in things not yet sufficiently confirmed, and by celerity prevented) the Soldiers of the counterfeit Muffapha seeing themselves beset on every side, began to fear, and at first some few to slip away; but afterwards all, without regard of shame or of their promise, to forsake their Captain and flee every Man whither he thought best. The Captain seeking likewise to have made shift for himself, was with the chief of his Counsellors and Followers taken by the Sanzacks and delivered unto the Baffa, who with a strong Guard sent them all in bonds to Constantinople; where Solyman by most exquisite Torments drew from them all the secret devices of his young

Son Bajazet, and that he had purposed after such a Head made by this supposed Muffapha, as he thought convenient, to have upon the suddain joined himself with a great Power, and so to himself best serve for his purpose, to have gone directly to Constantinople, or else against his Brother Selymus. But whilst he goeth somewhat too slowly about his business, his unripe Counsels were by his Fathers Celerity overthrown. Of all which matter Solyman now thoroughly assured, caused the supposed Muffapha and his Companions at Midnight to be drowned in the Sea; thinking it not good to have these things commonly known, and to have his domestical wounds yet bleeding, laid open to the view of his Neighbour Princes. Nevertheless being mightily offended with Bajazet for so great an infidelity, he ceased not to cast in his mind how to be revenged upon him; which his Wife Roxelana, a Woman of great Willows, was not ignorant of. Who after a few days, at such time as the old Mans Fury was overpast, falling of purpose into talk with him about the matter, the laid together in her Sons behalf, and alleged the indifferency of Youth, the necessity of the Fact, and the example of his Ancestors in like case, that it was so provided for by nature, that every Man should be careful of himself and his, and that all Men did indifferently shun Death, that young Men were by evil Counsel easily seduced, and made to forget their Duty. That it were reason he should forgive him this first Fault; which if he amended, then was it a great gain for the Father to have saved his Son; but if he should again fall into relapse, there would not want time to punish him for both Faults; And that if so he would not pardon him for his own sake; yet he would vouchsafe to pardon him for hers, entreating now for him, for whom she had before groaned, and now to be cruel upon him, one of the Pledges of their Love; in whom rested the Blood of them both; for in what would the case should be, if of those two Sons (all that God had left her) the Fathers Severity should bereave her of the one? Wherefore she requested him to moderate his Anger, and to prefer his Clemency before his just Indignation; forasmuch as God himself of all Power and Might, did not always deal with Sinners in Severity, but would not punish his Wrath. And would Mercy in any place be more fitting, than in the Father towards his Child? She promised further, that Bajazet should from thenceforth remain in most dutiful Obedience towards his Majesty; and upon his so great Clemency, to convert the fear wherein he now lived, into a World of Duty and Devotion. Honourable minds (the said) were retained with nothing more than with Kindness and Courtesy; that the remembrance of that his Fatherly Forgiveness should be a stay unto him, for ever doing the like again; at last, that he would promise for him, and take upon her, that he should for ever afterwards satisfy his Fatherly expectation in all kind of Duty and Loyalty. Which words mingled with Tears and other Womanly Gestures, so wrought with Solyman, being otherwise too much in her power, that he resolved to forgive the Fault; yet so, that he should come and submit himself, and receive from him his charge. This careful Mother foredrew no time, but by Letters secretly advertised Bajazet not to fear to come unto his Father at such time as he should be sent for; assuring him that there was no danger, for that his Father was by her means appeased, and he again brought into his favour. With which good News Bajazet well comforted, resolved to go at such time as he was sent for; full full of fear, and oftentimes looking back unto his Brother Muffapha, whose dreadful example sufficiently warned him what a danger he adventured himself upon. Yet he came to the place appointed for the Parley, which was in a common Inn at a place called Carehvan a few miles from Constantinople; for such is the suspicious manner of the Turkish Tyrants of these times, not to suffer any of their Sons that be Men grown, to set their Foot within the Gates of Constantinople, as dangerous for soliciting the Soldiers of the Court, and so consequently for the altering of the State. Bajazet was no sooner lighted from his Horse, but his Fathers Guard was presently ready to receive him, commanding him to lay aside his Sword and Dagger; which thing though it be an usual matter in others that are admitted to the presence of the Turkish Emperor, yet might it then in the mind of his guilty Son raise a great fear. But his kind Mother (who had before seen in what fear and perplexity he would come) had conveyed her self into a Chamber fast by the entrance of the same House Bajazet was to pass, where one of a little Calfment covered with a thin Linnen Cloth, the called unto him in passing by, in these few words, Corcome oglan, Corcome; which is as much to say, Fear not my Son, fear not; with which short Speech Bajazet was not a little both comforted and encouraged. But as soon as he was come into a Chamber, and had done his Duty, Solyman commanded him to sit down by him; then began the grim old Emperor to reprove him of his rashness and want of discretion in taking up Arms, which he could not otherwise conceive of but as taken up against himself. And admit they were as he would have it, and the best that he could make of it, taken up against his elder Brother, yet was it nevertheless a great presumption and most wicked Fact. Neither was there any point in him, but that the whole fate of the Mahometan Religion (which at this day resteth upon the Ottoman Family) lay by his Domestical Discord been fore shaken, and brought in peril of utter ruin, to the great Injury, Reproach, and Contempt of his Majesty, a most detestable and horrible Crime, which could not with condign punishment be revenged. Yet for all that, he had determined to pardon him, and to give himself rather a kind Father, than a severe Judge; so that he would from thenceforth leave the care of these things to God; forasmuch as none of these things are done by our appointment, but that Kingdoms and Monarchies are bestowed as best pleaseth him; so that if it were his Destiny to enjoy the Empire after his death, he should be sure thereof as of a thing that would of it self come unto him, and was not by any Mans power to be kept from him, as that which was by God ordained for him; but if it were otherwise appointed by God, then were it a mad thing for him to labour in vain to strive against the Will of God, and as it were to fight with God. Wherefore he should now as one well warned, cease to rage and storm, and not to molest his quiet Brother, or trouble him as he aged Father; for that if he should again fall and raise new fits, it would assuredly fall upon his own head; neither would any place of mercy be found for his second offence, and thence should then find him not as now his gentle Father, but a most severe and revenging Judge. Which when he had said, and Bajazet had thereunto briefly answered as the time would permit, rather craving pardon for his Trespass, than excusing that was not to be excused, and promising from thenceforth to live most loyally at his Command; Solyman according to the manner of that Nation called for Drink, which he commanded to be given to Bajazet, who not daring to refuse it, although he had rather have so done, drank thereof what he thought good, doubting lest that should have been his last; of which fear his Father forthwith delivered him by drinking a good draught of the same Cup. So Bajazet, though guilty, having with better success spoken with his Father, than had his Brother Muffapha, returned again to the former place of his charge.

This happened in the year 1555, from which time Bajazet so long as Roxelana his Mother lived, behaved himself with all dutiful and Brotherly Kindness both towards his Father and his Brothers; and that rather for to keep her favour, and not to cut off the hope which he had only in her Affection towards him, than for any confidence he had in his Fathers Kindness, or for any Love he bare to his Brother; the regard of her being the only thing that kept his fierce Nature in quiet. But the dead about two years after, he as a Man bereft of all hope of long Life, and discharged of all Bonds of Duty, fell to his former Course, and began more grievously than before, to revive the old grudges betwix him and his Brother; sometimes seeking by secret practices to have him made away, and often sometimes by open force entering into his Province, which was not far off; there evil intreated some of his Brothers Followers as he light upon, for their Matters sake, omitting nothing which he thought might tend to the disgrace of him whom of all other he wished dead. He had also certain of his Favorites at Constantinople, by whom he cunningly wrought by all means to gain the Love of the Soldiers of the Court, and doubtless that occasion served to pass over thither himself, and there to lurk in Treachery with such as were of his Faction, and to strive to his Designments. Of all which things Solyman had knowledge, but especially by Letters from Selymus, wherein he was also advised to have care of his own safety; for that he was far deceived, if he perceived not, that these Preambles of Bajazet wicked intentions, would at last turn upon his Head, who regarded neither God nor Man, unthly defines his Fathers Welfare as no less a bar, than was his Brothers, and therefore without Sides was his Life that at which Treason (as he said) began of long time plotted, and now occasion sought to have the fame performed; wherefore he should take heed that he were not by such Treachery overwhelmed before he were aware thereof; That for himself he could easily bear with the injuries of his Brother Bajazet, yet could not chuse but be moved with the greatness of his Fathers dangers. By which means Solyman hated against Bajazet was still more and more increased. Wherefore he by Letters put him in remembrance of his Duty, how courteously he had used him, and again what he had on his part promised; that there would not of necessity be place for forgiveness; that he should therefore cease to wrong his Brother and trouble his Father; that he had but a short time to live, and that after his death God would assign each of them their Fortunes. But all this was to no purpose, with Bajazet, fully set down to hazard whatsoever, rather than as a Beast to have his Throat cut by his Brother; which thing he as plainly saw would befall him in the Reign of Selymus, as if it had been then in execution. Yet he answered to his Fathers commands not impudently, but he deced agreed not with his sayings, neither did he alter any thing of his intended purpose. Which thing as soon as Solyman perceived, he thought it best to take another Course, and to remove his Sons both farther from himself, and also farther from each from the other. Wherefore he thought it best to understand, That it was his pleasure that both of them within a certain prefixed time should depart out of their Governments (Bajazet being then Governor of Cutai, and Selymus of Magnesia) and that now Bajazet should remove to Amasia, and Selymus to Iconium. Selymus was without imputation, and altogether in favour with his Father; yet because he was upon that to be given Bajazet the more extremities if he should be removed, he was removed alone, Selymus seem indifferent, commanded them both to remove; unto which command it was adjoynd, that the further they were off one from another, they should be so much the nearer in mind and Brotherly love: for as much as nearness of dwelling of the Great, did many times hinder their good agreement, whilst by forswearnes of Officers many things arose, and perfides done to the grieving of the Masters; and that the further safe do as they were commanded, and that he which fald longest should not be free from the suspicion of Contempt. Selymus made no long stay, as he that knew a great part of all this to be done for his sake; but Bajazet hung back, and being gon a little on his way, fald, complaining of the unlucky Province of Amasia, stained with the Blood of his late Brother the Noble Muradus, and assigned unto him as ominous, saying he could be better to stay in his own Province whatsoever than that, where the deadly remembrance of the miserable end of the nearest unto him in Blood, should be ever before his Eyes, to the wounding of his Heart; Wherefore he requested that he might at least winter in those places, or else there from whence his Brother was now departed; but Selymus would in no wise hearken unto him. Now Selymus gon before certain joyous Journeys with such Troops as his Father had sent him beside his own, to his Eastern Frontiers, yet that he might be meddling on the time, suddainly returning, and fetching a compass about, shewed himself at his Brothers Back, marching towards Prusa in Bithynia, the ancient Seat of the Turkish Kings; which he did not without the privy of his Father, who liked not of the lingring of Bajazet: for what if he, having gained the good Will of the Janizaries, should have gon either to Prusa, or directly to Constantinople? what a danger might have grown thereunto? In what year should he be able to returne? Selymus, in common fear, Selymus thought it best for Selymus there to stay, from whence they might most conveniently help one another, if Bajazet should (as was feared) turn himself upon either of them. Yet was not Selymus so frong as to adventure to joyn Batrel with his Brother, whom he knew ready to put all to the hazard of one day. But when Bajazet (contrary to his expectation) lay Selymus behind him, and he saw he gotte nothing by his long stay, and that his Brother should be so well furnished Heir of the Empire, if his Father should die, which was then by reason of his sickly constitution of Body dayly more and more feared; he writ unto his Father, accusing his Brother. That he could not more manifestly in any thing declare how manifestly he was affected towards him, than by taking that indirect Course, to do more purpose than to aspire unto the Empire, and to have a purpose over to Constantinople, to be able to have the newes of his longling, if his Fathers long life should delay, then by the secret Ministers of his Treason to dispatch him, and by the murdering of him to possess himself of the Empire; and yet nevertheless, this man as a most dutiful and obedient Son, to be of him much made of, and as it were put in his Bosom. Whereas he on the contrary part meaning well, into whose conceit never any such thought came, but was ever at command, was not had in any regard, or call off and contemned, whose government was so much to them an unquiet and ruinous Province. After that, he converted his style to Prayers, requesting again of his Father, to gratifie him with some other Province, if it were: but that from which his Brother was departed; or with any other whatsoever, for that it were more lucky than that of Amasia: for answer whereof he said he would stay where he was, to the end that finding favour in his request, he should never have need himself to retire; but if he should not obtain his request, that then he was to go to whatsoever his Father should command. It was not altogether for nought that Bajazet found fault with Amasia: being the manner of the Turks, of the smallest things of all to divide upon the greatest. But Solyman understood the matter otherwise; who not ignorant of his Sons Tears, knew right well that he in them sought for nothing else but a more commodious place for him to raise new fits in, than was Amasia, so far distant from Constantinople. So he did not much delay to do what he would to frustrate his Fathers appointment, ceasing not in the mean time to augment his strength, with new Soldiers, to provide Armony, Money, and whatsoever else serving for defence of himself, and the Impugning of his Brother. Which Solyman took in no other part, than as intended against his own person; yet would he seem as not to have any such understanding of the matter: for why, the wary and politic Brother, by taking knowledge thereof, would not stir him by crying already running too fast of himself. Besides that, he was not ignorant that the Eyes of all Nations were bent upon this discord of his two Sons; and therefore he defired by all means, that these Grudges might be with as little stir as was possible, appeased. Wherefore he answered Bajazet courteously, That concerning his Government of Amasia, he could not alter it, as resolutely set down as was his Brother as himself, and therefore that they should do well to go both to their appointed places, as he had before commanded. As for the rest, they should be of good comfort, for that he would take such order, as that neither of them should have just cause to complain. Partau Bassa the fourth of the great Bassa's of the Court was appointed to go with this Messenge to Bajazet, and Mehemet the third of the same great Bassa's with like charge to Selyman: because the matter was so much to be done with all industry, and both of these great men were commanded not to depart from their charge were sent unto, before they were both come unto the places of their Government whereunto they were assigned. Which Solyman wisely did to keep them both within the compass of Duty and by the presence of such two grave Counsellors. Which thing Selyman took in good part, but Bajazet not so; who having resolved with himself first, to set all on a hurly hurry, thought nothing more unfit to his designs, than to be in the hands of his Father's Counsellors to be still. His Elbow as he sat leaning on all his Speeches and Doings: wherefore having courteously entertained him, and rewarded him according to his Ability, he dismissed him (though unwilling to depart) making this excuse, That he would use him as his Patron and Defender with his Father, forasmuch as he had no other in Court to defend his cause, pro-

mifing not to be unto him, an unworthy or unthankful Client; and to carry away back to him unto his Father, That he would above all things have care of his command, if he might fo do it his Brother Selymus, whose Injuries and Treacheries he had much ado to brook Partau the great Baffa fo went away, affured Selyman what the very mind and purpofe of his younger Son was. And albeit that Bayazet to make it feem as if fome thing had been done by that Embaffage, made him believe that he would have prefently gone towards Amasia; yet he was not deceived, for he was worft, made all the preparation he could againft him, commanding the Beglerbeg of Grece, though then fick of the Gout, to make hafte, and with his Horfemen to pafs over with all fpeed to aid Selymus; and Mechemet Baffa but lately returned, he fent forthwith back again for the fame purpofe to Selymus, with certain of the moft famous Companies of the Janizaries; and the Mam in Amasia, to the Embaffage as if he would himfelf in perfone have arrived at Amasia, and the Janizaries and other Souldiers of the Court came with evil Will together, drefling that War between the Brethren, as altogether abominable; for againft whom fhould they draw their Swords, was it not againft the Emperors Son, and happily the Heir of the Empire? Wherefore this War might (as they faid) well enough be left to be done, altogether unneceffary, and not they to be in Arms, to embroil their Hands one in another, and to pollute their Swords with fuch bloody Impiety; as for that which Bayazet did, he might be holden excufed, as proceeding from neceffity. Which Speeches of the Janizaries being brought to Selymans Ears, he forthwith declared them to the Mufti (who in all matters of doubt they confult unto as unto a moft facred Oracle) demanding of him, how he was to be intreated, of the himfelf prefumed whiles he yet lived, to be left in the State of his Army, rankt Towns, and trouble the State of the Empire, and how whatfo he deemed of them that were his Followers and took part with him? and laft of all of them all that refufed to bear Arms againft him, and faid that he had in fo doing nothing offended? Whereunto the Mufti answered, That he was both the Man and his Partakers were all worthy of death, and that fuch as refufed to take up Arms againft him, were as prophane and irreligious, as to be accounted defecate. Which the greater the Prefence of the chief Chieftains unto the People, and the chief Chieftains fent by the Emperor, as if he might be therewith moved. Within a few days after, there came to Conftantinople one of the Chieftains (whom Bayazet had intercepted, being fent from Selyman to Selymus) by whom Bayazet gave his Father to underftand, That he was in all Duty his, and that he had not taken up Arms againft him, neither refufed to be unto him in all things obedient; but that he had only to do as he was commanded, and with him to fight for his Father, by whom he was fo commanded; he by himfelf, for that a mifchief was to be by one of them performed; which quarrel he was refolved to try whiles he yet lived, and that therefore he fhould be left not to meddle in the quarrel, or to give aid to either. But if fo be he would needs (as the report was) pafs over the Sea to aid Selymus, he fhould not think eafily to get him into his hands, for that he knew right well, if the word came, how to efcape and fave himfelf; and that he might get himfelf into Afia, make himfelf a Spoil with Fire and Sword, and be the Amir over the other the cruellest Enemy of the Turks that ever was. Which Meffage did not a little trouble Selyman. And withall it was reported, That the Town of Axaur, where one of Selymus his Sons ruled as Sanzack, was already Selymus his Bajazet and shamefully sacked. But Selymus his King, that his Brother was gone towards Amasia, and not being as yet fully recovered from the effect of all his affliction of days as far as Angora, being out of all suspicion of danger, which he feared might befall him, he thought fit to have yet lingering in those quarters, huffed now towards Selymus, which was with a strong Garrison kept for him; for amongst other cares wherewith Selymus was vexed, it wasnot the least, That Bajazet in creeping Iconium, should get into Syria, and from thence into Egypt, an open Country, and not yet thoroughly established under the Turkish Government, neither could he be the old Government of the Mamelukes, and therefore he had change of mind from whence it would have been the advantage to have driven Bajazet, especially the Arabians being always ready and at hand at every light stir, where any hope of Prey was; out of which Province also in case of extremity he might easily transport himself into any of the Christian Kingdoms.

Selymus therefore took great care, that this passage, which might meet the last refuge of Bajazet, should not be mightily stopp'd up; and concerning the same, he gave his commandment unto most of his Commanders in Angora, that they were in readiness to aid Selymus whensoever he should call. With them Selymus lay encamped under the Walls of Iconium, attending every stirring of Bajazet, resolving there to expect further Aid from his Father, and not by untimely flight to commit himself to the hazard of one doubtful Battle. But what was on the other side not unmindful of that matter he had taken in hand, slept not thereupon, but first entered into a diligent sort of Horfemen which the Turks call Chivats, and are sometimes called by that People which we sometimes called Gordis, Men for their known Valour famous. He yet lay in the Plain and open Fields by Angora, of the Commodities of which City (which were indeed great) he made great use: In the Castle thereof he bestowed his Concubines; and of the rich Merchants he took up Money, to be disposed with the use upon the good success of the War, and from thence he took whatsover was needful for the maintenance and furnishing of his Men. Besides his own Family, which was very great, and those Chivats which he spoke of, many repaired unto him which had been in former time beholden to his Mother, his Sister and Ruffian the great Bassa; many also of the Reliques of the valiant Murad and Achometes the great Bassa, valiant Murad and Achometes his Soldiers, who desired to revenge the unworthy death of their Lords and Masters, even with their own. Neither was there wanting an exceeding Rabblement of such as were of their pretense late, desired some new innovation and change. The commination also of the State of the unfortunate Bajazet easily drew many to take part with him, whose whole trust was in his Valour: they favoured the young Prince, lively resembling his Father; when as in Syria appeared no likeness of himself, but the express Image of his Mother's Face and Body, a Woman, which the People had a natural hatred of all the People: he wasne heavily attended with his greivous Painch, blubbed cheeks, and exceeding red faced; so that the Soldiers in sport would say, He was fed with green Mantis: he was altogether given to his ease, and spent his time in Drunkenness and Sleep, neither was he courteous of Speech nor willing to deferre well of any Affairs for he would not (as he said) offend his Father, who being popular, so was he only of his Father's posterity.

kind of Men he most mistook of them that set all their hope in a bountiful and courageous Prince. The same Souldiers were also wont to call Bejazet, Sofy (that is to say) a Man given to quietness and study; but after they saw him take up Arms, and for the safeguard of himself and his Children ready to adventure any thing, they began to admire him as a Man of Valour and Courage; and to ask among themselves, Why his Father should reject him of such worth, the express image of himself, and prefer before him that gorballed Sluggard, in whom no Spark of his Fathers Valour was to be seen? This entering into Arms was no Fault, being necessary either for self, or for his Father's Grandfather done the like? whereof no better example could be found; whom the force of necessity constrained not only to take up Arms against his Brother, but also to hasten the death of his Father; and by so doing, purchased unto himself and his Posterity the Empire, which he gotten, if Solymán did not unjustly possess, why might not his Son use the same Course? why should he so rigorously revenge that in his Son, that was so lawful in the Grandfather? Although there was (as they said) great difference between that Solymán and this Bejazet; for that this Man intended no harm against his Father, but wished him long to live; neither yet against his Brother, if he might by his leave but live, if he would but once cease to do him wrong; that it was always accounted lawful to repel Force by Force, and to slay present Death, if the Deaths would so permit. By such Actions as these, Bejazet his Power increased daily; which being now grown almost to the greatness of a full Army, he thought it not best to use longer delay, but to march forthwith against his Brother to fight with him one Battle for his Life, State, and Empire; accounting it some commendation (although in vain) to have attempted to great an Enterprize. His purpose was (as Solymán feared) to get into Syrus, which if he could bring to pass, he then doubted not of the rest. Solymán strengthened with his Fathers Power, lay waiting for his coming before Iscion, well appointed of all Warlike Provision; his Army was exceeding strong, and in it many notable Commanders, Martial Men of great experience, whom his Father had joyned unto him; who all lay covered with their great Ordnance planted in places most convenient. But Bejazet nothing terrified therewith, as soon as he came within sight of his Brothers Army, exhorted his Souldiers in few words to play the Men, for that now was come the time they withheld for, and place for them to shew their Valour in; wherefore they should shew themselves courageous and valiant, and he would make them all rich and fortunate; he told them, that their Fortune was now in their own hands, to frame it every Man as he would himself; so that if any of them were weary of their present fate, there was the Field wherein they might exchange it with a better and therein lay down; the miseries of their former lives; that of him they should if they overcame, expect Riches, Promotions, Honours, and whatsoever else the Rewards of valiant Men; that with the Victory of one Battle, all their desires should be satisfied, were they never so great; which Victory was by the Valour which rested in them to be gotten, and his Brothers Army, the heart of Bejazet of a headstrong Captain, overthrow; for as his Fathers Souldiers that were with his Brother, they were in Body present, but in Mind altogether on his side; that it was only Solymán that withstood his Welfare and their Felicity, whom they should therefore valiantly seek for in Field as their common Enemy; and not to be afraid of his Multitude, forasmuch as Victory was to be gained, not by Number, but by Valour; and the most Mighty God of Heaven and Earth was still present, not with the most, but with the best. Besides that, he willed them to remember with what a cruel Enemy they were to fight, who thirsted after nothing more than their Blood: And to conclude, he willed them all, not to look upon his Words, but his Deeds; and said, If as you shall see me fighting for your profit, you shall likewise fight for mine Honour; I dare then assure you of the Victory. When he had with great Courage charged the Enemy, and fighting himself long time amongst the foremost, and there performing all the parts of a valiant Souldier, and worthy Captain, was for his notable Valor no less commended of his Enemies, than of his own Souldiers. The Battle was bloody and terrible, and many fell on both sides. But after that they with wonderful obstinacy had a great while fought with doubtful Victory, so that forty thousand Turks lay there dead upon the ground; at length the Victory began to incline to that side whereon stood the greater Strength, the juster Cause, and better Council. Many of the Enemies being slain, and many of his own People also lost, Bejazet was enforced to retire; which he did so leisurely, and without shew of any fear, that it seemed to the Beholders, he had well near as well gained as lost the Field; neither durst Solymán pursue him, but stood still in the same place, never moving his foot; any thing that he saw to be his Brother's back. But Bejazet after he had in contempt of his Fathers command thus run his own Course, and satisfied his own desire, though disappointed of his purpose, and not able to perform the journey by him intended into Syrus, turned now his Course, and began in good earnest to go to Amasia his appointed Province.

Solymán speedily advertised of the event of this Battle, forthwith passed over into Asia; for as the great Baffles his Counsellors thought it not convenient for him to go over the Strait before the Victory; so after it was certainly known, they thought it not good longer to stay, left the overthrow of Bejazet might give occasion to such as secretly favoured his quarrel, so to shew themselves, and so to raise greater Troubles. Besides that, the fame of his passage over, (as they said) much avail both to the discouragement of Bejazet, and the terrifying of his Friends; and therefore it was by them thought good, hastily to pursue him, now overthrow, and not to suffer him to gather Courage by the example of his Grandfather Solymán, Solymán Father; who had been more terribly vanquished than when he stood in his whole strength, and might seem by that means to have especially prevailed, for that he was at first unfortunately overthrown. Whether were these things without reason foreseen, for it is almost incredible, what admiration and love this battle (although unfortunate) did get to Bejazet; men wondered that he durst with so small a power, and as it were but a handful of Men, encounter with his Brother far better appointed, and also supported by his Fathers Strength; not fearing either the disadvantage of the place, or the Fury of the great Artillery; and to have behaved himself in the battle no less than a young Souldier, but an old and experienced Commander. Solymán might at his pleasure boast of himself as they said (to his Father) for the Victory; but Bejazet was the man that deserved to have overcome; and that Solymán might to any thing ascribe the Victory, rather than to his own Valour.

These and such like Speeches, as they made Bejazet gracious amongst the people generally; so doubled they his Fathers cares, and increased his hatred, to with him the rather dead. For why, he refused to sit down, not to leave any other Heir of his Empire than Solymán his eldest Son, always Loyal and Obedient unto him; whereas the other he abhorred as Stubborn and Rebellious, gaping after the Empire whilst he yet lived; of whom he was therefore so much the more to stand in dread, by how much he was reputed to be of more valour, and for the aid he had now so openly given to Solymán. For these causes he passed over the Strait into Asia, with purpose not to go far from the Coast, but as it were a far off with his favourable accident to countenance Solymán his proceeding; doubting by coming too near with his Army, to endanger himself by the sudden revolt of the Janizaries, which he above all things feared.

I myself (saith the Author of this History) saw him departing out of Constantinople the first of June in the year 1559, when as within a few days after, I my self was also sent thither; for the Baffles thought it not amiss to have me in the Camp, and to use me courteously as their Friend, for which cause I was assigned to lodge in an Inn in a Village near to the Camp, where I lay very well. The Turks lay in the Fields round about; but lying there three months I had good leisure and opportunity to see the manner of their Camp, and in part to know the order of their Military Discipline. So I attiring myself in such apparel as the Christians commonly use in those places, went up and down with one or two Companions at my pleasure unknown. First I saw the Souldiers of all sorts most orderly placed, and that, which he would scarce believe that knoweth the manner of our War, there was in every place great silence, and as a Man may say, dumb quietness, no bawling, no insolency, no not so much as a word or laughter passing in sport or drunkenness. Besides that, wonderful cleanliness, no Dunghills, no Excrements that might offend either the Eyes or Nose, for all such things the Turks do either bury or carry them far out of sight. They themselves so oft as they are enforced to discharge the burden of Nature, dig an hole with a Spade and bury it, so is all their Camp without filth. There was not to be seen any Drinking or Feasting, no Dicing (the great theme of our Wars) the loss of Money or time at Cards or Dice, the Turks know not. I met rarely with a rough Hungarian and his Companions, a Souldier, who heavy himself, to the Lute rather howled than sung doleful Dirty, containing the last words of a Fellow of his dying of his wounds upon the green Bank of Danubius, wherein he requesteth the River, because it ran to the place where he was born, to carry news to his Friends and Countrymen, that he died in an honourable death, and not unrevered, for the defence of his Religion, and honour of his Country; whereunto his Fellows fighting, bare a Foot, O happy and thrice happy, would Fortune with this change we might. For the Turks are of opinion, That no Mens Souls go more speedily to Heaven, than of such valiant Men as die in Battle, for whose welfare their Maidens daily make Prayers and Vows. I would needs know how they kill a young Souldier, where their Beasts were wont to kill a young Souldier, to be so bold, where I saw but four, or at most five Weathers hanging ready dried, and that was the Butchery for the Janizaries, which I deemed to be in that Camp not fewer than four thousand. I marvelled that so little Flesh should suffice for many Men; but I was answered, That few of them did eat Flesh, for that most part of them had their Victuals transported from Constantinople. Then I demanding what it was, they shewed me a Janizary sitting by, who in an earthen Dish had killed a Turnep, an Onion, a Head of Garlicke, a Parsenep, and a Cucumber, all fauced with Salt and Vineger, or more truly to say, with Hunger; whereas he fed as fastly as if they had been Feasants or Partridges; his Drink was the common Drink of all living Creatures, even fair Water. By which frugal kind of Diet, they provide both for the health of their Bodies, and the sparing of their Purse; and that I marvelled the more at, it was the time that their Lent was at hand; which time with us Christians, even in well ordered Cities, much more in Camps, all Rings with Playing, Dancing, Singing, Crying, Quaffing, Carousing, and in brief with Madding and Phrensie. So that it is not vainly reported, That a Turk sent about that time Embassador into Germany, coming home reported, That the Christians on certain days riot, and became mad, until they besprikled with a certain kind of Athes in the Church, came to themselves again, and so recovered; and that it was wonderful thing to see, how much they were changed by the efficacy of that remedy, that they seemed not to be the same Men; meaning indeed the disordered manners of the Christians at Sacroville, and the Ceremonies used on Almsweek day: Which thing they to whom it was told, so much the more marvelled at, for that the Turks have many medicines which cause madness, but few or none which presently ease the same. And these things I observed to go before their great Falls, change nothing of their wonted manner of Life to the worse; but rather contrariwise prepare themselves to abstinence, by taking somewhat from their usual fare, the better to endure the sudden change of their Fall; which they so precisely observe, that upon their fasting days they will not so much as taste a Cup of Water, or wash their Mouths with Water all the day long, before the Stars appear in the Sky; which maketh their Fasts, especially in Summer when the days be long and hot, to be unto them very tedious.

Whiles I thus lay in the Camp, there came unto me one Albertus a learned Man with certain Presents from the Emperor to Solymán, which were, certain gilt Plate, and a most curious Clock, which was carried upon an Elephant like a Coffin; and some Crowns to be dispersed among the Baffles; which Solymán would needs have presented unto him in the Camp in the sight of the whole Army, to make it the better known what friendship was between him and the Emperor, and that he needed not to fear any danger from the Christian Princes.

But to return again to Bejazet, from whom we have a while digressed; he after the Battle at Constantinople had retired himself to Amasia, the place of his Government, as though he would have now there quietly lived, if his Father would so give him leave. He had now satisfied his youthful desires and grief, and seemed willing from thenceforth to satisfy his Fathers better expectation; and therefore ceased not by Letters and fit Men to prove his Fathers mind. Neither did Solymán shew himself strange from such a reconciliation; at first he easily gave the Messengers audience, read his Sons Letters, and courteously returned answer; so that it was commonly reported in the Camp, that the Father and the Son would agree, and that the old Man would pardon pardon the youthful Frank already past, so that he would from thenceforth remain doubtful. But all this was by the Counsel of the Baffies, nothing but deep diffimulation in the crafty old Sir, until he had shut up Bajazet, and so got him alive into his hand; for it was feared, lest he despairing of pardon, should with such a power break into the Borders of Perfia (now the left place left for his refuge) as might prevent the watchful diligence of his Lieutenants upon those Frontiers; whom Solyman charged by continual Letters to stop all the passages into Perfia, as that there should not be any cranny for Bajazet to file out by. In the mean time, if any came within his reach that were suspected to have taken part with Bajazet, or favoured him secretly, those he caused to be tortured and secretly made away, and among them some whom Bajazet had of purpose sent to excite them.

For Solyman leaving left Tamas the Persian King (more mindful of his old Quarrels than of the late enforced Peace) should hardly with much ado suffer his Son to be got out of his hands if he should file thither, and so again raise a long and dangerous War, did therefore wait he possibly might to oppress him before he should come thither. Which his purpose although it was covered with all secrecy, yet was it not hidden from some of Bajazet's Friends, by whom he was oftentimes warned not to trust his Father, but to beware of Treason, and in any case speedily to provide for his own safety. But Solyman thinking he had now provided as that he could by no means escape, and happily the more to deceive his Son, appointed to recruit with his Army to Confemiole the day after the next day.

discovered
of Sebafia.

But Bajazet upon the very Feast day, having performed the solemnities thereof, commanded all his things to be trusted up at Amasia, and so far forward upon his unfortunate Journey towards Perfia; knowing right well, that he went to the ancient Enemy of the Ottoman Family, but yet fully resolved to make proof of any Mans mercy, rather than to fall into the hands of his angry Father. Now were they all far forward, except such weak Souls as were not thoughtful to endure the labour of so long a Journey, among whom was left Solyman, Bajazet's his youngest Son, but then newly born, which guileless Babe, with his Mother, Bajazet thought better to leave unto the mercy of his Grandfather, than to take him with him, a poor Companion of his woful and miserable flight; whom Solyman as yet uncertain of his Fathers Fortune, commanded to be Nursed at Perfia. Bajazet so commanded to Amasia, used such celerity in his Travel, that almost in every place he prevented the fame of his coming, and light upon many that were appointed to have staid his passage, before they were ready or aware of his coming. The Baffia of Sebafia he thus deceived; There was two ways, whereof the one of them being intercepted, would greatly hinder his Journey, and that the Baffia had already taken; wherefore he felt certain, as if they had been Fugitives, to tell the Baffia that he was already gone the other way. Which the Baffia believing, left the place he had before taken, and rising with all his power to pursue him the other way, whereby it was told him he was gone, left that way free and open for him to pass by.

Yea Baffia
of Erzurum deceived
by Ba-
jazet.

The Baffia of Erzurum he deceived also by another much unlike this; for whom when he was not far distant, and knowing that in passing through his Country, he was to endure great danger, he set upon him with a will, sending unto him certain of his Followers with commissions; who afterwards lamentably complaining of the young Princes calamity, to move the Baffia to pity, at last requested that he would give him leave to shoo his Horses in his Territory; telling him that he came unprovided of all things, and therefore desirous in that fruitful Country to refresh his Horses a day or two, and to new shoo them. Whereunto the Baffia courteously answered, that he would not let him to take whatsoever he needed. But whether it was for the compassion that he had upon the fate of Bajazet, or for the secret love he bare him, or that he thought by that means the easier to entrap him, is doubtful; and happily prevented by Bajazet quick speed, had not as yet sufficient time to draw together his Souldiers. He sent also unto Bajazet certain final Presents, seeming to be glad of his welfare and coming; who nevertheless kept on his way, resting no part of the day, and but a little of the night. The Baffia of Erzurum understanding that Bajazet came still on, made what haste he could also, and joining his power to the rest of the Baffies which followed after; for many Baffies and Sanzacks hearing that Bajazet was fled from Amasia, pursued fast after him, being charged by Solyman upon pain of their Heads to bring him back either alive or dead; but all in vain, by reason of his speedy departure, and for that he made more haste to fly, than they did to follow. Yet it cost no Man dearer than this Baffia of Erzurum, of whom we have now spoken, whereas Solyman of this cause displaced, and Solyman afterwards flew, with two of his Sons, young striplings whom he had before in despite shamefully abused against nature. Yea Solyman himself and Mahomet the great Baffia, with the Bergerberg of Grecia, followed also after Bajazet, though it were a far off.

This his departure grieved Solyman above measure, assuring himself (as the truth was) that he was fled into Perfia; which he would have been moved, that he could scarcely contain himself, but would needs have gone with all his power in all haste against the Persian, to have terrified him at hand from relieving his rebellious Son. But these his raging fits his grave Counsellors moderated, by declaring unto him what danger he should adventure himself upon, by reason of the doubtful faith of his best Souldiers. And what if Bajazet (as he was a deceiver and a fouldain Man) should in the mean time turn about above Pomus and the Fens of Motis, and so fetching a compass come to Confemiole, and proclaiming a general liberty in his absence, possess himself of the Empire. By which, whole persuasion Solyman staid his half a Journey; but Bajazet all the way as he went, writ upon the Gates and Doors, that he would give double pay to all such as should follow him; which caused Solyman's Captains to have their own Souldiers in distrust, and the more for that they might oftentimes hear amongst them, speeches of great good will and love towards Bajazet.

After long flying, he was at length come to the River Astrax, which separated the Turks Kingdom from the Persian; which having passed over, and yet not far in safety, he left certain of his Followers upon the Banks of the River to keep the Sanzacks (who still eagerly pursued him) from passing over; whom the Sanzacks easily repulsed, and so passing the River, entered a great way into the Persian Kingdom, until such time as that they were met withal by certain of the Nobility of Perfia with great Troops of Horsemen; who demanding of them what they meant, and what they sought for in another Mans Kingdom, were answered by the Turks, That they purified their King, fugitive Son. To whom the Persians replied, That they did not well, contrary to the League with their Lord and Master, to come in Arms beyond the Bounds of their own Kingdom; and that there was a strong League between King Tamas and Solyman, which it behoved them to regard; as for Bajazet, their King would consider what was convenient for him to do, and not in that point forget himself. In the mean time they should do well to get thence out of that Country wherein they had nothing to do. Whereupon the Turks forthwith left this pursuit and retired.

well entertained by the Persian King.

But by and by came Messengers from the Persian King to Bajazet to salute him, and to demand the cause of his coming, and also to see what strength he brought with him; which as some account was about twenty thousand. To whom Bajazet declared, That by his Brothers injuries and Fathers hard dealing, driven out of his Country, was fled unto the sacred Majesty of the Persian King, as his most assured refuge, who, as he well hoped, in compassion of Mans infirmity, would not reject him so distressed, and otherwise destitute of all help. Whereunto the Persian replied, That he had done very unwillingly to come unto him that was in League and Amity with his Father; whereas on one condition was, That they should account the Enemies of the one, the Enemies of the other; and the Friends of the one, the Friends of the other. Which Law to break, he accounted a thing utterly unlawful; nevertheless seeing the matter was so fallen out, he was welcome as unto his Friend, who in his behalf would leave nothing unattempted to reconcile him to his Father, which he desired to bring to pass.

So Bajazet the day after, being met with the Persian King, but in an evil hour, although at their first meeting there was great welcome, friendly countenance, cheerful looks, mutual kindness, often conference, and great feasting one of another; things whereby the secret thoughts of hollow hearts are best concealed; there was also a motion made of a straighter bond of alliance, and one of the Persian Kings Daughters promised to Bajazet one of Bajazet's Sons; and he put in hope that the Persian King would never rest in quiet, until Solyman had made him Governour either of Mesopotamia, Babylon, or Erzurum (which Governments were by the Persians greatly extolled) and that he might there live without fear of his Brother, far from him and his Father also; where if any thing should fall out otherwise than well, he might have his Brother the Persian King a sure refuge to retire unto, and so safe from all danger. Which speeches were happily given out, of purpose to avert Bajazet's thoughts from the feeling of the present danger; who seemed into himself to assure of the love and friendship of Tamas the Persian King, that at such time as he sent his Embassadors to Confemiole, for a reconciliation to be made between Solyman and him (as was commonly supposed) he would the first Embassador to tell his Father, that he had lost a Father at Confemiole, and found another in Perfia. But whether the Persian felt sincerely in this behalf for Bajazet by his Embassadors, which where many, may well be doubted. Like it is, that there was more fained show of double diligence, than of true meaning therein; and the rather to feed the mind of Solyman, than to do any good to the poor distressed Prince; and the rather, for that in the mean time all things were ferociously plotted that might end to his destruction. Which were no sooner grown to their full ripeness, but there was of purpose a motion made, That such a multitude as followed this young Prince lay so close together, that there was not in one place Victual sufficient for them, and that it was therefore more convenient to have them billeted in the Country thereabouts; which would be more commodious, as well for the better victualing of them, as for divers other purposes also. Truth was, that Tamas the Persian King, far unlike his noble Father Ismael, stood in doubt lest he brought up a Serpent in his Bosom. Yet there were many which thought, that it was not the Persians mind at first to have destroyed Bajazet, but to have been thereunto enforced by the practice of some of his Familiars and Followers, who not regarding the courtesy of the Persian King, nor the Laws of Hospitality, perswaded Bajazet to thrust him out of his Kingdom; whereof there was many evident Tokens. And among other things it was told King Tamas, that one of Bajazet's chief Captains should say, What mean we? Why stay we to kill this heretical King; and to possess his Kingdom? For we shall no doubt by his Treachery all come to destruction. And that upon such occasion the King was constrained to confend to a device more necessary than honourable. Bajazet had no great power, but most of them were valiant Men, and Souldiers of great experience, ready to adventure upon any thing; of whom the Persian not without cause stood in some fear. He knew his Kingdom to be neither ancient nor yet well assured, as gotten by his Father by the counterfeits of a reformed Religion; and who could assure him, but that amongst so many Nations over whom he Lorded, that there were many weary of the present State, and so desirous of novelties? Unto whom nothing could chance more fitting than the coming of Bajazet, a noble and valiant young Gentleman, and that more was desperately set; that as yet his might might right rather seemed in the power of his Guest, than he in his; and that therefore he was to alter the matter, and not longer to entertain him as his Guest, but to couple him up as a most dangerous wild Beast. Which to do, the easiest way was to disperse his power, and so to take him unawares; for that he could not without much Bloodshed be openly taken in the midst of his strength, especially by the dainty Persian, of long time not used to War, and as yet not come together; against Bajazet's Souldiers, Men of great activity and experience. So was the matter cunningly imparted unto him for the dispersing of his Forces, and all the Commodities to ensue thereof alleged; which Bajazet might not well gainsay, although many of his wile Followers (Men of great reach) did secretly suspect the sequel. But what could he refuse, upon whom necessity lay so heavy? Where no other hope was left? Where he lived as it pleased another Man; and that again too, where once to doubt of the fidelity of his Host, might be imputed to him for the greatest Treachery? So these most valiant Souldiers, the poor Princes faithful Followers, never again to see one another, are dispersed into divers Country Villages, and bestowed where the Persians thought good. Not many days after, at a time pickt out for the purpose, they in number few, and dispersed in a strange Country, were enclosed by many and plain; their Horses, Armour, Apparel, and whatsoever else, became a prey unto the Murderers. At the time influence was Bajazet and his Sons cast in Bonds alive, and that to the greater grief as many report, as he was sitting merrily at Dining with the Kings Table. The Persian King seemed to have fore-foreseen much in this his hard dealing with Bajazet: as if that he, being a valiant and courageous young Prince, and much better Soldier than his Brother, should have succeeded his Father in his Empire, much trouble and peril might have grown thereby, both to himself and his Kingdom: and that it stood far better with the safety of his Estate, that Solyman (a Man wholly given to voluptuousness and ease) should reign over the Turks: in whose time he might as it were promise unto himself all peace and security; and therefore it was thought that he would never let Bajazet go alive out of his hand, but rather make him away in Prison, as if he had there died for melancholy and grief. Well he was assured, that after he had slain his Followers, and imprisoned himself and his Sons, he would never be Friends with him that had so grievously wronged him. Bajazet thus shamefully imprisoned, Messengers ran continually too and fro betwixt the two old Princes Solyman and Tamur. Amongst the rest, the Persian King sent a solemn Ambassador unto the Turk with Presents, namely curious Tents, costly Carpets, an Alcoran containing the Myths of their Superstition, and certain strange Beasts. The cause of his coming was pretended to be for a reconciliation to be made between Solyman and his Son; which Ambassador was honourably entertained and feasted by the great Baffes. Now was poor Bajazet in small hope of life, his cruel Father still craving to have him delivered into his hands to be slain; and the Persian yet denying to deliver him, and seeming to defend him, but not (as was thought) altogether faithfully. Solyman left no means unattempted to have wrung him from the Persian, sometimes he spoke him fair, putting him to the trial of his League, wherein it was agreed, that they should both have the same Friends and the same Enemies; otherwise he terrified him with great words, and denouncing of War, except he would deliver him his Son: he furnished with strong Garrisons all the Frontiers of his Dominion towards Persia, he filled all Mesopotamia and the Banks of the River Euphrates with Soldiers, especially with them of his own Guard, and such as he had before used in the Battle against Bajazet; over whom commanded Mekmet Baffa the third of the Visier Baffes, and Selyman the Beglerbeg of Greece (for Selyman was soon weary of the Field, and so betime returned home:) he also incited the Georgian People to take up Arms against the Persians; who wisely answered, that they had not such confidence in their own strength, as to provoke King Tamur; but let Selyman himself come with his Army, and when they saw him present in the Field, then they knew what they had to do, and that he should then well see that they wanted neither discretion nor valour. And because he would leave nothing unproved, he made them as if he would in person himself have gone to Aleppo in Syria, and so have on that side invaded the Persian; neither was the Persian King altogether out of fear, having to his cost many times proved, that Solyman was able to do. But the unwillingness of the Soldiers, and their minds altogether estranged from that War, easily staid the raging Turk; they detested that War, and forsook their Ensigns, a great number of whom (especially Horsemen) without leave of their Captains returned to Constantinople; and being commanded again to the Camp, went indeed, but with such countenance and cheer as well declared how they were affected, and what they would do if occasion served for them to revolt.

that Bajazet could not alive be got from the Persian (excusing himself by fear of revenge by him whom he had so grievously offended, if he should by any means escape) he thought it best to follow that which was next, and to have him there slain; which he was in good hope to compass, and the rather, for that the Persian had but lately written unto him, that he could not but much marvel to see him deal so slenderly in a matter of so great importance: That he on his part had sent him divers Embassadors; and that he on the other side had sent him nothing but common Messengers with Papers, which caused him to think that he made no great account of the matter; wherefore he should do well to send unto him Men of account and place, with whom he might confer and spend also according to the weightiness and importance of the cause; besides that, he was (as he said) not a little in his debt, for that Bajazet and his Followers had been unto him no small charge before he could get him into his power; all which it were good reason he should have consideration of. Whereby Solyman perceived that Money was the thing the Persian King sought after; and therefore rather than he would in an unfit time of his life intangle himself in a dangerous and unnecessary War, he determined by the counsel of his Baffes, rather with Money than with the Sword to fight with the Persian King. Hereupon was Hassan Aga (one of the chief Gentlemen of his Chamber) appointed Ambassador into Persia, with whom was joined the Baffa of Marsa, a Man both for his age and place, renowned; who departing with a large Commission almost in the depth of Winter, set forth and wonderful toil by those long and difficult ways, arrived at last at Cabrin the Seat of the Persian King, having by the way lost divers of their Servants and Followers. Being come to the Court, the first thing they desired was to see Bajazet, whom they found shut up in a close Prison, pale and wan as a Man forlorn, with his Hair and Beard so long and overgrown, as that he was not to be known before he was new Trimmed, which done, then appeared the lively resemblance of his wonted countenance and favour, so that Hassan verily knew him to be him, for he had been brought up with him of a Child in the Court, and for this cause especially had Solyman sent him thither to be assured that it was he. At length after long discourse and conference between the King and the Embassadors, it was agreed upon, that the King should receive Bajazet into his own Palace, and that the charges he had been at, and of the harms by him sustained since the coming of Bajazet into Persia, with such further reward as so great a good turn deserved; which things performed, that then it should be in Solyman's power to have Bajazet made away. With this news Hassan posthast to his Master at Constantinople, who forthwith caused the promised Reward, together with such charges as the Persian King demanded, to be made ready, and with a safe convoy to be sent unto the Borders of Persia, where they were of the Persians received. Presently after returned Hassan the appointed Executioner of the unfortunate Bajazet; for so Solyman had traitly charged him to strangle him with his own hands. Which thing this new made Hangman accordingly performed, and with a Bow-string strangled the unfortunate Prince; who is reported to have requested of the Executioner, that he might but see his Children before he died, and take of them his last farewell, which poor request could not be granted, but he forthwith commanded to die. This was the woful ful end of the unlucky attempt of Bajazet, a Prince of far more worth than was Solyman his Brother, who in seeking to shun the death he feared, halted the fame before his time. Such was the Fathers end, was also the end of his four Sons, Omer, Amurat, Selyman, and Mahamet; of whom the three eldest were strangled at Cabrin with their Father, while dead Bodies together with his, were solemnly brought to Sofia and there buried. The youngest but new born left at Amasia, and sent by his Grandfather to Prusa (as is before said) to be there nursed, was now upon the death of his Father commanded by his said Grandfather to be strangled also. The Eunuch sent by Solyman to have done the deed, and loth to do it himself took with him one of the Porters of the Court, a desperate and otherwise a hard hearted Ruffian, a Man thought fit to have performed any villany; he coming into the Chamber where the Child lay, and fitting from the Bow-string to the Child's Neck, and so strangled him, the innocent Babe smiling upon him, and lifting it self up as well as it could with open Arms offered to have embraced the Villain about the Neck and kissed him. Which guiltless simplicity so wounded the stony hearted Man, that he was not able to perform the intended butchery of the poor simple Child, but fell down in a swoon and there lay for dead. The Eunuch standing without the Door, marvelled at his long stay, going in, and finding the Ruffian lying along upon the ground, with cruel hand performed that the other could not find in his heart to do, and so strangled the guiltless Child as had been given him in charge. Whereby it evidently appeared, that it was not the cause of the confusion of Solyman that so long he caused the guiltless Infant to be spared, but rather the opinion generally received amongst the Turks, who measuring all things by the good or bad success, refer all things that fall out well, unto God as the Author thereof, but they never so ungraciously begun; and therefore so long as it was yet uncertain what success the attempts of Bajazet would have, Solyman spared the Infant, left upon his Fathers good hap he might seem to have driven against the will of God. But now that his Father was dead, and his quarrel by the sentence of the Almighty, he thought it not good longer to suffer him to live, lest of an evil Bird might come an evil Chick. I had some time (saith the Reporter of this History) great reasoning with my Chiaus about this matter; for falling into talk with him of Bajazet, he began bitterly to inveigh against him for taking up Arms against his Brother. Whereunto (saith this Author) I replied, That in mine opinion he was worthy both to be pitied and pardoned, for as much as he was of necessity enforced, and was to take up Arms, or else shortly after to yield himself to the slaughter. But he still exclaiming against him I laid unto him, You blame poor Bajazet of great wickedness for bearing Arms against his Brother; but Solyman Solyman took up Arms, blame none, who upon like occasion took up Arms both against his Father and his Brethren; yet he therein did nothing amiss, nor in your judgment blame worthy. And rightly, (saith the Chiaus) for the event of the matter shewed sufficiently, that that which he did was done by the appointment of God; and that he was from Heaven predestinated thereunto; whereas in Bajazet the event shewed the clean contrary. So that which I said unto you well, be it by never so wicked means compassed or brought to pass, they take it as done according to the will of God;

but if it fall out otherwise, they judge it as a thing condemned by God himself; depending wholly upon the good or bad event of things, and therefore judging them to be well done, or otherwise.

This year 1558, Charles the Fifth that noble Emperor (of whom we have in the course of this History so often spoken) who the glory of the World; had two years before delivered all his hereditary Kingdoms and Principalities to his Son Philip, did now the twenty fourth of February, on which day he was born, by his Embassadors solemnly sent for that purpose, resign that Empire unto his all the Honours and Titles thereof, which he did the thirtieth of March next following. So living as a private Gentleman in that solitary life whereunto he had to the wonder of the World certain years before retired himself from all worldly Affairs, the one and twentieth day of September following died of a Fever, when he had lived eight and fifty years, and thereof reigned thirty nine; a Man no doubt to be worthily accounted amongst the greatest Christian Emperors that lived before him. About which time also died his two Sisters, Mary the Queen of Hungary, and Eleanor the French Queen, both Ladies of great Honour.

The Knights of Malta, who of long had been Sutors to the great Bifhop and the King of Spain, for the recovery of Tripoli in Barbary, about nine years before taken from them by the Turks; at which time they also surprised the Island of Zerbi upon the Coast of Barbary near Tripoli of Tri and Tunes, from whence they much troubled the Christians travelling by those Seas; had now at length so much prevailed, that the King commanded a great Fleet to be now forthwith made ready in September in the year 1559, to meet together in Sicilia, and from thence to go directly against the Enemy by Malta. Unto which Fleet, the great Bifhop, the Duke of Florence, and the Knights of Malta, with many other valiant Men out of divers parts of Christendom, joyined their Forces also; so that at length there was a hundred Gallies and Ships met together under the conduct of Andrea Gonsaga the General. But whilst this Fleet from divers places was long in coming thither, the Duke of Medina Celi came before with part of the Fleet to Malta, and in the Haven of Marsa Mauro expected the coming of the rest, who about the end of the year came thither. But whilst they were wintered expecting the Spring, many of the Soldiers fell sick and died. At length the time of the year fit for their march forward being come, the Captains consulted among themselves, Whether they should first set upon Tripoli, or the Island of Zerbi, otherwise called Mening. The Knights of Malta being of opinion, that it were better first to besiege Tripoli, and that with all speed, before Dragut should come thither to furnish it with Soldiers and Provision. Others thought it better, Armys might be relieved with plenty of all things necessary, and from whence they might at all times of danger in safety retire, and from thence afterward as time should serve, to go to Tripoli. Part agreed upon. Wherefore in February the year following they departed from Malta, and sailed directly to Zerbi. In the mean time, Dragut the famous Pirate of that time amongst the Turks, and Governour of Tripoli, was come thither with eight hundred of the Turks Janizaries, and had notably strengthened the City with Men, Victual, and new Fortifications; and presently sent Messengers to Solyman at Constantinople, to certify him of the arrival of the Christian Fleet in Africa. But the Christians, coming to the Island of Zerbi, were at the first landing encountered by the Moors, whom they repulsed, and so at pleasure landed. This Island is not far from the Main; here and there full of Bogs and Marishes, other River hath it none, and in the midst is somewhat Hilly. It was inhabited with about thirty thousand Men, which dwelt in low Cottages, simply apparelled; yet is the Island reasonably fertile, yielding Dates, Olives, Barley, Mill, and such like. When the Christians were there landed, they sent for Caravans a poor King amongst the Moors (from whom Dragut had before taken that Island) so use his counsel for their better proceeding in that War. In the mean time they agreed with eight thousand Men to besiege the strongest Castle in the Island; in going whereunto, the Spaniards went foremost, the Germans next, and the rest of all the Italians. By the way as they went they light upon ten thousand Moors which lay in ambush in a Wood, to have upon the sudden lay upon them unawares; but being discovered, and seven hundred of them slain in skirmish by the Spaniards, thereof fled. So coming to the Castle they planted their Battery, and laid hard Siege unto it. The Captain of the Galle finding himself too weak long to hold out, fled secretly with his Turks, leaving the Castle for the Moors to defend; who upon condition that they might in safety depart, yielded the Castle to the Spaniards; for keeping whereof, Vergara and Cerdas two Spanish Captains were there left with their Companies. Whilst these things were in doing, Caravans the Moor King came to the Camp of the Christians and there talked with the General; in whose hoary Countenance rested a royal Majesty; his Apparel was after the Moorish manner of white Linen, with him came also the King of Tunes his Son. In talking with the General his manner was to sit flat upon the Ground, and wisely discoursed how the Turks were to be removed out of Africa. But in the midst of these discourses, when such a thing was least feared, suddenly a Pinnace brought news from Sea, that Pia Bassa the Turks great Admiral was coming thither with a great Fleet of eighty five Gallies, and the same were daily repairing unto him on every side. Which was indeed true; for Solyman understanding from Dragut the Arch-Pyrate, that Ilard to be by the Christians now possessed and fortified, thought it not (in his so great power and flourishing Estate) to stand with his honour to suffer, but rather to give aid unto the Moors of that Island, a people agreeing in Religion with himself, and therefore commanded Pia Bassa the Admiral to take in hand that expedition. Who thereupon rigged up a great Fleet well appointed, and strongly manned with a number of the Turks best and most approved Soldiers, as well Janizaries as others; yet all both doubtful and fearful of the long Journey, as also of the time of the Enemies with whom they were to encounter; for why, the Turks had conceived a great opinion of the valour of the Spaniards, as knowing great Wars both of ancient and later times to have been by that Nation (to the immortal praise thereof) most happily performed; they remembered Charles the fifth, and daily heard much of King Philip, the Heir both of his Fathers Vertues and Kingdoms, which made them to be careful, that many of them before their setting forth (as in times of greatest danger) made their Wills, and so departed from Constantinople, taking their leave of their Friends, as if they should never have thither returned again. So that all the City was in a confused fear; neither was there any Man, whether he went or staid, that hung not in suspense with the doubtful expectation of the event of that War. Howbeit Pia with his great Fleet, with long sailing and a prosperous Wind was at length come well near as far as Malta, and knowledge thereof (as aforesaid) given unto the Christian Fleet at Zerbi. With which unexpected news the Christians there were not a little troubled; nevertheless they fortified the Castle with new Fortifications and Bulwarks, and fell to agreement with the principal Man amongst the Moors of the Island, who commanded the rest, and had before plucked down the Engines of Dragut, and set up the King of Spain (as he had before unto Dragut) six thousand Crowns, one Camel, four Callictricks, four Sparrow-Hawks, and four blew Falcons; a Tribute fit for such an Island.

But shortly after, viz. the ninth of May, the Great Master of Malta by another Pinnace gave the Christians at Zerbi again to understand, that the Turks Fleet was even now at hand, and already departed from the Island of Gozo, well appointed and strongly manned; and that therefore he advised them with speed to hoist sail, and to get them to some place of more safety, or else to come to him to Malta, for fear of being by so great a power of the Turks suddenly oppressed. Whereupon John Andrea the Admiral sent unto the General, requesting him to come aboard, that so they might before the coming of the Turks Fleet, retire themselves to some place of more assurance. But he for all that raised sail at the Castle, where the Spaniards had built four strong Bulwarks, whereof they had named one Amis, another Genoveses, the third the Viceroy, and the fourth the Knight; nor yet all perfectly fortified; as for the Castle it self they called it Philip Alcazar, by the name of the King. But whilst the General is thus busy, and vainly hopeth to keep both the Castle and his Ships, he the next day delaying from far the coming of the Turks great Fleet, hallooed with the Admiral to be gone; and putting out to Sea, was both times by a contrary Wind driven again into the Haven, so that he and the Admiral had much ado in time to get them into the Castle; for the Wind was so favourable for the Turks, and brought them so fast on, that the Christians dismayed with their sudden coming, knew not now well what to do, or which way to turn themselves. But by good hap, the greater part of the Ships and fourteen Gallies were got out and gon the night before, and the Great Master had in Arc called home his Gallies, wherewith and ten others of his own he afterwards defended the Enemies of his Island. As for the rest of the Fleet that staid for the General and the Admiral, some few Gallies escaped by flight, other some ran themselves a ground, ten of which were presently taken by the Turks, as were the rest also that were left, although they for a while thought they might have saved themselves. The night following, the Viceroy and the Admiral secretly stole out of the Castle, and so by good Fortune in two small frigates fled to Malta. Caravans also the Moor King, with the Prince of Tunes, got them away into the Main. Genoveses the Viceroy departing from Ilard into Sirila, provided as he might for the rest of that Country. Amis in the mean time gathered together the remainder of the dispersed Fleet, having lost in this unfortunate expedition seventeen Gallies, with a great part of the Ships.

Now

The Castle of Zerbi besieged by the Turks.

Now in the Castle was left as General, Don Alvarus de Sander, a valliant Gentleman of great spirit and long experience, with five thousand Footmen, some Germans, some Italians, but for the most part Spaniards; besides a thousand other that were no Soldiers. So that the Turks beginning to besiege the same the seventeenth of May, were by many times notably encountered, and in their assaults repulsed. Unto this Siege at length came Dragut the Pyrate, who with fifteen great Pieces which he brought with him from Tripoli, increased the fury of the Turks Battery. Neither were the Christians in the mean time wanting unto themselves; having in the Castle forty great Pieces of Artillery, wherewith they flew a number of the Turks and Moors; and sometimes falling out, fought with them hand to hand; and having slain and wounded many, retired again into the Castle. In this manner the Siege continued three Months with many an hot and desperate skirmish, during which time, nothing more troubled the Defendants than Thirst in that hot and dry Climate and intemperate time of the year; for why, in the Castle there was but one great Cistern, which although it yielded some good store of Water, yet was it not enough to suffice to great a multitude, but was by measure still sparingly given out to the Soldiers so far as it would serve, no Man having more allowed him than would suffice to keep him alive; the quantity whereof some augmented distilling of the Sea Water, and mingling it with their allowance; and so well eased their thirst, until such time as having spent all their Wood, they wanted that poor help also. There might a Man have seen many poor Souls lying upon the ground half dead, gaping and still crying out nothing but Water, Water; in whose dry Mouths, if any Man upon compassion vouchsafed to pour a little Water as Men revive at Men, they would presently sit up, until that for thirst they fell down again, and so at length as Men roasted gave up the Ghost. Thus many died daily, beside them whom the chance of War and other Diseases without help consumed in so great a distress. Don Alvarus the Governour considering the great extremity they were now brought unto, attempted with Don Sanchez de Leyva Admiral of the Neapolitan Gallies, Bolognino de Requesens Admiral of the Sicilian Gallies, and some others, by night to have escaped away into a Gally which lay under the Castle, but in doing thereof were perceived by the Turks, and so all taken. Whereupon such Soldiers as sickness and the Enemies Sword had yet left alive, pinched with extreme necessity, forsaken of their best Captains, and out of all hope of relief also, coveninging with themselves to live only with the Enemy, yielded themselves into most miserable Captivity. In this unfortunate expedition perished about eighteen thousand Christians, some with sickness, some drowned, but most slain, beside the loss of a great part of the Fleet also.

Of this Victory Pia sent news by one of his Gallies to Constantinople, which for the more manifesting thereof, dragged at the Poop thereof a great Ensign of the Christians, with the Picture of Christ Crucified therein. Which was no sooner come into the Haven, but that the rumour of the overthrow of the Christians was forthwith blown through the whole City, the Turks exceedingly rejoicing one with another for the news of so great a Victory; yea many of them not so contented, came by heaps to the Gate of the Town, where the Emperor Ferdinandus Ambassador lay, and there meeting with his Servants, by way of derision asked them, if they had any Brethren, Kinsmen, or Friends, in the Spanish Fleet at Zerbi, for if you have (said they) you shall shortly see them here. Besides that, they with many words most insolently bragged of the Christians; asking, who were able to withstand them, now that the Spaniard was also overcome? All which with much more the Embassadors Men with great grief were enforced to hear, but there was no remedy, seeing God had so appointed it. Shortly after, in September, the victorious Fleet returned to Constantinople, dragging with it the Prisoners, Spoils, and Gallies of the Christians; a sight no less pleasant unto the Turks, than heavy unto the Christians; and that night it lay at Anchor near unto the Rocks in the face of the City, with the greater Pomp and Glory to come the next day into the Haven. At which time Solyman himself was come down into a Gallery near unto the Havens Mouth, adjoining unto his Garden, the better to see the coming in of the Fleet, and the Christian Captains set there to view upon the Poop of the Admiral Gally, namely, Don Alvarus de Sander, Don Sanchez de Leyva, Don Bolognino de Requesens, all of late great Commanders; as for the Christian Gallies all difarmed and unrigged, so to seem the more contemptible in comparison of the Turks, they were towed at the Tail of the Turks Gallies. They which then saw Solyman's countenance, perceived not in him any sign at all of any inordinate Joy, I may self (saith Bolognino, then the Emperor Ferdinandus Embassador there) saw him two days after going to the Church with the same countenance he had always, with the same severity and gravity, as if this Victory had nothing concerned him, nor any thing chanced strange or unexpected; so capable was the great Heart of that Old Sir, of any Fortune, were it never so great; and his mind so sedate, so to receive so great applause and rejoicing without motion. Within a few days after, the Christian Captives (before almost starved with Hunger) were brought to the Court; many of whom could scarce stand upon their Legs, some others for weakness fell down and fainted, and other some died outright; they were all solemnly led in Triumph, with their Arms disordered and scornfully put upon them; the Turks in the mean time insulting round about them, promising unto themselves the Empire of the whole World; and vainly asking, Wherefore my they were to fear, now that the Spaniard was overcome? Alvarus Sander, as chief of all the Prisoners, being brought into the Divan before the Viceroy Bassas, and demanded by Rufan Bassa, What his Master meant, being not able to defend his own, to invade other Mens? answered, That it belonned not him to judge thereof; and himself to have but to do his Duty, which faithfulness was as meet to put in execution what he was commanded by his Lord, although he had no good Fortune therein. After that, he besought the Bassas upon his Knee, to speak for him unto Solyman, for that he had at home a poor Wife, with certain small Children, for whom he requested him to spare him. Whereupon Rufan Bassa (contrary to his manner) courteously answered, his Sovereign to be of a mild and gentle Nature, and that he was in good hope his Pardon might be of him obtained; so was he commanded away unto Caradine his Castle, towards the Black Sea. But he was not gone far, but that he was called back again; for that the great Chamberlain, a Man in great credit with Solyman, had not as yet seen him; for which cause he was sent for back again; wherewith he was not a little troubled, fearing lest the Bassias having changed their minds, would have put him to death. The rest of the Captives of the better sort were committed to the Cattle of Pera, and amongst them, Don Sanchez de Leyva, with his two base Sons, and also Don Bilinguer Requena; which two great Men, with Don Alvarus de Sandes, were nevertheless afterwards with much ado and almost beyond all hope, at the request of the Emperor, and by the dexterity of his Embassador, by Solyman set at liberty; although he had been denied them unto Solyman the French Kings Embassador, who had been an earnest intercessor for them. Yet before they were delivered out of Prison, the Mufti or Turks great Priest was asked his opinion, Whether it were lawful, for a greater number of Turks to exchange a few Christian Captives (for the Embassador beside the Rewards he had promised unto the Bassias, to further the matter, had also undertaken, that forty common Prisoners of the Turks should be set at liberty for them) whereunto the Mufti answered, That the Doctors of their Law were of divers opinions concerning that question, some saying that it was lawful, and some not; howbeit as then it was by him resolved upon, unto the more favourable part, and the exchange allowed.

There were amongst the Prisoners taken at Zerbi, besides these Noblemen of whom we have before spoken, two other noble Gentlemen right honourably Born, Don John de Cardina, Don Bilinguer his Son in Law, and Don Gafso the Duke of Medina his Son, to whom yet but a Youth, his Father nevertheless had given an honourable place in the Army. Of these two Don John had wily taken order for a great sum of Money to be left in the Island of Chio, by the way as the Turks Fleet went to Constantinople. From whence he afterwards secretly got into Genoa, but Don Gafso was by Pial Bassa (upon hope of a great ransom) purposely hid out of the way, which had like to have wrought his destruction; for Solyman having got an inkling thereof by the instigation of Rufan, laboured for nothing more than to have Gafso found out, so to have a more just occasion for the putting of Pial to death, being taken tardy in so manifest a fault. But all that labour was spent in vain, Gafso being by death taken away, but whether by the Plague (as some reported) or by Pial's means (as it were more like) left the truth should be found out, is uncertain. But certain it was, that being with great care sought for by the Duke his Fathers Servants, he could never be heard of more. So that it was thought Pial for the safeguard of his own life, not to have spared Gafso his Prisoners life. Who nevertheless for a long time lived in great fear, and not daring to come to Constantinople, took occasion with a few Gallies to wander about amongst the Islands of Ægeum, as if he had there something to do; but indeed for shunning the sight of his angry Lord, for fear he should have been compelled in Bonds to have answered the matter. Until at length he appeared at the request of Suleiman Bassa (the Eunuch and Solyman's great Chamberlain) and of Solyman, Solyman's son, granted him his Pardon in these words well worth the marking, out of the Mouth of an Infidel Prince: Well have he from me pardon and forgiveness for so great an offence, but let God the most just revenger of all villanies take of him due punishment after this life. So fully he seemed to be persuaded that no evil deed ought to remain without punishment, either in this life or in the life to come.

There was in this expedition a Colonel of the Turks well acquainted with Bushanque the Emperors Embassador, then lying at Constantinople; into whose hands (in that discomfiture of the Christians) by chance was come the Imperial Ensign of the Gallies of Naples; wherein within the compass of an Eagle, were contained the Arms of all the Provinces belonging to the Kingdom of Spain. Which fair Ensign the Embassador understanding him to purpose to give for a Present unto Solyman, thought good to prevent the matter, and to get it from him; which he easily obtained, by sending him two Sutes of Silk (such as the Turks make reckoning of) for it; so providing that one of the Imperial Ensigns of Charles the Fifth, should not to the eternal remembrance of that overthrow, remain fill with the Enemies of the Christian Religion. This so miserable a calamity received by the Christians at Zerbi, made that Island, before little or nothing spoken of, to be ever since famous.

About this time to end this unfortunate year which, the twenty fifth day of November died Andrew Auria (that second Neptune) being ninety four year old; a Man in his time of great fame, and of the greatest Princes of that age had in no small reputation, but especially of Charles the Fifth, in whose service he did much for the benefit of the Christian Common-wealth, being for most part employed in his greatest Wars against the Turks and Moors. Yet amongst all the notable things done by his immortal Glory, the kindness by him shewed unto his native Country was greatest; which oppressed by the French, he set at liberty; and when he might have taken upon him the sole Government thereof (as did divers others before him) he moderated his desires, and respecting the only good thereof, appeared the great diffention that had of long reigned therein; and established such a form of Government, confirmed with so good and wholesome Laws and Orders (no Mans liberty infringed) as that it hath ever since to his eternal praise, in great wealth, state, and liberty thereby flourished.

The Turks the year following, with their Gallies robbed and spoiled divers places upon the Coasts of Italy, Sicily and Malta; against whom Philip King of Spain sending forth his Gallies, by force of Tempest lost twenty five of them, the eighteenth day of September, together with Mendoza Admiral of that Fleet.

Ferdinand the Emperor, having with long sute and much intreating obtained Peace of Solyman, and being now well thricken in years, and careful both of the State of the Empire and of the advancement of his posterity, began to deal with the Princes Electors for a choice to be made of a King of the Romans; who after his death might without the trouble of Germany, succeed him in the Empire; commending unto them his Son Maximilian, a Prince of great hope, then King of Bohemia. Whereupon an assembly of the Princes Electors was appointed to be holden at Frankford; where their meeting at the appointed day, with general consent the twenty fourth day of November in the year 1562, chose Maximilian the Emperors Son King of the Romans, and with all the accustomed solemnities Crowned him; who also the year after was at Presburg the eighth of September with much solemnity Crowned King of Hungary. Unto this solemn assembly of the Empire at Frankford, Solyman the Turkish Emperor sent Ibrahim Bassa, otherwise called Abraham Siroca (a Polonian born, of whom we have before spoken) his Embassador with Presents and and Letters to Ferdinand the Emperor, to confirm the Peace for eight years between them both concluded; who the seventeenth day of November in presence of the Emperor, the King of the Romans, and all the Princes Electors, had Audience; where after much glorious Speech in setting forth his Masters greatness, with his love towards the Emperor and his Son the new chosen King, as wishing unto them all happiness, he delivered his Letters of credence unto the Emperor; the Copy whereof I have not thought amiss here to set down, for that therein is notably to be seen the most insolent Pride of that barbarous Prince, and miserable estate of the rent Kingdom of Hungary, divided as it were at his pleasure betwixt him and the Emperor.

I the Lord of Lords, Ruler of the East and of the West, who am of power to do and not to do whatsoever I please, my Lord of all Grecia, Persia and Arabia, and Master of all things which can be subject to King and Command; the great Worship of these times, and strong Champion of the most wide World, Lord of all the White and Black Sea, and of the holy City of Mecha, shining with the brightness of God, and of the City of Medina, and of the holy and chaste City of Jerusalem, King of the most noble Kingdom of Egypt, Lord of Ionian, and of the City of Athens, Senan, of the sacred Temple of God, Zebulon and Beniamin, and Rebuelin and Morad, the Seat and Throne of the great King Nathan Rattana, and Lord of the Island of Algiers, Prince of the Kingdoms of Tartary, Mesopotamia, Media, of the Georgians, Morea, Anatolia, Asia, Armenia, Walachia, Moldavia, and of all Hungary, and of many other Kingdoms and Territories, wherof I am Emperor; the most mighty Monarch Sultan Solyman, Son of the great Emperor Sultan Selym, who have grown from God to rule all People with a Bridle; and strength to break open the Gates of Babylon, and Cities and strong Places: two whose mighty hands have delivered all the ends of the World, none excepted. I the Ruler of the East, from the Island of Tybein unto the farthest Cape of Africa, whom God hath appointed a mighty Warrior in the edge of the Sword; amongst whose most mighty Kingdoms the impregnable Castle of Celarea is reputed for the leaf, and in whose hereditary Dominions the Kingdom or Empire of Alexander the Great is accounted for as aistle; with me is the strength of the whole World, and virtue of the Firmament. Forasmuch as thou King Ferdinand, which art the mighty Lord of Christendom, and the chosen Vessel of the mighty Christian Faith, created and elected Emperor of the Roman People, of Bohemia, Vandalia, Crabatia, and many other Countries King and Lord, &c. Not long since sent unto our Court (which is the refuge of all Kings, the protection and sanctuary of all that flee thence, and the Throne of Grace for all Princes of the time, which repair unto it) one Augerius Bassa, thy faithful Counsellor and Embassador, with Letters of consideration, to renew with us a Peace, and to enter into a farther league and bond of Amity: Which Letters bear date the year from the Prophet Jesu (upon whom and our Prophet Mahomet rest the brightness and peace of God) 1562, the first day of June, requesting us, That granting you Peace for eight years, we would not send any Hostility hereafter against your Cities, Castles, Countries, or Subjects, but to suffer them to live in Peace, Peace and Tranquillity, &c. Unto which your petition we answer you, That from henceforth for the whole space of eight years shall be betwixt us on both parts to be continued a new, true, and firm League; of which agreement, peace, and confederation, these shall be the conditions. First, That you our beloved shall be bound to send yearly to our Court as a Pledge of this

League thirty thousand Hungarian Ducats, with that remainder which you owe unto us for the two years last past; For which we promise unto you, that we from henceforth during this eight years League, will take no part either by war, or Hostility or Friendship with King Johns Son, forasmuch as belongeth to his hereditary Countries, whether they be in the better part of Hungary, or on the further side of the Tisla: All which for all that, by Law of Arms belong unto us. And the same King Johns Son in the time of this eight years League shall be bound in such sort to perform unto us his obedience, as that from henceforth he shall not be less of Hostility or War, or Hostility against you, neither to trouble your Subjects with Fire or Sword, nor to surprise your Cities, Castles, or Towns; or by violence to take away or exact of your People or Subjects, their Sheep, their Cattel, their Goods, Money or Revenues. We also our selves shall have no right, nor take occasion to drive away your People, to burn your Countries, to carry away any Captives; but rather in this eight years space religiously keep Peace and Concord with you. And under these conditions of Peace shall also be comprehended Michael Balachius, Nicholas Batho, with all their Goods and Territories, and divers other such like, which shall be subject unto you and King Johns Son. To be brief, if happily any of your or King Johns Sons Subjects shall have now been in time of War thrust into another one of his Gods, Lands, or Possessions, wherof new quarrels or such controversy, quarrel, and claims shall be deferred until this definite time of the League expired. Beside, if by chance any diffention shall hereafter arise betwixt us about our jurisdiction, which can by no means be composed and ordered; we will that yours shall in the mean remain as yours, and ours as ours; all contention and enmity (let apart) also many Towns situate here and there by Danubius and Tatta, shall be suffered to use the same Law which they did in former times; so that the Soldiers which are yet in the Garrison in the Castle of Tatta, shall have no right to insist or vex the Town situate near unto Danubius. Furthermore, if after this Peace concluded, any of your Noblemen or Gentlemen shall fortune to have any of our Noblemen by revolt or other occasion whatsoever, Captives, they shall deliver them and set them at liberty, to return unto their Friends freely without hurt or ransom; that so the Concord and Peace begun betwixt us, may be the more firmly kept, and our Subjects live in more security. All and every one of these things we grant, and promise to be of us from henceforth until the end of the aforesaid eight years, without all fraud or guile religiously observed and kept; and for that purpose have caused these our Letters of this Peace and Confederation to be published from our Royal Palace. And moreover, have not only provided, that the Copy of the same should together with our edict be proclaimed to all and every one of the Generals, Captains, Lieutenants, of our Armies both by Sea and Land, in all the parts of our Empire, and to all our mercenary Soldiers, but have also straightly commanded, that it shall be firmly and sincerely kept. We will also, that this agreement of Peace and Amity shall comprehend and concern our two chief Governors or Vayvods of Wallachia and Moldavia, so that none of your People of Hungary, Crabatia, Salvania, or other your Countries or Islands, whatsoever, shall in any sort be molested or injured by our Subjects. And if it shall fortune that some shall on your part one of their Captives set upon some Subject, or by force take away their Goods, the same Men shall in any case be bound to make thereof restitution. All else any shall flee from us, and carry away with them the Money or Goods of their Masters whom they served, or if the like shall be done by any of yours flying to us, then the same Goods on both parts are to be of right demanded and recovered again, and the fugitives to the example of others to be corrected and punished: forasmuch as fugitives Goods of right appertain unto their Lords and Masters. Furthermore it shall be lawful for your Captains and Commanders to forfist or build Castles, Cities, or Towns, in the Borders of Hungary, and to put into the same, Victual, Armour, and such like; but so, that they do none of these things out of their own limits. And during the time of this League, it shall not be lawful to take or carry away any of your Subjects Prisoners either into Hungary or in other places of your jurisdiction, which for all that, if it shall by any chance happen, that then such Captives without delay be suffered safely to return home again. Furthermore, whatsoever Christians shall have any business to do in our magnificent Court or any part of our Dominions, as are Embassadors, Officers, Servants, and such others; unto all these we not only grant and permit, that they may come and go about their business, and so again depart from our Court or Province; but also have willed and commanded them to be well and courteously entreated by our Subjects, and furthered with the interpretation of our Language. And if it should fortune any contention or discord to arise betwixt our Subjects on either side, about the Bounds and Limits of Lands, or other such like causes; such controversies we will to be decided and determined by discreet and indifferent Men on both parts, and the Authors of such discord and variance, to be punished as suspected persons and breakers of the League. We also prohibit those Skirmishes or Combats, which were wont to be sometimes on both sides made upon the Borders. And desire, that the form of this League and Peace, and every Article thereof, may be publicly read and set up in sundry places of your Dominions; and commandment given, that they may with due obedience and reverence be observed and kept. Which we likewise have now before promised faithfully and assuredly to perform; and your Embassador whom a few Months ago you sent unto us, in your name requested the same of us, and hath with earnest Prayer moved us, by Imperial Oath and the Letters of Credence to witness, that we did ratify and confirm the same; as if we our selves should speak to you in presence. Wherefore we have given to him these our Letters of Pacification to you directed, that your Generals, Soldiers, and Subjects, may be bound also to observe and keep all these things; wherefore, so long as nothing contrary to this League shall be done on your part; so long in like manner all these Articles of Peace shall be of us accepted and assured. For witness and confirmation whereof I swear this Oath: By the true and living Creator of Heaven and Earth, by the true signs of our great and reverend Prophet, by my Imperial Power, and by my true Faith; that nothing contrary or repugning unto the aforesaid Articles, Conditions, and Promises of the eight years League agreed upon betwixt us, shall be attempted or done by any our Governors, Generals, or Vayvods, &c. Commanding moreover, all our future Governors of our mighty Empire in Walachia and Moldavia, and King Stephen himself, and others which have the Government of our Empire concerning you, That they all and every of them as well as our selves, shall justly, faithfully, and religiously accept, reverence, and keep these conditions of Peace, towards your Subjects, Cities, Castles, Towns, and other things appertaining to you; and in the least thing not to hurt, injure, or wrong any your Subjects. In brief, we shall as far as our part concerneth us, give unto this most mighty and great new made love and friendship, so great honour, reverence, and authority, that which may even in the least things be bad, shall not on our part be wanting. In token whereof, we have justified certain Christian Captives, whom by your Em-bassador you requested to have set at liberty, frankly to return unto you without ransom; out of which Captivity they could never have been redeemed, if it regarded this our unity and friendship; nor had not we granted them liberty; trusting that you will in like sort set at liberty such of ours as you have Captives. Given at our Imperial Palace and Seat in the most mighty City of Constantinople, the first day of September, in the year of our great and reverend Prophet 960.

The same Embassador after he had delivered these Letters, presented unto the Emperor the Gifts he had brought from his great Master, which was two great Cups of natural Crystal curiously wrought and set with Stones of great price, a courageous Turkey Horse with a saddle and Trappings wrought with Gold, and set with precious Stones, and garnished with Chains of pure Gold; and four of the fairest Camels that were to be got in all Constantinople. In delivering of which Presents the Bassa made his excuse, that the Horse and Camels had lost their beauty, being with somewhat lean and weary.

This Peace thus concluded betwixt the Emperor Ferdinand and Solyman, held firm until after the death of Ferdinand, who about two years after in the year 1564 upon St. James's day died, being sixty years old; whereof he reigned as Emperor not full seven years. In whose place succeeded Maximilian his Son, before called King of the Romans. But immediately after the death of Ferdinand, the Captains on the Frontiers of that part of Hungary which was holden for the Emperor on the one side, and the Turks Captains with the Vayvod of Transylvania on the other side, weary of their ease, began contrary to the form of the League, to surprise strong Holds and Towns one in another's Confines, whereof ensued much trouble. The Archduke whereof Maximilian Balas the Emperor's Lieutenant in that part of Hungary which bordereth upon Transylvania, who first surprised certain Towns upon the Frontiers thereabouts; in revenge whereof the Vayvod suddenly set upon Sackmar a Town in the Emperors Territory, which he took, and therein Balas his Wife and Children. In despite whereof Balas ransacked and burnt Debrecin a great Town of the Vayvods. But not long after, the Vayvod Solyman's natural, aided by Moldavians, did much harm upon the Frontiers of that part of Hungary which belonged unto the Emperor; and first took Hadda, and afterwards besieged Ungar. In requital whereof, Maximilian the Emperor sent Lazarus Senni a valiant Captain; who with an Army of eight thousand besieged the strong Castle of Tokay, which he took the fifth of February, in the year 1565, and after that took the rich Town of

In the mean time Solyman, who had in himself fully prepared to berevenge of all these injuries (as well appeared by that he did the year following) to stay the Emperor from proceeding farther, until such time as he were at better leisure to be revenged, (for as then he was making great preparation for Malta) sent Marcus Linsinus a Renegade Transylvanian Christian, his Embassador to Maximilian to put him in remembrance of the League made with his Father, and to wish him to have regard how he further proceeded to the Breach thereof. Whereupon the Emperor, because he would not seem unwilling to hearken to peace, commanded his Lieutenants and Captains no more to invade Transylvania or that part of Hungary which the Turks held. bassador was thus entreating of Peace at Vienna, the Bassa of Transylvania in the Borders of Hungary, made divers incursions into the Borders of Hungary, and with six thousand Soldiers besieged the strong Castle of Jula, and the Turks in great number came daily into Transylvania. At which time also Senni General of Maximilian his Forces upon the Frontiers, by Messengers sent for that purpose, willed him not to give any credit unto the Turks Embassador, who meaning nothing but War, under the colour of Peace sought nothing else but to take him upon the sudden unprovided. Neither ceased these troubles thus, but daily grew from evil to worse; for in June the Transylvanians besieged Erden, before taken by the Imperials, and after two months Siege had it yielded unto them. In the mean time Solyman the Emperor's Embassador to Solyman, returned from Constantinople; assuring him, that the great Turk for all his fair words of Peace, meant indeed nothing but Wars, for which he was (as he said) making great preparation both by Sea and Land. Whereupon the Emperor began to raise new Forces; which thing drives Noblemen both of Germany and other places hearing of, came unto him with his Followers; and amongst other Romyus one of the Knights of Malta, and divers others of his Brethren, with five Companies of Soldiers well appointed, sent thither by George Hohenheim Grand Prior of that Order in Germany, and then confirmed one of the Princes of the Empire. At the same time also, the Turks being busie upon the Borders of Syria, and the places thereabouts, were many times cut off by Charles the Archduke, and taking them at an advantage, slew at one time three thousand of them. Yet for all this, the Turks Embassador was still at Vienna treating for Peace, and so cunningly handled the matter, that whereas Scimita Salva a valiant Captain, had corrupted the chief Judge with certain others of Alca Regale, to have betrayed the City unto him for performance whereof they had delivered their Wives and Children as Hostages, and he was now upon his way from Ra, which he but eight miles off, in an assured hope to have surprised the City; he was suddenly by Letters in post from the Emperor, called back again, for corrupting the hope conceived of Peace; and so was that notable designment unfortunately disappointed; of which practice the Turks having knowledge, afterwards most cruelly executed forty of the Conspirators, impaling some of them upon high Stakes, and hanging others upon Iron Hooks by the jaws until they were dead. Shortly after the Turks took Nafissa, which was not long after again recovered by the Emperor.

At the same time one of the Turks Spies was taken at Zigeah, who but thirteen days before was sent from Constantinople, of purpose to view the strength and situation of that place; he being brought before Charles the Archduke, and examined, said, That Solyman would assuredly the next Spring come in person himself into Hungary, to besiege the strong Castles of Zigeah and Jula. At which time also Count Senni took certain other of the Turks Spies, by whom he was certainly advertised of Solyman's coming the next year; and amongst others, Scapio Vayda the Bassa of Buda his chief Counsellor. Beside this, the Countreyses both to the Imperials and the Turks, were now straightly commanded by the Turks to pay no more contribution Money unto the Imperials; Whereupon it was easily gathered, that all that talk of Peace was as Senni had oftentimes written, nothing else but to delay the time, and to keep them in security. Beside that, the Turks made incursions daily into one place or other of the Emperors Territories, shewing their ancient hate, and sowing by those light Skirmishes, as it were the Seed of a greater War against the next Spring; which the Emperor now out of doubt of being also warned thereof by many Letters from his Friends, put from Garifonius into his frontier Towns, especially into Ra and Zigeah. But knowing that to be but a poor help against so puissant an Enemy, he resolved as his Father and Uncle had done before, to rest upon the strength of the Empire, and against the next year to call a general assembly of the Princes of the Empire at Augusta, for the better understanding of the common Enemy. The Wars thus beginning again in Hungary, Solyman at the same time in revenge of the manifold harms done unto his Subjects by the Knights of Malta, (whose hand he found ever against him in all his dealings with the other Christian Princes) made great preparation both by Sea and Land; purposing, as seemed by the manner thereof, to have raised the memorial of those worthy Men from off the Earth. Whereunto, beside the natural hatred which he bare against all Christians in general, and them above the rest in particular, he was much incited by Callanus, Barbarus his Son, King of Algiers, and Dragut Governor of Tripoli; by whose persuasions he caused a strong Fleet to be rigged up, commanding the Lieutenants and Governors of his Ports and Havens all along the Sea Coast, to put to their helping hands, and to be ready against the next Spring, And not long after understanding partly of his own certain knowledge, and partly by the relation of others, in what good forwardingness they were; he calling together a great assembly of his chief Princes and Men of War, delivered unto them his mind as followeth:

What thing I have this forty years always wished, was now to have so much leisure from other Wars, Oration to us to pluck out of their Nests, and utterly to root out to his purpose these cursed Pyrats, which cannot themselves be the Bulwark of Christendom: That some methinks on the insolence of Malta, I have by the favour of God and Muhammed his Prophet, at this time obtained. For we have so repressed the attempts of the Persians, that they cannot let us; and in Hungary, from whence certain dreadful motions were reported, we our selves will shortly do these things which shall enforce our Enemies to hide their Heads in the heart of Germany, and to flee to us for Peace. Your selves daily hear the piteous complaints of our Subjects and Merchants, whom these Malcontents, I say not Soldiers, but Pyrats, if they but look into these Seas, spoil and make prize of; whose injuries or revenge, all Laws both of God and Man require. Neither can this thing happen unto me more pleasing or more honorable, than if I may before I die accomplish these things; that is, to win Malta, and to leave all things in order in Hungary and Polonia; except perhaps some Man think it a harder matter for us to hope these cursed Companies from the Rocks of Malta, than for our Ancestors to have driven them from Jerusalem, and to quite out of Syria; and for our selves to have forced them out of the strong Island of the Rhodes. But this some with say is never won; Italy, from whence aid may easily be sent, and the place defended by a Fleet. Believe me, they will never adventure to give us aid, as Sea, who remember themselves to have been thus by us so often overthrown; Beside that, so little a place cannot contain any great Garrison; neither if it could, could it long feed them.

them. Wherefore unto this expedition we have determined with the first of the Spring to send a most strong Fleet; and even now we have already commanded all our Sea Captains and Adventurers which acknowledge our command, to be there present with their Ships. The King of Algiers will be there, the Garrison of Alexandria are in readiness; so also Dragut with his appointed Fleet. As for our own it is by mine own appointment rigged up; unto which Fleet I doubt not but that all the strength of the Fleet will give place. Which thing (worthy Captains) we speak, trusting upon the help of Almighty God and Muhammed his great Prophet, with your known and approved Valour. Now remaineth only, that every one of you think with us, how this War may best be managed, so as to refer your devices unto us; which that you may the better do, Lo, I have deliver unto you the situation of the whole Island, and project of all their Fortifications which we have received of most expert and skilful Men.

Solyman purpose thus made known, and the matter well considered, after that they which best knew the strong places and manners of the Maltese, had declared their opinions what they thought to be most expedient; it was decreed, That they should with all speed set forward; wherefore Victual and other things necessary for such an expedition being with wonderful celerity prepared, they expected but Wind. Of these things John Paletia a Frenchman, Grand Master of Malta and one of the Knights of the Order, being both by Letters and Men advertised (for he had always fit Men his Intelligence as Com-panions, who warily noted the purposes and actions of Solyman) was not afraid, but knowing that of God depended the Victory, and that Men were to watch, labour, and force; he assembled a Council of his Knights, and in few words spake unto them in this sort:

What Solyman prepareth (most noble and valiant Knights) and what a great War he provideth against us, you with me of late rights well understand, wherefore it is needful for me to use any long Speech with you concerning that matter. The Enemy is known, his insatiable ambition is known, his strength is known, and his mortal hate against us and the Christian Name is sufficiently known. Wherefore let us all as one first reconcile our selves to God, and then provide all things as shall be needful for the War. In brief, noble Knights, to reconcile our selves unto God, and to appease his displeasure, two things are to be performed; whereof the one consisteth in amendment of Life, with a holy Conversation; the other in the religious worshipping of him, with a firm and constant trust in his help, with Prayer, which we called Godliness. By these means our Ancestors obtained many Victories against the Infidels in the East. Neither is it to be doubted, but if we shall in these things join together, we shall also frustrate all the force and fury of this proud Tyrant. But first, much as God usually helps them which labour and take pains, and not the negligent and slothful, we must of our selves join unto them their help, which both our profession and the course of War requireth; which partly consisteth in our selves, and partly in the right Christian Princes. For Victual, Armour, Money, and other such things as in Wars are requisite, we will so provide, that no Man shall justly complain, that he is spared either cost or pain. I will not put all my store, neither will I for desire of life, expose my danger. As for the Christian Princes, I cannot persuade my self that they will lie still in so fit an opportunity, and in so great a danger, not of our estate only, but much more of their own. Verily I will not spare to exhort every one of them both by Letters and by Admonition, which in part we have already done; and I doubt not but we shall have aid enough from the Pope, the Emperor, and the King of Spain (such is their Christian Zeal) and they I hope shall move the rest: As for you, the Princes and every Light of this sacred Order, and the rest of our Brethren, most valiant Knights, I am well assured you will so fight for the most holy Christian Religion, for your Lives and Goods, and for the glory of the Lucine Name, against a most cruel Tyrant, the roter cut of all true Religion, of all Civility and good Learning, the Plague of the World, hated of God and Man; as that he shall feel the sting of the Cross which he so much contemned, even in the City of Constantinople, yea in his House of Pleasure. For we shall not have now to do with him in the Island of the Rhodes, nor from the help of our friends (from Asia, from Europe, from Egypt) fortified with our Enemies both by Sea and Land; but in the Isles of Italy and Spain, in places strongly fortified, from whence the Enemy may easily be circumvented; which that it may so fall out, let us not cease to pray unto Almighty God, and to crave his ready help.

When the Grand Master had thus said, all that were present promised with one assent rather to lose their Lives, than in any part to fail the Common Cause, or to come into the power of Solyman. After that publick Prayer and Supplication was made in every Church through the Isle, and three Colonels chosen out of all the Knights; one an Italian famed Emperor, another Bornean a Frenchman, and Quartus a Spaniard the third, all advised Men, and most expert Souldiers, who should with all diligence provide all things necessary for the War. By whose appointment the Suburbs and Trees which might any way be hurtful to the fortified places, were overthrowen, the Fortifications were thoroughly viewed, the Garrisons strengthened, and all manner of Provision most plentifully distributed; and Letters from the Great Master came unto the Great Bishop and other Christian Princes, requesting their aid against the Common Enemy. Messengers were also diffused into divers places, to certify both the Knights of the Order and others, of the Turks great preparation.

Solyman's Fleet departing from Constantinople the two and twentieth day of March, in the year 1656, kept a direct Course towards Peloponnesus, and so came to Methone where Malapsha Baffa one of the Turks greatest Captains, a Man of pie-ty and of great valour, and General of the Land Forces, mustered the Army, wherein were numbered seven thousand Horsemen of them which are of the Turks called Saphi; out of the lesser Asia, conducted by the Governour of that Country, and two Lieutenants of Sicilia, five hundred; and of the Island of Lesbos, now called Mytilene, four hundred; he had of the Janizaries four thousand five hundred, led by two Colonels appointed by Solyman; for that the chief Captain of the Janizaries, which they call the Aga, never departeth from the City but when the Sultan goeth himself: Besides these was a certain kind of Men amongst the Turks, who live of the Revenues of the Church; of them there was in the Army thirteen thousand, who had at Constantinople vowed their Lives for their Superstition. Out of Thracia and Peloponnesus were come two Colonels and one Lieutenant, with twelve hundred Horsemen, and three thousand five hundred Volunteers out of divers Countries. There also Piel Baffa Solyman's Admiral took view of the Fleet, wherein were found a hundred and thirty Gallies, two and twenty Ships

Ships for burthen, some greater, some lesser, besides one that was cast away near unto Methone, where was loft six thousand Barrels of Powder, thirteen thousand great Shot, and four hundred small Shot; besides these, there were ten Gallies from Spah; besides these, there were ten Gallies from the Rhodes commanded by Halpout a Man of twenty years; two Gallies from Mytilene, and about seventeen Gallies and other small Pyrats Ships. With this strong Fleet the Turks departing from Methone the thirteenth of May, arrived at Malta the eighteenth of the same Month, whereunto they had in the North-East part of the Isle, which the Inhabitants call the Cape of Saffre; but perceiving themselves not to be there in safety, they removed to another Port called Major.

The description
Malta.

The Island of Malta lying betwixt Africa and Sicily, might be doubted whether it were to be accounted in Africa or Europe, but that the ancient Cosmographers, and the Moors Language, which the Moors use in the places used, claim it for Africa; it is in length from the North-East to the South-West twenty Miles; and in the broadest place twelve. It regardeth Africa Southward, over against Lepus Parva; and Sicilia towards the North, but more towards Pachium than Lilybeum; and is in circuit about threefoore Miles. It seemeth to have taken the name of Malta, of Meli or Hony, whereof it yieldeth plenty. The Trees there bear Fruit twice a year, and they have oftentimes twice Harvest, especially of Barley and Cotten Wool; yet is the Isle in some places stony, gravelly, and bare of Wood; nevertheless it beareth Figs, Apples, Almonds, Grapes, and other Fruit Trees planted by the industry of Man, Date Trees also, but not fruitful; it beareth Thistles of such bigness that the Inhabitants use them for Wood. Fresh Water is there wonderful scarce, and such Wells as they have are filled with Rain in Winter, for in Summer they are either clean dry, or else the Water becometh brackish. The Inhabitants are so burnt with the Sun, that they differ little in colour from the Ethiopians; they are of a wholesome constitution of Body, spare of Diet, indolent, rather painful than Warlike, dying more for Age, than of Sickness; their Buildings, except it be in the City, which is in the midst of the Island, and in the Suburbs, are long and low (like unto the Moors) covered with Turf or Reed. It is commonly supposed, that Saint Paul was by Shipwreck cast upon this Island, but it is with greater reason to be thought that it was the other Malta in the Adriatic betwixt Coreyra and Illyria, and better agreeeth with that which Luke writeth of the Apostles Trouble and Shipwreck in the Adriatic, of which Sea it is not to be gathered by the Text, that Paul and the rest were driven. But again to our purpose; That side of Malta which respecteth Sicilia, hath in it many good Harbours and commodious Havens fit for shipping; where besides the Port of Marsa Saffre towards the East, where the Turks Fleet first landed, and the Port of Saint Thomas, with another called Scala not far off, it hath two other notable Havens, the one called Ajdout, and the other Marsamora, divided the one from the other by a narrow piece of ground; which with a ridge runneth in length from the South to the North almost in manner of an Island, having the Haven Major on the East, Marsamora on the West. Upon the head of this high ridge standeth the Castle of Saint Elmo, of great strength both by Nature and Art. As a Man entrench into the Haven Major, upon the left hand there are four Promontories, being far into the Haven on that side, almost in manner of Islands making to many Bays; upon the first standeth the Gallows, whereof also it taketh name; upon the very point of the second, on a rough and high Rock standeth a most strong Caffe, called the Caffe of Saint Angelo, whereunto adjoynd the Town, separated from the Caffe only with a Wall and a Ditch, and is placed in a hollownes cut out of the main Rock; strengthened also with the Sea and the industry of Man; and is of some called the Burg, of others the new City; in this Caffe resideth the Grand Master, and the Souldiers in the Burg; upon the third Promontory standeth another strong Caffe, which they call also the Burg of Saint Michael; whence the Sea runneth along the winding Banks almost into the midst of the Island, unto a place called Aqua Marcia. Again, after the Port Marsamora, Weltward is the Harbor of Saint George; and after that another called Bormora; then followeth the Port Saint Paul, no less than the Port Marsa Saffre; after which cometh the Port called Salinarum Sinus; but on that side of the Island towards Ajdout, is only one Port called Millaria; near unto the Island of Malta lie certain other little Islands, as Gaudin, now Geca, two other called Cumina, and another called Piper, all subject to the Maltese.

Thus much I have thought good to set down concerning the Turks Fleet, and for the description of those places wherein this great action was performed, the brute whereof then filled the World. Now that it is not to be amiss, in like manner to declare upon what strength, next unto God, Valetia the Grand Master stood against so mighty and puissant an Enemy. First, there was in the Island thousand and three hundred Mercenaries, some Spaniards, some French, some Florentines, and the rest of Naples; there was also a thousand Seamen of the Knights Fleet, and five hundred in the Town of Saint Angelo; and of the Country People which were fitted to the strong places five thousand. Men not altogether unskilful of the Wars; there were also five hundred Knights of the Order, besides Priests and Squires; for of these three sorts of Men are they which are called Brethren of the Order. This was the number of them which defended the Castles and Towns of Saint Elmo, Saint Angelo, and Saint Michael, whereunto they were proportionally divided; and in the City it self, which is called Mdina, being in the middle of the Island, was two hundred Souldiers and as many Citizens, with three hundred of the Country People all Horsemen, commanded by Jo. Vagso a valiant Captain. Besides this, every place was furnished with plenty of Victual, Armour, Weapons, Artillery, and whatsoever else was needful for the enduring of a long Siege, and that a War that should waste many things; and that which passed all the rest, Minds armed with invincible Courage against whatsoever should chance, which oftentimes maketh of the vanquished, Victors. All these things being in readiness and orderly disposed, as soon as they understood that seven and twenty of the Turks Gallies had put into the Haven Marsa Saffre, and were there landing their Men; Gym Admiral for the Order, a valiant and courageous Knight, marched thither with five hundred Hachelubiers, to have skirmish with them; but as soon as the Turks saw them coming, they retired again to their Gallies. On the other part where the other Fleet lay, two hundred of the Turks got on shore, met by chance with Riverius a Frenchman, and eight Knights more, who having his Horse killed under him, and some of his Companions slain, fell with the rest into the hands of the Enemy. Whilst these things were in doing, a certain Christian Mariner fled out from the Turks to the City Melita: who discovered the Enemies purpose, telling them, That the Turks by the appointment of Melipha had determined to have landed the greatest part of their Forces, presently have besieged some strong places; had not Pial Bassia the Admiral exclaimed against it, doubting to be left too weak at Sea; saying plainly, That he would attempt nothing before the coming of Dragut, who was every hour expected. For Solyman had expressly commanded, that they should do nothing without his Council: so great an opinion had he of his Policy and Valour. But whether this report was true or otherwise, the Turks for all that returning with their Fleet to the Port Adarschirach, landed twenty thousand Soldiers and five Field Pieces, and so intrenched themselves. This done, Pial Bassia with seven thousand went to view the Castle of Saint Michael: but for fear of the great Shot durst not to come nigh it; nevertheless they of the Town falling out, courageously skirmished with the Turks; in which conflict, Cursellum, firmaned Parda, accompanied but with one Spaniard, so furiously assailed the Enemy, that he took from him one Ensign, and flew one of the Samsack: a great Commander, with divers others.

The Turks land.

They of the castle of Saint Michael with only one Turk.

When Pial was come again to the Camp, the General began to consult with the other Captains, whether it were better to lay Siege to the Castle of Saint Elmo, or to the Town of Saint Michael: in conclusion it was agreed upon, that they should with all their Forces besiege the Castle of Saint Michael. And going up the Hill to view the Castle, they were encountered by the Garrison Soldiers, in which Fight some few were lost on both sides. Thus by degrees things growing hotter and hotter, the Grand Master thought it good to certify Garcias of Toledo Viceroi of Sicily, how things stood, that he might the sooner rig up his Fleet to come to their relief. Wherefore he commanded one Gally to put out of the Haven by night, and to pass over into Sicily, with Salvague, one of the Knights sent thither on Message. In the mean time the Turks cast up a Mount to have battered the Castle of Saint Elmo, and beaten the Gallies in the Haven Major, and so to have opened a way for their Fleet to have entered; but they were not able long to keep that Mount, for they had scarcely well ended the Work, but it was forthwith by the continual thundering Shot out of the Castle beaten down again; which thing greatly abated the Turks Courage. About that time, Obiad came to the Fleet with six Ships, drawn out of them which were left for the defence of Alexandria, and in them nine hundred Soldiers. The Turks beaten from their first Mount, cast up another on an higher ground, whereon they placed three great Pieces of Ordnance, wherewith they annoyed not only the Haven wherein the Fleet of Malta lay, but the Castle of Saint Angelo also, the Great Masters Seat, and with a rolling Trench drew nearer and nearer unto the Castle of Saint Elmo; which although they had at first in vain attempted, hindered by them which were in the Castle; yet at last with much labour and travel they brought it to perfection; for the Turks in that kind of work, Ilt performed by their multitude, are accounted to excel others. Wherefore in short time they placed their great Ordnance in such sort, as that they might batter both the Castles of Saint Elmo, and Saint Michael. There was in the Turks Camp a Gentleman of Spain, but then a Slave unto a Turk, who understanding the Enemies purpose for the besieging of the Castle of Saint Elmo, by a Christian Fugitive advertised the Great Master thereof: Whereupon he forthwith sent Corda and

Miranda with two Companies of Spaniards into the Castle, who were afterwards a great strength unto the Castle, and hinderance unto the Enemy. At length came Dragut Governor of Lepta, long looked for of the Turks, with thirteen Gallies, and in them a thousand and six hundred Souldiers; after whom followed ten Gallions from Bona, and in them two Companies. In the mean time Salvague the worthy Knight (sent before into Sicily) came to Melana, and having certified the Viceroi of the state of Malta, was by him commanded to return to Malta in a Gallie, conducted by two Gallies of the Great Masters; which having brought him near unto the Island, returned again into Sicily; but he with his Gallie (not without much manifest danger) in the third Watch of the night brake into the Town through the midst of the Enemies Fleet, with the loss but of one of his Followers. Where having delivered unto the Great Master what he had in charge from the Viceroi, he was the same night sent back again by the Great Master into Sicily, to certify the Viceroi. That he had need of more Aid, requesting him with all speed to send him some Supply, whereby he might the better hold out against the force of so great an Enemy. Salvague discouraged neither with the labour nor the danger, presently committed himself again to Sea, and in short time arrived in the Port of Siracusa, where finding the two Gallies he before spoke of, he sent them to Malta, as he had in charge, with four hundred Souldiers, among whom were divers Knights of the Order, and certain skillful Canoniers: willing them to thum the West part of the Island, whereas they must needs come into the Enemies fight, and to pass by the East end thereof, which was further about, but safer; and turning Southward, to land in the Port Milieres, and from thence by the low places of the Island to convey the Souldiers by night to the City Melita, which was four miles off, from whence they might easily pass to the Castle of Saint Michael. This order taken, he went to Melana, and there declared to the Viceroi the danger of the War, with the small number of the Defendants, requesting of him a thousand Footmen, which with those already fixed, he thought would suffice to hold out the Siege until he with his whole Fleet might come to relieve them. But whilst these things were slowly provided (which with much difficulties and delay could hardly be brought to pass, the Christian Princes as it were sleeping in so great a danger) the Turks upon the suddain the third of June the Turks assaulted the Castle of Saint Elmo, in hope with their scaling Ladders to get over that part of the Rampiers which was nearest unto the Bulwark of the Castle. But the Defendants, in the Ditch which before had no Flanker to scour the same, had of Earth and Faggots made a large strong Flanker, from whence the Castle also helping them, they valiantly resisted the Enemy, and filled the Ditches with the dead Bodies of the Turks. Who for all that, trutting to their multitude (wherein rather than with true Valour, they obtain so many Victories) thrust still on until they had by obstinate force (although long fight) gained the Flanker: whereby they commanded all that part of the Ditch towards the Port Marzamora. In which place they with wonderful celerity fortified themselves, that they could not be hurt by the Defendants; where in they were much helped by their own great Ordnance planted on the other side the Haven Marsa; for with it they drove the Defendants from the place, beat down the corner of the Rampier, and battered the Front of the Bulwark, whose whose height and greatest trouble the Enemy, but was not so commodious for the Defendants, for that it was made without any Flankers. But night coming on, five thousand of the nine thousand Turks which gave the Assault, tarried there; whereas the Christians constrained to forsake the place, retired themselves into the Castle. The Turks in the mean time covered with Tow and Earth, filled up the Ditch which was under the Bulwark, but neither of any great wideness or depth; which done, they gave a fresh Assault, wherein above eight hundred of them were slain, part Janizaries, and part Spahis, and besides them many wounded, of whom the most part remained in the Ditch, where they perished, and could not be relieved. Of the Christians was lost five and forty, amongst whom were five Knights of the Order, Guardamper an Avergois, Melina a Colonel of Narbona, Contida a Spaniard, Suma a Florentine, and Neine a German. The same night the Great Master thinking, as reason was, that they in the Castle of Saint Elmo might want help, sent two hundred of his Knights and as many other Souldiers into the Castle; who if they had been more, together with the four hundred which were before in the Castle, might have driven the Turks both from the Rampiers and the Flanker, and also kept the place longer. But forasmuch as the Great Master wanted Souldiers, and had therefore sent Salvague into Sicily, for new Supplies (as we have before said) he in the mean time courageously expected their coming, refusing no labour or pain; yet bewailing sometime with himself the unfortunateness of the Christian Princes, by whose negligence so fit an occasion for the overthrow of the Turkish Enemy was let slip: But above all things, he marvelled exceedingly that no help yet came: especially those two Gallies, which (as we have said) were in all haste sent by Salvague; but they by the Masters default kept not the appointed Course: for first whereas they should have stuned the West part of the Ile, and have turned towards the East, they shaped their Course Westward to the Island of Gaulis, which was afterwards affirming that he saw certain of the Turks Gallies lying before Port Meliera; which was afterwards well known not to have been so; for the truth was, that he for fear (whereby notable designs are many times frustrated) durst not go forward. Whereby it came to pass, that the Great Master was disappointed of so necessary a Supply; which thing much grieved both the Viceroi and others, but especially Salvague. For he saw it would come to pass, that if the Turks should take the Castle of Saint Elmo (the most assured Bulwark and defence of the Island of Malta) the other places must of necessity be brought into extremest danger, all the way to relieve them being there by shut up. And that it might be taken, seemed not to him impossible, the Enemy having already taken one Fort, and laying hard Siege almost on every side of that little Pile. The due consideration of these and such like things grieved the minds of skillful Men, especially seeing such slack preparation in a case requiring such present relief. Yet in the mean time Souldiers were taken up at Rome by the commandment of Pius Quirinus then Bishop, to be sent to Malta; and by his example to stir up other Princes to send Aid unto this sacred War, he gave an hundred thousand pound of Gold to Cambianus Legat for the Order, and commanded Gunpowder and other necessities for that War to be taken out of his Castle Saint Angelo, that so he might seem to be wanting in nothing that was in him to perform. Over these Souldiers, in number fix hundred, he appointed Pompeius Gelluma General, and he appointed Camilus Medicus his Legate to accompany him. With these went many voluntary Men, of purpose to lay down their lives for the eternizing of their Names in so religious a War, and that with such an ardent desire, as that every little delay seemed unto them a year. Wherefore coming to Naples, they there found John Andreas Auria with eleven Ships, the Prince of Poloponia with nine, Lancicus with three, and three others left forth by other private Gentlemen. In these Ships were embarked all those Footmen which came from Rome, and so transported to Melana, where the Kings Fleet was providing. But whilst the Christians make slow preparation, considering the greatness of the danger, the Turks not ignorant thereof, resolved to prove the uttermost of drawn together. For the Castle of Saint Elmo once taken, they assured themselves with more ease to carry the rest; for that thereby they should first have the Haven Marzamora in their power, where their Fleet might in safety ride so long as they pleased; and the rising ridge betwixt the two Havens was commodious for them both to batter the Town of Saint Michael, and to keep the Haven Major, so that none could without their leave pass in or out thereof. Wherefore upon these and other such like considerations they began again to batter the Castle of Saint Elmo, as it had been before Thunder; which furious Battery they continued by the space of four days together without intermission. The night following they suddenly with great force gave an Assault, and with their scaling Ladders had almost gained the top of the Wall; when the Christians desirous of nothing more than to come to handy Blows, drove them down again with such a violence, that never after they durst for fear of the Wall, until the very last conflict. Whilst things were thus hot at the Castle of Saint Elmo, Dragut his Souldiers upon a bravery, as if they had been the only Men, went to a place called Maria Scala, which is between the Gallows and Saint Thomas's Rode, as if they would have done more than the rest; which the Christians beholding out of the Town of Saint Angelo, to repress their insolvency, sallied forth upon them, and so welcomed them that they were glad after they had received a great loss, to be forthwith to retire to the place from whence they came. Of the Christians were slain Bonhomme a Frenchman, one of the Knights, and seven others.

Saint Elmo again assaulted.

The Turks repulsed.

The same time Manfrances was by the Great Master sent into the Castle of Saint Elmo, to command them as Governor instead of Brodia; for that he with watching and pains taken in defence thereof, was fallen sick. The same Brodia had many times before written to the Great Master, That the Castle was so well fortified and furnished of all things needful, as that he thought it impossible to be won by the Enemy; and so encouraged the Knights, and other the Defendants, that they fought against their Enemies with more than Mens Strength, and more Courage than is to be believed. Neither were the Turks for that discouraged, although they were with great loss still repulsed; but for certain days battered the Castle with greater fury than before, and immediately gave an Assault; for they had made a Bridge over the Ditch, of Mats and Sail Yards, of such a breadth, what opinion the three Knights themselves were of concerning the keeping of the Castle; of whom Caprius was of opinion, That the place was still to be defended, and that if he were there to command, he would undertake to perform it; and were rather to lose his Life than to forsake it, after he had once taken upon him the charge thereof. But Rocca the French Knight was far of another mind, and said plainly, that the place could not possibly be holden against so strong an Enemy; and that if Julius Caesar himself were alive, and saw to what trait the place was brought (especially all the Rampiers being either beat down or fore shaken, and such a power of obstinate Enemies lying round about it,) he would never suffer so many valiant Soldiers to be lost, but quit the place, and reserve his Men to a further service; for why, it was the part of valiant Men to perform so much as was of Men to be performed; but to strive to do more, was no Manhood at all; wherefore he thought it best to do that which Men use with Members mortified, whose recovery is desperate; in which case we doubt not to make a separation, so to save the rest of the Body with Life. The Spanish Knight in most parts agreeing with Caprius, said, That he thought it not good, that the place should so easily be forsaken; first, for that the Ditches and Bulwarks were yet defensible; and then because he saw so great a content among the Defendants, and such a cheerfulness to withstand the Enemy, which thing (as he said) prefigured Victory.

These opinions of the Knights thorowly in Council debated, and every particular well weighed, it seemed good to the greater part, that they retired were in the Castle should for certain days yet hold it out; especially because it was not the manner of the Knights of the Order chiefly to abandon their strong Holds, but rather to keep them to the last, that even therein the barbarous Enemy might perceive with whom he had to do, and to see his Pride abated. For if they should have forsaken the place, they might have been thought to have done it for fear; whereby the Enemies infolency might have been increased, and the honourable Order of those sacred Knights disgraced.

furiously assault the City.

But the Turks intensive to that they had before determined, the three and twentieth day of June assembling all their Forces both by Sea and Land round about the Castle, in the dead time of the night on every side set up scaling Ladders, made Bridges, wrought Mines, and with two and thirty great Pieces of Artillery battered the rest of the Walls yet standing, and presently gave the terrible Assault. The Defendants on the other side beat down some, repulsed other, slew many, ever more careful how to wound the Enemy, than to save themselves; and where he pressed fastest on, there to flew their greatest Valour. Great were the Outcries made on both sides, mixt with Exhortation, Mirth and Mourning; the face of the whole Fleet was divers, uncertain, cruel, and dreadful; and now it was the third hour of the day, when till the Victory stood doubtful, and had not the fury of the great Ordinance been so terrible, that it now had beaten down all the Walls unto the very Rock whereon the Castle stood, the Defendants might for some longer time have endured the Enemies Force. But the very Rock bared both of Walls and Defendants, and more than four hundred slain, a Man could now scarcely show himself, but he was presently flung in Pieces. John the Governor of the Castle, and Garras of Endeze, Men of equal Valour, Integrity, and Honour, were both slain with one shot; for a short and transitory Life made Partakers of Immortality together. Yet the rest which stood in defence of the Castle, nothing terrified with so great a loss and slaughter of their Fellows, but augmented rather as they were with new Courage from above, fought with greater Force than before, overthrow the Turks Ensigns now set up in the Castle, slew the Ensign-bearers, Captains, and Colonels; now respecting nothing more, but honourably to lay down their Lives for their Religion and the obtaining of immortal Fame. By this time the Sun was mounted to the middle of Heaven, great was the Heat, and Men exceeding weary; the murdering shot never ceased, and such was the multitude of the Enemy, that he first in fresh Men instead of them that were wounded. On the other side, the small number of the Christians, and those weakened by Labour, Watching, Thirst and Wounds, did what Men might; yet at length were overcome by a greater Force; and so the Castle by the Turks won, but with such slaughter of their Men, that it was a wonder that so many should be slain of the few. The Defendants were all slain, every Man in valiant Fight.

The Castle
of Saint Elmo taken by the Turks.

There may I not in silence pass over the inhuman and more than barbarous Cruelty of the Turks against the dead Bodies of the slain Knights, that thereby may appear, that Cruelty never wanteth whereon to shew it self merciless, yea even after death. The Turks after they had taken the Castle, finding certain of the Knights yet breathing, and but half dead, first cut their Hearts out of their Breasts, and then their Heads from their Bodies; after that, they hanged them by the Hoeks in their red Cloaks with white Croffes, (which manner of Attire they after an ancient Custom use in time of War, as they do black in time of Peace) in sight of the Castles, Saint Angelo and Saint Michael. And yet Mulapha the Turks General not contented, commanded them afterwards to be fast bound together, and so cast into the Sea, whose dead Bodies were in few days after by the Surge of the Sea cast up into the Haven Major and known by their Swords, were by the commandment of the formidable Great Master honourably buried. With which the Enemies most barbarous Cruelty he was so moved, that he commanded that no Turk should from that time be taken prisoner, but to be profrely slain. And thereupon all that were before taken, were forthwith put to the Sword, and their Heads cast over the Walls on that side towards the Enemy. From the beginning of the Siege to the taking of the Castle, of the Christians were slain three thousand three hundred, amongst whom were an hundred and thirty of the sacred Knights of the Order all worthy to be registred in the Book of everlasting Fame.

loss of the Castle St.
Elmo.

The Castle of Saint Elmo thus lost, Valenta although his mind (as he had good cause) was inwardly attained with exceeding grief, yet made semblance otherwise, because he would not daunt the minds of his Soldiers; telling them, that nothing was happened unpurposed, or unworthy of them. This was (as he said) the Will of God, and the chance of War, that sometimes one, sometimes another should be overcome; and that cowardly, not such Valour as was in them that were gone, gave occasion to living Friends to lament; yet that the Enemy was not for that to be feared, who had also recovered such a loss, as he might thereby rather seem conquered, than a victorious Conqueror; whereas the loss of his Knights was recompensed with Honour and Immortality; things that will sufficiently inflame all noble minds to behave themselves valiantly. As for himself (he said) that trusting not in his own Strength, but in the help of Almighty God, he had not yet cast off the hope of Victory.

his Letters to the Governour of

Victory over the relics of the discomfited Enemy; and that he well hoped, they were all of the same mind, wherein he most joyfully respected them to persevere unto the end. When he had thus said, he being a Man armed against all Fortunes, withdrew himself a little aside; where calling many things in his troubled mind, he determined to send Letters to Petrus Mesquita, Governour of the City of Melita, to certify him and the Knights of the Order that were at Messana, and the Viceroy, of the loss of St. Elmo; the Copy whereof, because it is in this evident appearance the Christian mind of him the Great Master, I have thought good here to set down as followeth:

Whilst the Knights are setting forward, in the mean time chance the miserable misfortune of the Castle Saint Elmo; which although it brought unto us that grief you may easily imagine, we for all that, as if it had happened by some secret appointment of God, have taken in that part, that he as a most merciful Father purposed thereby to warn us, but not utterly to destroy us. Neither do I think it lawful to doubt of his mercy and power. Yet for all that, I may nevertheless complain, that we are of them forsaken of whom is least befitted. So that in the space of seven and thirty days, wherein our most valiant Soldiers endured all the force of the Enemy (which truly was done rather by the power of God than of Man) we were hapless of our own (which owe so much unto us) not so much as with the least help, which they might officiously have sent us. But I list to ascribe it, whatsoever it is, to God, of whom alone we have hitherto received so many good things, so rest we in hope hereafter to receive also. For, for any thing that I can see, we must now trust to Mans help forasmuch as we could by no Letters, no Diligence, no Prayers, no Admonitions, and to be brief, by no Commands move them, who of all others ought most to have obeyed us. The friends of the time suffered us not to arrive to the Victory of this thing, it shall be your part to certify both him and other our Friends thereof; who if they had obeyed our command, or aided us with never so little a supply of Soldiers, happily we had not lost the Castle St. Elmo; in defence whereof we have lost the best part of our Soldiers. Wherefore except the Viceroy make haste to deliver us from this Siege, I fear that he cannot in time come; but especially if we be here besieged before the coming of those our small help which we as in a Dream have promised unto our selves, and which we now scarce hope will be in time present. For all that, we do not distrust of God his love and providence; by whose divine inspiration the rare courage of the Viceroy being in sort: time stirred up, will hasten hither to relieve us. For all our warfare consisteth in celerity. Our Enemies having drawn all their Fleet into the Haven Major, Moxet, are busied in cleansing the Castles, and repairing the Breaches, that they may afterwards the better able them against us. Wherefore upon the sight of these our Letters, send unto us the Captains Catherin, Belcarac, Belmek, and Zoricius, with their Companies, that we may use their faithful and valiant service, God of his mercy send us aid from some place, and keep you. Fare you well, from our Castle St. Angelo, the twenty fourth of June, 1565.

Mesquita having received these Letters, commanded a Galliot forthwith to be launched, and therein embarked Musius Cadenellus, one of the Knights; to whom he delivered both the Letters of the Grand Master to him, and others of his own, almost of the same purport, directed to the Knights of the Order which lay at Messana, requesting him with all speed possible to pass over with them into Scilia.

In the mean time Mulapha the Turks General sent a Messenger to Valenta, and with him an old Spanish Captive, with promise of liberty if he would go with his Messenger to the Town, to talk with Valenta concerning the yielding up thereof, and to try if he would by any means come to agreement; who coming to the Town, the Turk first waiting at the Gate, the Christian was let in, and brought to the Great Master, to whom he declared what he had in charge from the Bassa. But as soon as Valenta heard of the name of composition and yielding, he was so filled with indignation, that had he not been a Christian, he would presently have commanded him to have been hanged. Wherefore he gave him choice either to tarry till in the Town, if he thought so good, or else forthwith to return and tell his Companion, that if he got him not Packing quickly, he would send him farther off with a great frock. With this short answer the Turk suddenly returned into the Camp. Whereupon Mulapha fell into such a rage, that he openly professed, never from that time to forbear any kind of cruelty against the Christians. He was then with Mulapha one Philip, of the most noble Grecian Family of Lascaris, who of a Boy taken Prisoner by the Christians in Patras, a City of Achaia, and by them honestly and courteously used, was therefore ever after well affected toward the Christians; he privy to many of Mulapha's designs, by a certain divine motion thought he should not a little profit the Christians by reviving unto them; wherefore he resolved to file unto the Castle of Saint Michael. Which thing when he had oftentimes considered, at length the first of July he cast himself into the Sea (as by Land he could no way escape) and swum to the Castle, not without danger of his life; for discovered by the Turks, he was many times shot at both with their Arrows and small Shot. He, brought to the Great Master, revealed unto him many of the Enemies Secrets, and also advised him what was best to be done at the point of Saint Michael, to frustrate the Enemies purpose for the assailing of that place; with many other things, which were unto the Defendants no small help; and afterwards as often as need was, during the Siege, fought valiantly against the Turks.

Whilst these things were in doing, Condellus Escort, as we have before said into Scilia, came in safety to Messana where he found the Christian Fleet not yet ready to relieve were the distressed Maltese; for the Spanish Ship which was come, and John Andreas Juria with eight and twenty Ships was ready to return to take in four thousand Footmen, taken up in Etruria by Capitius Vitellius. Which backwardness the Knights of the Order considering, and what danger was in delay, after they had well debated the matter amongst themselves they resolved by the power of God by all means possible to help their Brethren. And for this expedition chose two most fit Generals of their own Fellows (the Commanders of Messana and Baroli) who forthwith went to Garras the Viceroy, declaring to him what things the sacred Knights of their Order had done, not for the King of Spain only, but for the Christian Common-weal, and also what great charge they had been at the year before in the Panionian expedition, wherein they had neither spared Ships, Victual, nor Munition, for their own Lives, to profit the King and the Christian Common-weal. Besides this, they beought him well to consider, that the loss of Malta concerned not the sacred Knights only, but all Italy, and especially Scilia, for the nearness of

So troublesome and puffed an Enemy. For these and other like reasons, which the shortness of the time suffered them not to rehearse, they requested of him four thousand Footmen, with whom all the Knights of the Order which were there, and many other noble and voluntary Men would make all possible speed to relieve the besieged, which they had before in vain attempted; with which strength they were in good hope, if not to repulse the Enemy, or to recover that was already lost, yet at least to stop and stay his farther proceeding, until such time as he having rigged up and brought forth all his Fleet, might set upon the Turks, and (as was to be hoped) vanquish and disperse them. But whilst the Viceroy having heard their request, considereth what answer to make, a Messenger came unto him from Spain, but with what command from the King (although Mon-guessed diversly) could not be known. But upon his coming, the Viceroy gave the Knights this cold answer, That he could not grant what they requested, for that in losing he should dishonour his Fleet, and not be able afterwards to relieve them as he desired; but if it pleased them to transport the Knights with part of the Bishops Soldiers into the Island, they might do so with their own two Gallies they had already, whereunto he would also join another of his own. The Knights when they could obtain no more, accepted of that which was offered.

Which being resolved forward, those four Gallies whereof we have before spoken wherein were embarked eighty Knights and six hundred other Soldiers, having at Sea suffered many troubles by the space of twenty days, could not as yet arrive at Malta; and because the Viceroy had commanded that they should not land, except they first knew whether the Castle Saint Elmo were still in the hands of the Christians, they sent out a Frigate to land, promising that day and the next to carry in the Sea for her return. In the mean time a great Tempest suddenly arising, it so fell out, that the Frigate could not at the appointed time return; wherefore the Gallies which expected her coming, fearing lest the had been either by Tempest lost, or by the Enemy intercepted, retired unto Pozolo a Port upon the Coast of Sicilia, nearest to Malta, there to expect some good News; where as soon as they had put in, they understood that Saint Elmo was yet defended; whereupon they put to Sea again, with purpose to have arrived at Malta. But when they were within two Leagues of the place where they thought to have landed, they saw a Fire there which caused them to mistrust that the place was possessed of the Enemy, and that he lay thereabout to intercept them; wherefore they returned again to Pozolo, where now understanding of the French Knight come from Malta, that that Fire was by his commandment, as a sign that they might without fear come forward; they with all speed made again for the same place, and at length the nine and twentieth day of June about midnight landed at the Black Rocks on the South side of the Island toward Africa, and unseen of any got in haste to the Castle of Saint Michael joyfully received, and there staid to expect what the Great Master should command. In the mean time it fortuned, a great foggy Mist (which seldom times there chanceth) to arise so thick, that a Man could hardly see for it; at which time a Boy of twelve years old looking by chance out of a Window in the Castle of Malta, suddenly as one afraid cried out, that he saw a Turk going from the City to the Castle of Saint Michael. Which thing some of the Knights hearing, ran presently out that way, and found a Greak of the City Malta, who brought back and examined (for that without the Governors pass it was not lawful for any Man to go out of the City) confessed, That his purpose was to have advertised the Turks of the coming of those Soldiers, that if they might have intercepted them as they should have come from Malta to the Grand Master; for which Treason he was as he had well deserved cut in four pieces. Three days after; this new Supply came from Sicilia, in the first Watch of the night came all in safety from Malta to the Grand Master, except two or three Boys, who overcharged with Armor and other Baggage, were not able to keep pace with the rest. It could not be told, how much the besieged rejoiced at the coming of these their Friends; and especially Valletta, who seeing the Flower of his Knights and other Soldiers; as it were by Divine Providence come unto him; with tears trickling down his Cheeks, and his Eyes cast up to Heaven, said:

I thank thee, O Heavenly Father, which hearest the prayer my Prayers, and pesterest not with the rest, this little flock of Valletta. Whose words with reviving Wolves: these are the Words of thine everlasting Goodness, Mercy and Providence.

These new come Soldiers requested of the Great Master, as a Reward of their Pains, That they might be put in Garrison into the Town Saint Michael, a place now most laid unto by the Turks; which thing they (commending the Great Master's easily granted; yet for all that removed not the old Garrison. These fresh and courageous Soldiers desirous of nothing more than to fight with the Enemy, the next day sallied out, and having slain two hundred of the Turks, and wounded as many more, without loss of a Man returned, every Mans Sword imbrued in the Blood of his Enemy. Which thing Musapha the Turks General hearing, knew it was they who came into the Town; and thereupon fell in rage with his Captains, as that they had by their negligence entered. But the suspicion grew most upon them that were appointed for the keeping of the utmost part of the Island; which was the more increased, for that three Gallies of Algiers had withdrawn themselves away; so that he neither trusted them nor the Renegade Christians, who as occasion served fled daily from him. For which cause he gave out Proclamation, That none of them should lie by night out of the Gallies, and that such as did otherwise, should therefore be burnt; or impaled upon sharp Stakes; and changing his Warders, appointed Sale with his Gallions, whom he thought to be more faithful, for the keeping of the Island. And that neither they nor the Christians should be able to attempt any thing, he chained together diverse Gallies in the Entrance of the Haven Marzamacco, and caused the rest of the Fleet to ride nearer together than before. But because exceeding many were at that time sick in the Turks Camp, of the Flux and other Difficulties; three places were assigned for them; one for the wounded Men near unto Aqua Meisita, guarded with two thousand Turks; another in the Pools of their Ships and Gallies for the Turks Volunteers; and the third amongst the Bulwarks, where the enforced Christians were cured. At the same time, Musapha appointed Ochli Bassa Governor of Tripoli; instead of Drago before slain; who going thither with five Gallies; and having fed all things in order there, returned again unto the Camp. With him the Bassa had sent two Ships loaded with Corn to Tripoli; there to make Bread, whereas they began to feel some want in the Camp. He also sent Salech one of his Colonels to Solyman, to certify him of the

the winning of the Castle St. Elmo, and to deliver unto him the description of the Island of Malta as they found it at their arrival; and further to declare unto him, That he found the Malfes stronger and better provided; than was at his setting forth supposed; wherefore if it were his pleasure longer to continue the Siege, he should find a new supply of Men, Victual, and other Warlike Provision; which if he did, he would then be in hope to take the other strong places of the Island also, though not so soon as was at first supposed; and that in the mean time whilst he expected Answer, he would not fail to do what he possibly might. And because he would not seem to have written an untruth, he began his battery in fourteen places with 70 great pieces of Artillery, amongst which was three most huge Basilisks; for from the Gallows Promontory to Aqua Meisita, and from thence to the Castle of St. Elmo, wherein he had placed 300 Janizaries, the Turks had inclosed all that compass with sturdy Bulwarks, Trenches, and Moones, from whence they with their thundering Shot day and night incessantly battered the Towns and Castles of St. Michael and St. Angelo, overthrow the Walls, beat down the Bulwarks, and brake down the houses in such terrible manner, that scarce any could be safe therein; which of all others most troubled the fearful Women and Children. But the Turks in their Trenches retired in, and so they stood, as if they refused not to stray far out of the Camp, but trusting upon their multitude, and that not many times without their loss being cut off by the Horsemen of the Garrison of Malta, who were ever ready at their heels.

When the loss of the Castle St. Elmo was known at Rome, the City was filled with mourning and heaving; the Romans were sorry for the dishonour, and some feared lest the Gallies of the Malfes should redound unto themselves. There was also amongst others, a certain envious and foul-mouth'd kind of man, altogether ignorant and unacquainted with Martial Affairs, who thamed not to lay the blame of the loss of St. Elmo upon the Grand Master; whom both his own Valour, with the worthy Testimony of so many famous and valiant men as were there present with him, as also this History gathered out of the true light of things there done, shall both for the time present and for all Posterity sufficiently acquit of so false a slander. But he will easily blemish another mans name; that Barseth not his own; neither can Ignorance rightly judge of the counsels of the Skillful or Cowardise, of valiant deeds.

But to return again to our purpose: we said before, that three Gallies were made ready at Meliana; in setting forth whereof, they which had the Charge used such diligence, that the seventh of July they departed out of Harbour. In them (besides the Knights of the Order) were imbarqued 600 Spaniards, and 300 of the Great Bishops Soldiers, conducted by Pompeii Columbus; the Mariners were part hired, part Slaves, to whom liberty was granted, if they would willingly do their endeavour to get into the Haven, and to be accounted of as the rest of the Soldiers were. And because they would relieve the besieged not with Men only, but with Victual also, they put into the same Gallies five hundred bushels of Wheat, beside Gunpowder, Salt-petre, and Lead for Shot. And although it was thought a most hard matter, by the Haven itself to enter into the Island, the Turks notwithstanding it and all the places thereabouts, nevertheless there was in the Knights such an earnest desire to relieve their Brethren, that they promised both to themselves and others, all things easie and safe. But when they began to approach the Island, they sent a Scout before, to understand by signs from the Castle of St. Angelo, whe-ther they were to proceed forward or not; who returned they so far that they might discover the sign, perceived thereby that they should retire. Which thing the Turks perceiving also, presently with the smoke of their great Ordnance and other things, they so obscured the Air as with a thick Cloud, in such sort as that those signs were no more to be discerned; but all in vain: for why, the Men had already desiered them; so those three Gallies returned again to Sicilia. For, Valletta that good Prince thought it not meet to bring so many of the sacred Knights, to many noble Gentlemen and valiant Soldiers, into a most manifest danger: for he saw certain of the Turks Gallies to lie by night in the mouth of the Haven Marza Moset, at a place called The Little Salts, to impeach the going in or out of the Haven Major. About the same time, they which lay in Garrison in the City Malta, hearing of the notable Sally made by the Soldiers lately come, and taking heart thereupon, at such time as the Turks were fetching in a certain booty of Cattel, the Horsemen purified them, and having slain divers of them, recovered the prey; and yet not so contented, chased them even to their Camp. But the other Turks seeing their Fellows flying in such haste towards them, raised an Alarm, ran to their Generals Tent, and for that time ceased their battery.

The Great Master probably conjecturing, that the Turks would in short time assault both the Town and Castle of St. Michael, thought good by his preference to encourage and strengthen the Garrison; and therefore was about to have gone thither by a Bridge made of Boats from the one point of the Land to the other, between St. Michael and St. Angelo; but quickly understanding the certainty thereof, returned again into his Castle. Some there be that think, For him to have to do, done had been a ventures part, and full of danger, and therefore to have been discommended; for that great things are performed, not so much by strength of body as of mind, by politique counsel and direction, wherewith a General (although absent) may yet win his Forces be always present; but the General once lost (which may easily happen if he will prefer his Person to the danger) we see most commonly all fall together with him, no otherwise than do all parts of the Body when the Soul departeth. But other some are of contrary opinion, That the Generals preference, especially in great dangers, is both praise-worthy and most necessary; for that he, as the Soul, cannot provide for, or rule the body, except he be present, yea placed therein; and that Valletta in so doing, followed the Examples of the greatest Kings and most famous Generals; as of Alexander the Great, Julius Caesar, Themistocles, Marius, and others; whose words unto their Soldiers were these, My self will be your Conductor in the field, in the battel partaker of the danger with you, you shall be in all things as my self. Besides that, who knoweth not, that as in other things, so most of all in Martial Affairs, all things are better, more orderly, and more easily done when the Master is present; neither was the learned Poet his meaning any thing else, when in the Wars betwixt the Latins and the Rutilians, he saith, Urget presens Turm; whereupon they concluded, that the Great Master in going had done both valiantly, wisely, and according to his duty. But this we leave for martial men to determine.

At the same time the King of Algiers came to Aid the Turks with seven Gallies and ten Gallios, and in them 2200 Souldiers, who forry that he was not there at the beginning, and desirous to do some notable Act, and withall to make proof of the Valour of his Souldiers, requested the great Bassa to bestow upon him the first place in the besieging the Castle of St. Michael's, which he not only granted, but joyed to his Forces 2000 of his own best Souldiers. These things obtained, he commanded ninety small Vessels by devices to be carried over land out of the Port Marza-Moxes to Aqua Maria, for that he purposed on that side to besiege the Castle by water. But Valista perceiving the Enemies purpose, both by seeing that was done, and also advised before by a Christian Fugitive, presently called unto him two hundred Gallies, and Ship-Masters of Malta, and imparting the matter unto them, demanded what they thought best to be done to keep the Turks from landing, as it seemed they purposed at the Walls foot. They quickly perceiving the matter, answered, That in their opinion, if a Chain were made of Malls and Sail-yards as Spars joyned together with iron rings, and so drawn all alongt from the corner of the Castle of St. Angelo, to that place whither the Enemy thought to land, their purpose might be so defeated. This device so pleased the Great Master, that the night following such a Chain was made, and fast mored in the appointed place. The Turks so soon as it was day perceiving this bar, stood as men doubtful, not knowing how by any means to land their men, as they had before purposed. Whilst they stood so abashed, a Christian Fugitive a most desperate Villain (in which kind of foolish hardiness, valour, and desperation, confanacy) came to the King, and promised him to break the Chain, and so with a Hatchet in his hand cast himself into the Sea; after whom followed two or three more to help him; who swimming to the Chain, got up upon it, and began to hew space with their Hatchets. Which the Christians beholding, suddenly five or six of the Maltese swam thither with their drawn Swords in their hands, and having slain two of them, caused the other to fly; after which time none of the Turks was so hardy as to attempt the fame. The barbarous King for all that gave not over his purpose so, but with wonderful diligence prepared for the Siege, which the fifteenth day of July began both by Sea and Land. But the Defendants turning their great Ordnance upon that place from whence the Gallies came, with the fury thereof (in the space of three hours, which the Assault endured) flew two thousand Turks, and sunk twelve of the Gallies; the rest coming as fast as the Chain, when they could get no farther, nor land their men, turned their Prows upon the corner of the Castle, but were glad at last to retire and leave that they came for, undone. The assault by Land also endured five hours, whereina many of the Turks were slain; and of the Defendants 200, amongst whom was Fredericus the Vice-Roy of Sicilia his Son, struck in the head with a great Shot, Gordine a Frenchman, Franciscus Sanehera and his Nephew John, Spaniards, all Knights of the Order: Medina was also wounded, whereof he afterward died. But Valista considering into what danger the State of Malta was like to fall, if he should be constrained to fight many such fights, where his Souldiers wearied day and night without rest, were still to encounter with fresh men, and heard nothing of any Aid or new Supply: the 17 day of July sent a Messenger into Sicilia, who swam from the Castle to the farthest part of the Bay to Aqua Maria, and from thence escaped unknown through the midst of the Enemies, unto the City of Malta, and so in a little Frigate came to Mejjana. By him the Great Master sent Letters to the Vice-Roy, requesting him to send him his own two Gallies with those Knights which were at Mejjana, and such other Souldiers as might be sent by transpo; willing them, that as soon as they came to the Island, they should hover off aloof before the Haven, ready upon a sign given to thrust in. The same time that this Messenger arrived at Mejjana, came thither also the Fleet from Spain, wherein were many of the Knights of the order from divers Nations. The Vice-Roy desirous to send these two Gallies to Valista, sent Letters before unto him in several characters by two Frigates, wherein he certified him that he would send the Gallies, requiring to have from him some sign whereby they might at their coming know whether they should enter or retire; which Frigates taking divers courses, one of them laded with Medicines, as was afterwards known, was intercepted by the Enemy; the other although the came in safety to Malta, yet for as much as all the passages betwixt the Castle of St. Michael and the City Malta, were certain days before by the diligence of the Enemy shut up, and three which had used to pass too and fro, intercepted and most cruelly executed; and besides that, the Haven straightly kept; the Knights of Mejjana could have no further direction from the Great Master, for the safe sending of the two Gallies; yet nevertheless because he had requested them, and they themselves were of the same opinion (as he had before written) that what the least advantage of a little part is left to be feared; they thought it good to adventure them, yet with this regard, not to expose all those Knights to so great a danger, but of them all to send only forty, with a convenient number of other Souldiers, and with them Salazar a Spanish Captain was sent by the Vice-Roy to be landed on the Island Gaulos, who should afterwards from thence in a Boat (for that purpose rowed along by the Gallies) pass over into the Island of Malta as a Spy, to take view both of the City and Enemies Camp.

In the mean time the Turks mindful of the loss received in the Assault of the Castle St. Michael, and desirous of revenge, did so violently batter the Castle with their great Ordnance, that what the Defendants repaired by night, that they fell beat down again by day; and in time of battery made a Bridge, which the 20th day of July before the Sun rising they laid over the Ditch, that they might as if it had been upon even ground, come to fight hand to hand with the Christians. Which seen, and quickly perceived what danger it might bring, by and by Parisio the Great Masters Nephew, and Aleria, both Knights, with certain mercenary Souldiers failed out to have burnt the Bridge, but were so received of the Turks, that they were almost all slain together with Parisio and Aleria, and yet the Exploit superperformed. The Turks without ceasing continued their furious battery until the eighth and twentieth of July, which day in the Afternoon they in divers places assaulted the Castle; thrice they with fresh and new Supplies relieved their repulsed and wearied Souldiers, and so fiercely maintained the Assault, that they made no doubt but that day to win the Castle.

But the Defendants with no less resolution withstood them, repelling them with their Weapons, with Shot, Fire, and Force, and at length inforced them with no small loss of their men to retire from the Walls. This Victory so encouraged the besieged, that now they made small reckoning of the Enemy; but so far as our men always spared their great Ordnance but in time of fight, and failed not out as they were wont, the Turks thought that the Garrison was but weak, and that Shot and Powder grew scarce in the Castle. Yet decied in both, for that it was rather of purpose, than for want, so commanded by the Great Master; who hearing nothing of the coming of any Aid, and seeing the Enemy to give daily more fierce Assaults, would not vainly spend his most necessary helps. The Turks perceiving what little good they had done with their often Assaults, determined now to prove what might be done in undermining the Castle, and almost brought one of their Mines to perfection before it was by the Christians discovered; and to the intent they should the less mark it, they caused two Gallies to come as near as they could to the Walls, and to batter that place; in hope that whilst our men gazed upon that was done openly, they should the less regard what they were working in secret, that so they might in the mean time more easily get into the Castle. But the besieged careful of all that was to be cared for, perceiving their purpose, with a countermine defeated their Mine, and by the courageousness of certain of their Souldiers, but especially of one Ancient, drove out the Enemy, who having cast certain pots of Wild-fire before him into the Mine, and following presently after with a piece of Fire-work in his hand, forced him out. For which good Service he was by the Great Master rewarded with a Chain of five pound weight. Almost thereupon because of vertue springer vertue, which still rethens upon Difficulties, the next day, which was the first of August, the Bridge which we said the Enemy had made over the Ditch, was by a fallly made by the Defendants burnt down with Fire and Gunpowder cast upon it; which was in good time done; for the next day, the Sun now declining, the Turks again assailing that part of the Castle where Carulus Rufus had the charge, were by our men valiantly repulsed. This Assault endured three hours, in which time 300 of the Turks were there slain; and of the Knights, Rufus himself and Barefus, with certain mercenary Souldiers. At this time the Christians were by the Enemy so shut in with the multitude of great Ordnance, that they could not so much as look into the Ditch or thence themselves, much less fallly out, but they were presently fer off. Yet did they not for all that make spare of their lives when occasion was given them to perform any notable Exploit; as appeared by Calderonus a Spaniard, who seeing some viewing that part of the Wall which the Enemy had most battered and shaken at the Castle Bulwark, doubted not to fallly out, but was presently taken with a Bullet and slain; which mischance when it might seem of right to have terrified the rest from attempting the like, did indeed the more incense them; so that when they saw the Enemy exceeding busy in filling the Ditch, they resolutely set down to offer themselves to most assured death, rather than to fall into the hands of the merciless Enemy, agreed to fallly out by night, and to meet with his designs. Whereupon an hundred, part Knights, part other Souldiers, falling forth, caused the Enemy to forsake the Ditch and betake himself to fight, of whom they flew about fourscore, and lost of their own, many; amongst whom were Joannes and Mauritius two Knights, whose heads the Turks the next day set up upon two Spears upon their Trenches, that they might be seen by the Christians.

The same day, they of the City of Malta at night made at one instant a number of fires, and as if it were in triumph discharged great Volleys of small Shot, with many other tokens of joy; which as well the besieged as the Turks thought verily to have been done upon discovery of the Christians Fleet, or else the landing of such Forces as were come to remove the Siege; whereas indeed it was neither, but done only to shew their cheerfulness, and to keep the Turks in silence with the novelty of the matter; who for all that were not slack in their business, but with Earth filled up the Ditch at the Castle Bulwark; whereby it came to pass that they could not be hurt but the flankers made in that place to four the Ditch, but might thereby, as upon plain ground without flay pass unto the Wall, now opened and overthrown with their continual battery, and with two great Pieces (which they had planted upon a high Mount which they had newly cast up on the right hand the Bulwark Savours) they began to play upon the Castle, and at the first shot, shot into the Loupe where Franciscus Castilian Spanish Knight, Joannes Bernandus Gordinus a Spanish Knight, were there slain with a small shot. The same day Franciscus Aquilatus a Spaniard, one of the Garrison-Souldiers, perwaded by fear and hope (in dangers two evil Counsellors) fled out of the Town St. Michael to the Enemy; perwading the Turks Colonels to give a fresh Assault, assuring them that they should without doubt win the Town, because there was but 400 Souldiers left alive in the Castle, and as he said, almost all the labour and wounds, all the rest being dead. Which the Turks hearing, and seeing fair breaches both in the Walls of the new City and of the Castle of St. Michael, wide enough for Carts to go through, they determined with all their Forces to assault both places at once, and to prove if there were yet so much strength left in those Holds, as again to repulse them; so the 7th day of August at one instant they assaulted the new City at the Castle Bulwark, and the Castle St. Michael at the breach, with such a multitude, that all the Earth seemed to be covered with men round about. The thundering of the great Ordnance, the noise of the small shot, with the clattering of Armor, and noise of Trumpets, Drums, and other War-like Instruments, with the cry of men on both sides was so confused and great, as if Heaven and Earth should have been confounded together. Which when the Knights in the City Malta heard, and saw the Heavens obscured with smoke, fearing that the Turks (as at the Castle St. Eimo) would never give over the Assault until they had won both the Town and the Castle; presently all the Garrison-Horsemen issued out of the City, and to avert the Turks from the Assault, set upon those Turks which lay at Aqua Maria; who all surprised with sudden fear, fled, the Christian Horsemens hardly pursuing them with bloody Execution, and they in their flight piously crying out upon their Fellows for help. Whereby it came to pass, that they which were assailing the City and Castle, to rescue their discomfited Fellows, were glad to give over the Assault; so with great slaughter foiled on both sides by the Christians, they returned to their Trenches, when they had lost about fifteen hundred at the Assault, beside them which were slain in the chafe by the Horsemen of Melina. Of the Defendants of both places were slain above an hundred, and almost as many wounded. This fight endured about five hours. Pascala delivered of so great a danger, that day and certain others, caused publique Prayers to be made, and went himself with the multitude of the Citizens to the Church, to give Thanks to Almighty God for that Victory.

Whilst these things were in doing, Garcia the Vice-Roy was advertised from Melina, that certain Ships led with Men, Victual, and other provision necessary for the Wars, were coming from Constantinople to Melina; wherefore he forthwith sent Alamira and Gildandrada two Noble-men, with five Gallies to meet them; who being come within thirty miles of Melina, met with no such Ships, but only one Frigate and a Galliot; the Frigate they took, but the Galliot escaped to the Enemies Fleet at Melina.

Melissaphis the Turks General now thinking no man so strong which might not with continual labour and watching be wearied and overcome, resolved not to give unto the besieged any time of rest, but commanded his Souldiers again to assault the breach at the Castle of St. Michael's, where they were by the valour of the Defendants, with no small slaughter quickly repulsed; neither did the Baffa give to many assaults, for the hope he had to win the places, but rather to perform the duty of a valiant General, and to satisfy Solyman's pleasure, who had expressly commanded, either to win that Island, or there all to lose their lives. He also sent a Galliot in haft with Letters to Solyman; wherein he shewed him the state of the Fleet, with what difficulties the Army was distressed, what small hope there was of winning the places besieged, how well the Christians were provided, with many other such things.

In the mean time those two Gallies of Melina (which we have before spoken of) departing from Melina, came to Syracusa, where they stayed a day. The next day after, in going out of the Haven, they met with one of Melina in a small Boat coming from Pascala fore wounded; he being demanded how he was hurt; told them, That landing by his Boat and one Companion, he was requested by two Sicilians which dwelt there, to rest there that night; which they doing, about midnight five Turks brake into the house upon them, killed his Companion, carried away the Sicilians; and he wounded as he was, hardly escaped by the benefit of the night; moreover he said, That the Sicilians had told the Turks, that two Gallies were come into that Port, with Souldiers and other Warlike Provision bound for Melina. Whereby the Knights perceived, that their coming would be discovered unto the Enemy, and that it was a most dangerous thing, or rather impossible to get into the Haven of Melina, as they had before purposed; nevertheless, to conduct Salazar with his little Boat, they kept on their course. But as they were sailing, the two Gallies were come one Galliot going before them, who seeing the Gallies coming after them, made with all speed to Melina; and were no doubt those Gallies, from whence those five Turks came, which had done those things which the wounded Melissaphis reported. For all that, these Gallies kept on their course as far as Pascala, from whence they certified the Vice-Roy by Letters, all that had happened, and not daring to go to Sea, the South-wind blowing with a stiff gale against them, they returned back again to Syracusa, expecting there farther direction from the Vice-Roy. For which cause, they forthwith sent one of the Knights to him to Melina; by whom they received answer, That they should go on farther, but to stay for the coming of the whole Fleet, ready in short time to pass over to Melina. But Salazar brought by the Gallies to Pascala, resolved with his little Boat to go on; and although the day he departed thence, the Air was troubled with great Wind, Thunder and Rain, yet the day following, proving more calm, he in short time arrived in the Island of Melina; and came in safety to the City Melina; and there disguised himself in Turkish Apparel, and taking with him one Companion, who could also speak the Turkish Language, by night got into the Enemies Camp; where diligently marking all things, they perceived that there was in all the Turks Army of Land-Souldiers scarce 14000, and of them many wounded and sick; and that there was but an unresistible and feeble multitude, for that the course of Wars had (as commonly it doth) consumed their best Souldiers.

When they had thus viewed the Camp, they returned again to the City; from whence Salazar with one Petrus Pacius a Spaniard, a venturesome and valiant man, went to a certain place near unto the Watch-Tower of Melina; which when they had curiously viewed, Pacius was there left, that observing the signs from the Island of Gazala, and the City of Melina, he might give knowledge of all things to the Vice-Roy at his approach, as he was by Salazar instructed. As for Salazar himself, he in his little Boat (which at his coming into the Isle he had there left) happily returned to Melina, and there declared unto the Vice-Roy all that he had seen; constantly affirming amongst other things, That the Turks Army was but weak, lame, and disunited; both of Men and Munition, far unable to encounter with 10000 Christians. Above which time also, one of the two Frigates which were before sent to Melina, returned with another Spaniard, and a Fugitive from the Turks Camp; and four Gallies before gone from Melina, were also come in with fourteen Turks taken about the Island of Melina, who all confirmed the fame that was by Salazar reported; Which was, That the Turks Army was with often assaults wonderfully weakened, both in number and strength; so that they could not with stripes be enforced to the assault, for which the Baffa had with his own hands slain divers of them; and that which more increased their fear, they saw none of their men wounded, but that they died thereof. Besides that, they saw the Christians with invincible courage to defend their strong places, and not to spend one shot in vain: Wherefore they were fiery, and repented that they ever took in hand that Expedition; they desired such a War, thinking as much as they could from the Assault, and as they might, stealing quite away, which many of them did, specially such as before abjured the Christian Faith. For which cause diligent Watch and Ward was kept, and Commandment given by the great Baffa, that they should resolve with themselves either to win the Town, or then all to lay up their bones, for that the great Sultan Solyman had so commanded, whom to gainstay, was in it self death. These and such like persuasions, caused the Vice-Roy somewhat the sooner to think of the bringing forth of his Fleet; the besieged in the mean time did what men might for defence of the place and themselves. There was in the Castle one Franciscus Ginara Captain of the Vanguard, a noble and valiant valiant Gentleman, of a great conceit; he about ten foot from the Town Wall, which the Enemy had with their great Ordnance beaten down caused a Curtain to be drawn 50 foot long, and five foot thick, with Flankers at both ends, which in two nights was brought to perfection, and was afterwards a great help to the besieged. The Enemy in the mean time began a Mine under the corner of the Town-Ditch, where Bonimgagna a Spaniard and a most valiant Knight had the Charge; which the besieged perceiving, by a countermine defeated the same. It happened in the mean time, that a Fugitive was swimming to the Town, he was taken by the Enemy, which much grieved the besieged, defious to have understood something of the state of the Enemies Camp, and of their purposes. Now when the former Mine had taken to evil success, the work of the Turks assailed the Castle of St. Michael, and part with Gunpowder thought to have blown up the Castle-Bulwark; but by the carefulness and courage of the Defendants, all their Attempts were disappointed; for many of the Turks were in both places slain, and certain bags of Powder taken from them in the Mine. With these and other such difficulties, Melissaphis and Pied the Turks Generals disappointed of their hope, consulted with the other great Captains of the Army, Whether they should there still continue that desperate Siege, or depart? Where most were clear of opinion, That it was best betime to depart. Yet for all that, the old Baffa said, He would there stay, until the Galliot which he had before sent to Constantinople, were returned with answer from Solyman, and in the mean time both by force and policy to seek after Victory; which thing he often did, than stood with the broken estate of his Army, or of the besieged; neither resting himself nor suffering others to take rest; for one while he battered the Walls, another while he wrought Mines or else made Bridges; sometime he cast up Mounds, and then again filled the Ditches; and all which doing he used such industry, that whatever he took in hand, was in short time brought to such perfection as might have carried a stronger place, had not the valour of the Defendants far exceeded all his strong and politic devices.

It fortuned, that as Robles the Camp-Master, and Governor of the Castle St. Michael, was by night viewing the ruins of the Wall, he was struck in the head with a small stone, and slain; leaving behind him to his Fellows, the great desire of himself; for why, he was a man of many good parts (wherewith he had many times stood the Defendants in great heat) worthily beloved. In whose stead the Great Master sent one of the Colonels that was with himself, a most expert and resolute Captain, to take charge of St. Michael's Castle; who by his valiant care and providence so well discharged the charge committed unto him, that as often as the Turks attempted the place, so often they were with loss repulsed.

The two Gallies with the Galliot, described by the Gallies of Melina (as we have before said) told Pied Baffa the Admiral, that the Christian Fleet was ready to come forth; wherefore he fearing the sudden coming thereof, caused seveny Gallies to be in readiness; besides such unresistible others lay in the Haven Mazra Mount unresistible, as wanting both Men and other Equipages; for that was spent in making Bridges, Mines, and other such things necessary for the Siege; as for the Men, they were part with sickness, and part with often assaults consumed. Wherefore Pied for certain days kept himself by day in the Port Major near the shore, and by night pur forth to Sea, expecting the coming of the Fleet. But after long looking, when he saw no man appear, he again landed his Souldiers; and because at Land the Baffa began to waste Powder, of every thirty Barrels of Powder in every Gally, he took out twenty, and of some twenty five, or according to that proportion. After which time, the Turks began with greater fury than at any time before, to batter the Walls of both Towns, especially with those great Pieces which they call Basilisks, whose shot of two hundred pound weight was seven hands about; whereby the Walls of the Castle of St. Michael were beaten flat. And at the same time, the Baffa at the Castle St. Angelo, had with continual battery so shaken the Castle that it was almost fallen quite down. These breaches thus made, when the Turks faw both Towns barred of Walls and other Defendants, and laid to open, that nothing seemed now to let them to look upon their Enemies, they made no longer stay, but the 18th day of August (the Sun being now at the highest) with all their Power fiercely assaulted both the Towns. Thrice they were repulsed, and still came on with greater slaughter, they were glad humbly to give over the assault, and again to retire to their Trenches. In this most cruel fight (which endured five hours) the invincible courage of the Great Master notably appeared, who stood with a Pike in his hand, and dreadful to behold, was still valiantly fighting in the face of the Breach; whose presence encouraged not the Souldiers only, but even Boys and Women, to fight; for it is, that men are more moved, with example, than with words. And of the great number of the Turks, part stood still in the Town-Ditch, and to save themselves from the floor of the Castle-Bulwark, had with wonderful celerity cast up a defence of Earth, Fagots, and other like matter, which they did of purpose to approach and to undermine the Walls, and had therefore inclosed the space of fifteen Elms; which when the besieged perceived, they bent certain Pieces of Artillery upon it, and flew many of them, and with fire consumed what was left. The next day the assault was at the same places by the Enemy renewed, who by reason of his number of Souldiers might easily fend fresh men in stead of them which were wounded or weary; and first, after their wonted manner they battered both the Towns all that day until night; afterwards the Moun arising, about midnight with a horrible cry they began a most terrible assault, which at the first much troubled the Christians, who yet still mindful of their wonted valour, did so much with their Weapons and Fire-Works, that the Enemy evil intreated, was glad after three hours fight to retire to his Trenches. The same day a Mine was by the Defendants perceived, at the Castle-Bulwark, wherein a hundred Turks there found, were almost all slain, and the Mine destroyed. Yet for all this did not the Enemy rest at all, but the next day seven times assaulted the same Breaches, using now no Weapons only, but Fire-Works also; wherewith Bonimgagna had his face so burnt, that he lost one of his eyes. At the same time also, the Turks at a place called The Spur, laboured mightily to have gotten into the Castle; where Garcia a Knight of an invincible courage, got up upon the Rampter, and with a Pike courageously thrust them down that were climbing up, and farther to promote them to greater places of Honour; as for the rest, he would reward every one of them according to their desert, either with Money or Preference. Valetta thinking all these things to be by Gods appointment disconcerted unto him by such means, as they had from time to time been; first gave thanks unto Almighty God; and after that, with all diligence prepared such things as he thought most necessary for the repulsing of the Enemy. But the Turks all that day with their great Ordnance battered the new City, and the Shipping in the Haven, in such sort that one of the great Ships was there sunk.

In the morning Gazias the Vice-Roy with his Fleet arrived at the Island of Malta, and there quickly and quietly landed his Forces, and whilst his Gallies watered at Gandou, went forward with the Army about half a mile, intrusting with the General and Colonels, what he thought needful to be done, commanding all Proclamations and Commands to be made in the name of the King of Spain, until they came to the Great Master, and then in all things to obey him as their Sovereign; and charged Alcimus Cornia the General, in all his actions to follow the counsel of the greater part. So in few words exhorting them to play the men, he left them marching towards Malta. About noon he retired to his Gallies, and failing Eastward, came with all his Fleet within the sight of the City of Malta, about three miles distant from the South shore. They of the City upon sight of the Fleet, in token of joy discharged all the great Artillery, which was answered from the Fleet, by discharging all their great Ordnance twice. After that, he returned to take into his Gallies the Duke of Urbino Companies, which were come to Malta, and certain Bands of Spaniards at Syracuse, and so forthwith to return to Malta, to attend the departing of the Turks Fleet, being now evil appointed, and already as good as half overthrown.

The Turks, who (as is before said) had purposed to prove their last Fortune upon the Town of St. Michael, had now certain days before the coming of the Fleet, begun to rusk up their Baggage; but as soon as they heard that the Fleet was come, and the Army landed, there suddenly arose a wonderful tumultuous confusion amongst them, some cried, Arm, arm, and otherwise as fast to be gone; and being generally all afraid, every one according to his disposition, took himself to his Weapons or his heels; the greatest number thrust together into their Trenches as near as they could unto the great Ordnance; and so burning the Engins and Fortifications, with all the speed they could imbarke their great Ordnance and Baggage. Which they in the Town of St. Angelo perceiving, not expecting the Commandment of the Great Master in so sudden an opportunity, consequently filled out to Burmula, where certainly the Turks kept a huge great Piece of Ordnance; who now having no mind to fight, besook themselves to flight, and so forth the Piece; which they of the Town presently drew within their Walls; and if the new-come Forces had that day charged the Enemy as they did formerly run to their Gallies, happily they as they either found an occasion of Victory, or at leastwise taken from them the greatest part of their Artillery. But it may be, that they followed the old Military saying, That unto the flying Enemy a man should make a Bridge of Silver. Besides that, they thinking it not convenient to depart from the provision and things which they had brought for the relief of the besieged; which for the roughness of the way and want of Horses were hardly carried, would not provoke the Enemy with any Skirmish; whereby it came to pass, that the Turks without imbarke their great Ordnance their Baggage, and most part of their Army. The 11th of September, whilst the Turks Fleet was brought out of the Haven Marza-Moset, a Fugitive of Gema came in haft to the Great Master, and told him, that 10000 Turks were marching toward Malta, to meet with the Christians upon the Way. Which thing the Great Master hearing, presently sent a sufficient number of good Soldiers to the Castle St. Elmo there to set up one of the Engins of the sacred Order; who coming thither, found there four and twenty great Pieces, some for battery, some for the field, which they could not in so great haft remove thence.

The Turks Fleet departing out of the Haven Marza-Moset to the Port of St. Paul, there landed seven thousand men, with Mulapha their General, who was fully informed, That the Christians were not above three thousand strong; and from thence encouraged with the small number of the Enemies (as they supposed) they marched directly toward Malta. The Christians also marching orderly and ready to give battle, held on their way to meet them; and at the rising of an hill both Armies meeting together, they gave a great shout, and withall the storm broke the battle, where some few were at the first slain on both sides. But the Christians still growing upon them both in number and strength, the Turks finding themselves overcharged, fled, the Christians pursuing them and killing them until they came to their Gallies; where in striving who should get in first, about four hundred of them were drowned in the Sea, besides eighteen hundred slain in the battle at land; and had the Christian Soldiers well known the Country, they had slain them every Mothers Son.

The Turks thus driven to their Gallies, lay there in the Haven all the next day, and most part of the night following, but little before day, upon the shooting off of a great Piece, the sign of their departure, they all hoisted Sail for Gazias, leaving the Island of Malta fore impoverished and wasted. In this Siege the Turks lost about four and twenty thousand, whereof most part were of their best Soldiers; and of the Christians were slain about five thousand, besides two hundred and forty Knights of the Order; Men of divers Nations, but all worthy eternal Fame, whose dead Bodies the Great Master caused to be honourably buried. The Turks in their battery during the Siege, spent as is accounted, threecore and eighteen thousand great shot.

If a man do well consider the difficulties and dangers the besieged passed through in this five months Siege, the manifold labours and perils they endured in so many and so terrible assaults, the small Relief to them sent in so great distress, with the desperate obstinacy of so puissant an Enemy; he shall hardly find any place there many years more mightily impugned, or with greater valour and resolution defended. The late besieged, and now Victorious Prince, honourably acquitted of so great an Enemy, first commanded Publick Prayers with Thanksgiving to be made unto the Giver of all Victory; after that, he rewarded the Valiant, commended the rest, and gave thanks to all, he charitably relieved the sick and wounded, bewailed the spoil of the Island, and carefully provided for the repairing of the Breaches and Places battered; and yet in all this doing, diligently inquired after the Enemies

Course and purpose, and was not in any thing remiss or secure, as in Victory most Men are. But because, so great harms could not without great helps in short time be repaired, and the return of the proud Enemy, not without cause the next year feared; he by Letters to divers great Princes, and especially to the Grand Priors of the Order, in divers Countreys, requested help; amongst whom George Grand Prior of Germany and Founder whom George Grand Prior of Germany was one of the Castle of Saint Elmo, was one of the chiefest. The Copy of which Letters, because they briefly contain what we have before in this History at large written, I have thought good here to set down, that the fame may in such order be read, as it was by the Great Master himself reported.

Brother Valetta, Master of the Hospital of Jerusalem, to the Reverend and Religious our well beloved Brother in Christ George of Hohenheim, called Bombast, Prior of our Priory in Almaine, Greeting.

Although we doubt not but that by the Letters and Relation of many, you already understand the coming of the Turks to invade these Islands; or rather utterly to subvert our Society; and the happy and heavenly Victory by us obtained of it; yet if the same thing shall by our Letters also be brought unto you, we have thought the same will be unto you a thing much more pleasing. For seeing that we are certainly persuaded, that you in this no less happy than glorious success, will give most hearty thanks to Almighty God, and that the fruit of this good shall be of all redound unto you, for the honour which you bear in our Order, we have willingly determined to participate this our joy with you, and plainly and openly to profess, that we attribute this so notable and wonderful Victory to our Lord Christ Jesus, the greatest King of all Kings, and Author of all good things. Which that you may the more worthily and willingly do, we will declare the whole matter, not at large (for that were to write an Epistole) but briefly and in few words. Sultan Solyman the most mortal Enemy of the Christian, and especially of our Society, not contented to have spoiled us of the most famous Island of the Rhodes, the Castle of Tripolis, and almost whatsoever we had else commanded a great and strong Fleet to be made ready against us; which departing from Constantinople the one and twentieth day of March, arrived there the eighteenth day of May. Which Fleet consisted of almost two hundred and fifty Gallies, Gallies, and other Ships. The number of the Enemies that bear Arms, according to the truth, was about forty thousand more or less: General of the Land Forces, was Mulapha Baffa, and of the Fleet, Pial Baffa was Admiral; who having first a few days in landing their Forces, viewing the places, picking their Tent, and setting things in order (as the manner of War is) they began first to assault the Castle of Saint Elmo (situate in the mouth of the Haven) with great Force and most furious Battery. Which when they had many days done without intermission, and had opened a great part of the Wall, and with all kind of Weapons assaulted the Breach; yet was it by the Valour and Prowess of our Knights, and other worthy Soldiers, kept and defended by the space of thirty days, until the great loss and slaughter of the Enemy; although the Castle itself, in the Judgment of many, seemed not possible to be so few days defended against so great a Force. At length the four and twentieth day of June, when our Men could no longer endure the multitude and fury of the Enemy, environed and shut up both by Sea and Land, and destitute of all help, the Castle was taken by the Turks; the rest of our Men which were left, being all slain. Of which Victory they being proud, began to besiege the Castle and Town of Saint Michael, and the new City, especially at the Castle and Port of Bulwarks; and (as their manner is) with great diligence and greater force and number of great Artillery and Warlike Engins; they began to batter places at once to batter and beat down the Walls. Which Siege, the dreadful Army of the Turks by Sea and Land, made to be most fearful and terrible, with such huge great Ordnance, as the like for biggness and force was in no place to be seen, day and night thundering out their Iron and Stone Shot, Fire and even hands about; whereunto the thick Walls, but even the very Mountains themselves might have been beaten down and overthrown; by fury whereof, the Walls in many places were so battered, that Men might easily have entered as on plain ground. Where, when the barbarous Enemies had with wonderful Force and hidden Outcries oftentimes attempted to enter, so often as they with great Slaughter and Dishonour repulsed and beaten back, many of their Men slain or wounded. Their Generals, as well as Sea as Land, after that they had in so many places, with all their Forces in almost four months Siege and Assault, with exceeding fury vainly attempted the Breaches, and left the greatest part of their old Soldiers, especially Winter now coming on, wherein all Wars by reason of Nations ought to cease; thought of nothing else but of departing, or rather of flight; which the coming of Gazias of Toledo, Viceroy of Sicilia, and Admiral of the King of Spain his Fleet, with ten thousand select Soldiers (amongst whom were at the least two hundred and fourteen of our Knights, and many other noble and valiant Gentlemen, which only with a Christian Zeal, voluntarily met together for deers parts of the World to help and relieve us) caused them to hasten. So soon as they (summarily and in few words, the proceedings and flight of the Turks Fleet, and the Victory by us (by the power of God) thereof obtained. It shall be your part to consider and conjecture, in what state our Order and this Island now standeth, unto what estate we are brought, how many things we want; wherein except we be relieved by the help and aid of our Brethren, especially such as you are, as we well hope, and assuredly believe we shall, our State will quickly take end. Fare you well. From Malta the ninth of October, 1565.

The Great Master thus delivered of so great a Siege, and bountifully relieved by the Christian Princes, and the great Commanders of his Order; speedily repaired the Breaches and places battered, and with new Fortifications strengthened those places as he had by the late passed dangers perceived to be most subject to the Enemies Force.

After the return of the Turks Fleet to Constantinople, Solyman being exceedingly angry with the Governor of the Island of Cbio his Tributary; as well for that he had during the late Siege of Malta, had intelligence with the Great Master, and revealed unto him many of the Turks Designs; as also for detaining of two years Tribute, which was yearly ten thousand Ducats; and had also neglected to send his wanted Presents to the great Baffes, who therefore the more incensed the Tyrant; commanded Pial Baffa his Admiral to make ready his Fleet, and by Force or Policy to take that fruitful and pleasant Island wholly into his own hand. Who without delay, with a Fleet of eighty Gallies the fifteenth day of April in the year 1566, being then Easter day, arrived arrived at Chios. The chief Men of the Island upon sight of the Fleet, forthwith sent Embassadors to the Baffa with Presents, courteously offering unto him the Haven, and whatsoever else he should require. Pial with great kindness accepted their offer, and prettily possessed himself of the Haven in three places; and afterward landing, sent for the Governor of the City and twelve of the chief Citizens to come unto him, as if he had some special matter to confer with him about from the great Sultan, before his departure thence for Malta or Italy. Who having a little conferred together, went to him with great fear; and that not without cause; for as soon as they were come before him, he commanded them to be laid hold upon and cast into Prison; which done, the Soldiers forthwith took the Town Hall, and without resistance pulling down the Towns Ensign, (wherein was the Picture of Saint George with a red Cross) instead thereof set up one of the Turks; the like whereof was done with great rejoicing of the Turks through the whole Island. After that, they rifled the Churches, and again consecrated them after their Mahometan manner. The Governor of the City, and the Senators, with their Families, the Baffa sent in five Ships to Constantinople; as for the Vulgar People, they were at choice, either there to tarry still, or depart, as best stood with their liking. And so the Baffa, when he had there placed a new Governor, one of the Turks, with a strong Garrison, and set up the Mahometan Superstition in that most fertile Island, departed thence for Italy; where falling along the Coast of Apulia, he did exceedingly much harm in burning and destroying the Country Villages, and carrying away of the poor People into Captivity; and so returned.

At this time the Kingdom of Hungary was most miserably rent in pieces by the Lieutenants and Captains of Solyman and Maximilian the Emperor, and John the Vayvod of Transylvania Solyman, Valfai; who grieved with the harms done unto him by the Emperor's Captains, whereof himself was the cause, and vainly hoping to have obtained at Solyman Hands the greatest part of the Kingdom of Hungary, as had sometime King John; ceased not continually to sollicit him to come himself in Person to make a full Conquest of the Reliques of Hungary, yet holden by the Emperor and some of the Hungarian Nobility; and flattering himself in that vain hope, called himself the King of Hungary; and increasing his strength by Letters unto the Nobility and Burgesses of the Cities of Hungary, summoned them, as if it had been by the appointment of Solyman his great Patron, that they should all the ninth of March meet together at Thorda, to determine with him of Matters concerning their common good. Which thing as soon as Lazarus Szendi the Emperor's Lieutenant understood, he forthwith by other Letters commanded the heads of the Vayvods; persuading the Hungarians not to listen to Charms of the Vayvod and the Turk, tending to their destruction, but rather to yield their Obedience to Maximilian the Christian Emperor, whose purpose was by the aid of the Christian Princes, to protect and preserve them in Peace. And hereby it came to pass, that the remainders of this poor Kingdom, divided into Factions, and diversly carried, according to their Affection, some to the one side, some to the other, began afresh to work one another's confusion, which fitly served the Turks to increase more and more upon them; Who at the same time surprised the Town of Ainazib (the Captain whereof, with certain of the Garrison Souldiers being gone about their business to Agria) and put to the Sword all them that they found in the Town. They thought also to have taken the strong Town of Sigeth, but were by the valiant Count Nicolaus Serinus Governor thereof, courageously encountered, and after four hours hard Fight overthrown and put to Flight. Not long after, they ranged up and down the Country, and set in Boogies as far as Yula and Radi, and did the Country People much harm. For which cause, Maximilian the Emperor about the later end of May brake up the Assembly of the Empire then holden at Augusta, and began carefully to provide things needful for the War; appointing his Captains for the raising of such forces in Germany, as were but a little before granted unto him by the Princes and States of the Empire, in their late Assembly; but went himself to Vienna. For it was told him (as the truth was) that Solyman now in his extreme Age was with a mighty Army set forward from Constantinople, and marching through Bulgaria and Servia, was come directly to Belgrade; where John the Vayvod of Transylvania met him, and kissing his Hand, had commended himself and all his state unto his Protection. At which time Szendi the Emperor's Lieutenant laid hard Siege to the Town of Hufib in the Borders of Transylvania. The Baffa of Buda at the same time on the other side, by commandment of Solyman, with eight thousand Turks and five and twenty Pieces of great Ordnance besieging Palotta (a strong Town about eight miles from Rab) had with continual Famine by the space of eight days brought the place into great danger, although it was valiantly defended by George Twinger. But hearing of the approach of George Count of Helfenstein, sent by the Emperor with certain Companies of Germans to relieve the same, he rose in such haste from the Siege, that he left certain of his great Ordnance and a great part of his Baggage behind him, and retired towards Alba Regalis. The Count having relieved the Town, caused the Breaches to be forthwith repaired, and with a new Supply strengthened the old Garrison. This was a most lamentable War at once begun in divers places of Hungary. After that, the Count of Helfenstein, strengthened by the coming of the Count Salma with certain Companies from Rab, departed from Palotta, and came to Vesprimium a City about two miles off, then holden by the Turks; which City he took by force the last of June, and left a Turk alive thereon, because that they a few days before had cruelly slain certain Christians whom they had taken Prisoners. So leaving strong Garrisons both in Vesprimium and Palotta, they returned to Rab. Shortly after, the Count Salma laid Siege to Tatta a strong Town, otherwise called Doria, betwixt Rab and Comara, which at length he took by Assault the eight and twentieth day of July, and slew all the Turks; except six, which flying into one of the Towers of the Castle, yielded upon composition; amongst whom was the late Governor of Vesprimium, and the Governor of this place, with the Baffa of Buda his high Kintman, who were all presently sent Prisoners to Vienna. So the Count following the Course of his Victory (the error of his former good Fortune running before him into the Turks' strongest Holds) was his way to have besieged the Town near to Palotta; when the Turks there in Garrison upon the first sight of his Army, left all and fled out at the farther side of the Town to Strigomium. After whose example other of the Turks Garrisons in Witbo, Tschukien, and Sambak, Castles thereabouts, thereabouts, set fire on that they could not carry, and followed their Fellows to Strigomium also. The Emperor understanding of the good success of his Captains, caused publique Prayers with thanksgiving to Almighty God to be made through all the Churches thereabouts.

Count Serinus Governor of the strong Town of Sigeth and the Country thereabout, certainly advertised of the coming of Solyman, four Captains Alapianus and Nicolaus Cabach, two of his Captains, with a thousand Foot and five hundred Horse, to lie in wait for the Forerunners of the Turks Army; who drawing near unto the place where these Turks lay, not far from Quique Ecclispe, suddenly in the shutting in of the next day set upon them, doubting no such matter and put them in such fear, that they disorderly fled, some one way, some another, and were most of them slain or wounded by the Hungarians in their Flight. Hali Beg one of the Turks great Sanzacks and Leader of that Company, great wounded, and seeking to save himself by Flight in the Marshes, there perished; his Son and many other notable Men amongst the Turks, were there taken and carried Prisoners to Sigeth. The Spoil the Hungarians there took was exceeding great; for besides Plate and Coin, whereof they found good store, they took eight Camels, five Mules, three score Horses, and six Carts laden with all manner of Spoil, and many Garments of great price; wherein the Gentlemen attired, returned to Sigeth in great Bravery, with two fair red Ensigns of the Enemies.

Maximilian the Emperor long before advertised of Solyman purpose for the conquest of the remainder of Hungary; to withstand so mighty an Enemy, had beside the Forces raised in his own Dominions, procured great Aid both of the States of the Empire and other Christian Princes, which about this time met together at Rab. First there repaired thither four Legions of German Footmen, and upwards of twenty thousand Horsemen, with four thousand Hungarians; the Duke of Savoy sent thither four hundred Argoletiers; and many noble Gentlemen out of divers parts of Europe repaired thither, to serve the Emperor in those Wars, of their own Charge; especially the Knights of Malta; and out of Italy, Proffer Columna and Angelus Castus; out of France, Gust the Grand Prior, Brissack, and Landack, who but a little before were going to Malta, of purpose to have fought there if the Turks Fleet had come thither again, as it was reported it would; but understanding that it came not, returned directly into Hungary, with certain other Knights of the Order. Many also of the Princes and free Cities of Italy declared their good Will towards the Emperor in this War; some sending him Men, as did Cosmus Medici Duke of Florence, who sent thither of his own Charge three thousand Footmen, some Money, as Matteo Duke of Lucia. Thither came also Alphonso Duke of Ferrara with a gallant Company of noble Gentlemen, and other his Followers. Besides which Land Forces, the Emperor had also provided upon the River of Danubius twelve Gallies, and thirty other Ships for Burthen, so made, as that the Men could not be hurt with the Turks Arrows; wherein were embarked three thousand Souldiers, most part Italians, under the Conduct of Philippus Flacinus a German and one of the Knights of Malta, who was afterward received into the number of the Princes of the Empire.

Solyman coming to the River Drauvus, commanded a Bridge to be made over that great River, and the deep Fens on the farther side of the River towards Sigeth, for the transporting of his great Army; a Work of such difficulty, that being thrice unfortunately begun, it was again given over, as a thing almost impossible. Wherewith Solyman was so moved, that in his rage he began to hang up the Baffa that had the charge of that work, if he did not wish as much speed as was possible, bring it to perfection. Whereupon the Work was again begun, all the Boats that were to be found in the River taken up, and Timber for the purpose brought from far, for the making of that Bridge. In this Work were employed not the Vulgar People only, of the Country which was Tributary to the Turks, but the Gentlemen themselves also, were by the imperious Turk (now commanding for his Life) enforced to lay their Fingers to work day and night without ceasing, until the Bridge (which before was thought scarce possible to have been made) was by the restless industry and labour of such a multitude of Men, in the space of ten days brought to perfection. Wherein the severity the barbarous Tyrant used towards his Subjects, is worth noting; whereby he extorted from them more than is almost possible for Men to perform; so that it is not to be marvelled, that he had so good success in whatsoever he took in hand. Over this Bridge (a mile in length) passed Solyman, and encamped at a place called Mubatchez, where he stayed certain days, until his Army was all come over. The last of July, seventy thousand Turks (the Vanguard of Solyman's Army) came before Sigeth, and encamped within a mile of the Town; after whom shortly after followed a hundred thousand more out of Solyman Camp; of whom many in approaching the Town, were slain with great Shot out of the Castle; the rest for all that encamped themselves as near unto the Town as they could, and began the Siege.

The Town of Sigeth is strongly situate in a Marsh on the North side of Drauvus upon the Frontiers of Dalmatia, commanding all the Country round about it, which of it taketh name; and was at that time a strong Bulwark against the Turks, for entering farther into the Country that way toward Stria. In this Town was Governor Nicolaus Serinus, commonly called the Count, a valiant Man, and a mortal Enemy of the Turks, with a Garrison of two thousand three hundred good Souldiers, who facing the huge Army of the Turks, called together into the Castle, the Captains of the Garrison, and the chief of the Citizens; where standing in the midst of them, he spake unto them as followeth:

You see (said he) how we are on every side beset with our Enemies, wherein thus he comforteth their chief hope; but let us be thereof little afraid or discouraged; for that Victory dependeth not on a confused Multitude of heartless Men, but on the Power of our God, who hath by a few at his pleasure many times overthrown the mighty Armies of the Proud; and will not in the midst of thy dangers now forsake us, if we putting our Trust and Confidence in him, do what becometh valiant and courageous Men. Besides that, our just Cause, with the strength of the place we hold, our own valour, and the help of our Friends, who I assure my self will not fail us at our need, counterbalance their confused Multitude, fought together by their imperious Commanders.

Commanders out of far Countries, and whatsoever else the proud Tyrant hath brought with him into the Field. Wherefore let us all as becometh valiant Men, for the truth of our Religion, and for the honour of our Prince and Country, live and die together: knowing whatsoever befalls, there is a Life to us; before our dying Flame, I beseech a most abundant dose of Joy and Felicity. As for my self, I am resolved, and so I hope are you also, that as I am a Christian, and free born, so will I (by the Grace of God) in the same Faith and Freedom end my days. Neither shall the proud Turk, so long as I am able to hold up this hand, have ever power to command over me, or the ground whereon I stand.

This said, he first took himself a solemn Oath to perform what he had promised, and perfwaded the rest to take the like; which done, every Man returned to the place of his charge.

Solyman came into the camp at Sigeth.

The fifth of August Solyman encamped within a mile of the Town, and the next day after came himself into the Camp, at whose coming the great Ordnance and small Shot so thundered out of the Turks Camp, as if Heaven and Earth should have gone together, the Turks after their wonted manner crying aloud their Alla, Alla, Alla, and the Christians answering them with the Name of Jesus. The seventh of August the Turks cast up a great Mount, and thereon planted certain great Pieces of Ordnance. The next day following they began most terribly to batter the new Town in three places, and with incredible Labor cast up a Mount in the midst of the Marsh, as it were in the Town Ditch, from whence they the next day with certain Pieces of great Artillery day and night battered the inner Castle of the Town without any intermission, and did great harm both to the Castle and the Defendants. The Count perceiving the new City to be now so laid open with the fury of the Turks Battery, as that it was not possible to be defended, caused his Soldiers to set it all on fire, and to retire into the old. The tenth of August the Turks furiously battered the old Town in three places, and brought their Ordnance into the new Town; and with Timber, Earth and Rubbish made a Bridge, the more commodiously to go over the Marsh. For the speedier accomplishment whereof, all the Turks were compelled to lay to their Hands, and to carry Wood, Faggots, Earth, and such like things without cease. There might a Man have seen all the Fields full of Camels, Horses, and of the Turks themselves, like Emets, carrying Wood, Earth, Stones, or one thing or other to fill up the Marsh; so was there with wonderful Labour two plain ways made through the deep Fen, from the Town to the Castle; where the Janizaries, defended from the great Shot and Sacks of Wood and such like things, did with the Multitude of their small Shot so overwhelm the Defendants, that they could not against those places without most manifest danger themselves upon the Walls. So that what by their vigilant Industry, and the fury of the great Artillery, the Turks (though not without great loss) by force entered the old Town the nineteenth of August, using in their Victory such celerity, that they flew many of the most valiant Defendants before they were able to recover the safeguard of the Castle. Both the Towns thus lost, and so many worthy Men slain, not without cause brought great heaviness upon the rest which were in the Castle with the Count. The Turks possessed of the old Town, the next day planted their Battery against the Castle in four places, and with Faggots, Rubbish, and Earth, made two plain ways unto it, still filling up the Marsh; and having with continual Battery made it asailable, the nine and twentieth day of August they began fiercely to assail the Castle; but when they had lost many of their Men, and done what they could, they were enforced with shame to retire. In this Assault, amongst many other of their best Soldiers, was lost one of their great Balleasts also.

Whilst these things were in doing, Solyman fast spent with years, and distempred with his long travel, fell sick of a Loosness in his Belly, and for the better recovery of his Health, retired himself (the Siege yet continuing) to Guinea Ecceffa a City near to Sigeth, where shortly after he died of the bloody Flux the fourth day of September, in the Year of our Lord 1566, when he had lived seventy six years, and thereof reigned forty six. He was of stature tall, of Feature slender, long Necked, his Colour pale and wan, his Nose long and hooked, of Nature amicitious and bountiful, most faithful of his Word and Promise, than were for most part the Mahometan Kings his Progenitors, wanting nothing worthy of so great an Empire, but that wherein all happiness is contained, Faith in Christ Jesus. Muhamet the Visier Bassa (who commanded all in Solyman's absence) fearing the dissolution of the Janizaries, and lest some tumult should arise in the Camp, if his death should be known, caused it by all means, and to be sure of them that were of others best able to make certain report thereof, caused his Physicians and Apothecaries to be secretly strangled, and by a trusty Messenger, sent in Post, certified Solyman (Solyman only Son, and his Father in Law, then living in Magnesia) of the death of his Father, willing him in haste to repair to Constantinople, to take possession of the Empire; and that done, to march with him to come to the Army in Hungary. But this could not be so secretly done, but that the Janizaries began to mistrust the matter; which Muhamet Bassa quickly perceiving, caused the dead Body of Solyman in his wound Apparel to be brought into his Tent sitting upright in his Head-Litter, as if he had been sick of the Gout, his wonted disease, and so showing him to the Janizaries, both deceived and contented them, and so went forward with the Siege.

The Janizaries having in the last Assault lost the great number of their Fellows, began now to undertake the greatest Bulwark of the Castle, from which the Defendants with their great Ordnance did most annoy them; wherein they used such diligence, that the fifth of September they with Gunpowder and other light-matter provided for that purpose, had set all the Bulwark on a light fire; and by that means possessed thereof, with all their force assailed the Bulwark next unto the Castle Gate, from whence they with great slaughter twice repulsed by the Count. But the raging Fire still increasing, he was enforced with those which were yet left alive, to retire into the inner Castle, wherein were but two great Pieces, and fourteen others of small force. Thus the Turks still prevailing, and taking one place after another, the seventh of September they furiously assaulted the little Castle, wherein they cast such abundance of Fire, that in short time it caught hold on the Buildings, and set all on fire. The Count thus assailed by the Enemy without, and work distressed with the Fire within, which still increasing, left no place for him in safety to retire unto, went went into his Chamber, where putting on a rich new Suit of Apparel, came presently out again with his Sword and Target in his hand; and finding his Soldiers with cheerful Countenance and their Weapons in their hands, attending his coming, spake unto them these few his last words: The hard Fortune of this sinful Kingdom hath together with our own overtaken us; but let us, noble Hearts, with patience endure what is to us by God ordained. You know what we have before promised, which hitherto God be thanked we have accordingly performed, and now let us with like resolution perform this last. The place you see is no longer to be kept, the devouring Fire groweth so full upon us, and we in number are but few; wherefore let us as becometh valiant Men break out into the utter Castle, there to die in the midst of our Enemies, to live afterwards with God for ever; I will be the first that will go on, follow you me like Men. This said, with his Sword and Target in his hand, without any other Armor, calling thrice upon the Name of Jesus, he issued out at the Castle Gate, with the rest following him; where valiantly fighting with the Janizaries upon the Bridge, and having slain some of them, he was first wounded in two places of his Body with small Ships, and at last struck in the Head with an unlucky blow, fell down dead; the Turk for joy crying out their wonted word Alla. The rest of the Soldiers in flying back again into the Castle, were all slain by the Turks, except some few, whom some of the Janizaries in the fond of their Valour, by putting their Caps upon their Heads, saved from the fury of the rest. In this Siege, the Turks (as they themselves reported) lost seven thousand Janizaries, and twenty voluntary Men; whereas they enrolled in their Muster-Books, and three of their great Balleasts. Serinus his Head was presently cut off, and the next day (with the Heads of the other slain Christians) set upon a Pole, for all the Army to gaze upon. After that it was taken down, and by Muhamet the great Bassa sent to Mufapha the Bassa of Buda his Kinsman, who by two Country Men, first it wrapped in a red Scarf covered with a fair linen Cloth, to Count Salmas in the Emperors Camp at Rab, with this taunting Letter thus directed.

Muhamet Bassa to Eccius Salmas, Greeting.

*I*N token of my love, behold, here I send thee the Head of a most valiant and valiant Captain thy Friend, the remainder of his Body I have benevolently buried, as becometh such a Man. Sigeth hideth thee farwell for ever.

The death of this noble and valiant Captain was much lamented of all the Christian Army, and his Head with many tears by his Son Balthazar honourably buried amongst his Ancestors in Tschacanoura, his own Castle. Solyman at his coming with this mighty Army into Hungary, had purposed before his return, if he had not been by death prevented, to have conquered both the remainder of the Kingdom of Hungary, and to have again attempted the winning of Vienna. For the accomplishing of which his Designs, he at his first coming sent Parthous Bassa, with forty thousand Turks to help the half of the Vayvod, to besiege the strong Town of Gyula, situate upon the Lake Zerkad in the Confines of Transylvania, not far from whence Suendi had but in August before overthrown the Tatars, called in by Solyman for the aid of the Vayvod, and slain of them ten thousand. And at the same time he sent Mufapha Bassa of Buda, and Caramanie, with a great Power to Alba Regale; who joining with the Bassa of Buda, should keep the Emperor Maximilian busy, whilst he in the mean time besieged Sigeth, as is before said. Parthous Bassa coming to Gyula, and laying hard Siege to the Town, was still notably repulsed by Nicholaus Kerefcsen, Governor of the Town; inasmuch that in a fally he had certain Pieces of his great Ordnance taken from him by the Defendants, and the rest cloied. But this brave Captain, not to have been constrained by the Bassa could do, was at last perfwaded by his Kinsman George Behem (from whom Suendi had a little before taken certain Castles, for revolting from the Emperor to deliver up for a great sum of Money to the Vayvod) the Town to the Bassa; which he did, remaining beside his Reward, That the Soldiers should with Bag and Baggage in safety depart; all which was frankly granted; who were not gone past a mile out of the Town, but they were set upon by the Turks, and all slain except some few which crept into the Reeds growing in the Marsh fast by, and so escaped. The Traitor himself expecting his Reward, was carried in Bonds to Constantinople; where afterward, upon complaint made how hardly he had used certain Turks whom he had sometime taken Prisoners, he was by the commandment of Solyman, who succeeded Solyman, thrust into an Execution truck full of Nails with the Points inward, with this inscription upon it, Here receive the Reward of thy Avarice and Treason. Gyula then sold for Gold, if thou be not faithful to Maximilian thy Lord, neither wilt thou be no more; and so the Hoghead cloied fast up, he was therein rolled up and down until he therein miserably died.

The Emperors Camp then lying at Rab and the Bassa of Buda and Bosna with thirty thousand Turks not far off at Alba Regale, and many hot skirmishes passing between them; it fortuned that the fifth of September the Turks in hope to have done some great piece of service upon the Christians, came forth of the Camp in great number, and by chance light upon a few Foragers of the Army, of whom they flew some; the rest flying, raised an Alarm in the Camp; whereupon the Hungarians and Burgundians with some others issuing out, pursuing the Turks, flew divers of them; in which pursuit George Thurgier declaring the Governor of Alba Regale, a Man in great account, and very inward with Solyman whilst he lived, fiercely pursued him in the midst of the flying Enemies, and never left him until he had taken him Prisoner; and at his return presenting him to the Emperor, was for that good service Knighted, and rewarded with a Chain of Gold. There was by chance then present a Spaniard, who had heard him say openly at Constantinople, That he alone with his own power was able to vanquish the German King (by which name the Turks commonly term the Emperor;) With which words when that the Spaniard hardly charged him in the presence of the Emperor, still urging him as it were to say something for himself, the Turk answered him in these few words following: Such is the chance of War, thou seest me now a Prisoner, and able to do nothing.

All these troubles, with many more like in short time to have ensued, were by the death of

Solyman within a while after well appeased. Muhamet Bassa after he had repaired the Breaches and placed a Turk Governor of Sigeth, with a strong Garrison for the defence of the place and commanding of the Country, called back the dispersed Forces, and rising with the Army, retired toward Belgrade, carrying Solyman's dead

Body all the way sitting upright in his Horf-litter carried by Mules, giving it out that he was sick of the Gout; which thing the Janizaries easily believed, knowing that he had been many years so carried; yet still withing his preference, as always unto them fortunate, although that he were able for to do nothing.

The Turks Army returned with the Body of Solyman to Belgrade.

The LIFE of SELYMUS, The Second of that NAME, Fifth Emperor of the Turks.

Selymus
fifted Emper of the Turke:
In the Year

Selymus, the only Son of Selyman, then left alive, by Letters from Muhamet Bassa understanding of the death of his Father, halted from Cutai, a City of Gulatia not far from Anagra, towards Constantinople; and coming to Scutary, was from thence by Bohanger Bassa of the Court, conducted over the Strait to Constantinople; where by him and Scander Bassa (Selymus his Son in law, and then Selymans Vicegerent) he was conveyed into the Imperial Palace the three and twentieth of September, in the year 1566. and there possessed of his Fathers Seat, was by the Janizaries there present, saluted Emperor. He was about the age of forty two years when he began to Reign, a man of an unconfinde and hasty disposition, wholly given to wantonness and excess; so that he never went to Wars himself, but performed them altogether by his Lieutenants, contrary to the charge of Selymus his Grandfather, given by him to his Father Selyman, whereof he was never unmindful. The next day he came abroad, and shewed himself in his Majesty; and in the Temple of Sophia, after the manner of the Turkish Superstition, caused solemn Prayers and Sacrifices to be made for his Father; which done, he gave unto the Janizaries a Larges of 100000 Sultanes, with promise to augment their Wages. And all things being now in readiness for his intended Journey, he with a goodly Retinue set forward from Constantinople the seven and twentieth of September; and the twentieth of October a little from Belgrade met the Army coming from Siege, gallantly marching under their Ensigns, with the dead Body of Selyman, whom the Soldiers generally supposed to have been yet living, but troubled with the Gour, to have kept his Horse-litter, as his manner was to travel. Selymus alighting, came in his Mourning Attire to the Horse-litter, looked upon the dead Body of his Father, killed it, and wept over it, as did all the other great Basses also. And that the death of Selyman might then be made known to all men, the Ensigns were presently for fall, and trailed upon the ground; a dead March sounded, and heavy silence commanded to be kept through all the Camp. Shortly after, Selymus was with the great applause of the whole Army proclaimed Emperor, his Ensigns advanced, and every one of the great Commanders of the Army, in their degree admitted to kiss his hand. So marching forward, he came again to Constantinople the two and twentieth of November, thinking to have entered his Palace (which they commonly call The Seraglio) he was by the discontented Janizaries; but now come from the Wars, prohibited so to do; they with great Insolency demanding of him a greater Donative, together with the confirmation both of their ancient and new Privileges, before they would suffer him to enter. Against which their great presumption, the Visier Basses, together with the Aga, opposing themselves, and seeking by all means to appease them, were by them foully entreated, and well rapped about the Ears with the flocks of their Callivars; but especially the two great Basses, Muhamet and Parau, as the chief Authors that their Lord had dealt no more liberally with them. With which so sudden and unexpected a Mutiny of his best Soldiers, Selymus not a little troubled, and calling unto him the Aga (or Captain of the Janizaries) demanded of him the cause thereof; who with tears trickling down his cheeks for grief, told him, 'That it was for many. Which by Selymus now promised unto them, together with the confirmation of their Liberties; and the Aga with fair words and heavy countenance most earnestly intreating them, not to blemish the ancient Reputation of their wonted Loyalty with so foul a disorder, nor to oppose the life of him their loving Captain, unto the heavy displeasure of their angry Sultan; and farther assuring them that he would not fail them in the least of his promises, but content them to the full of their desires; the Mutiny was at length appeased, the insolent Janizaries again quieted, and Selymus into the Seraglio received. Howbeit Muhamet, chief of the Visier Basses, for certain days after went not out of his Palace, neither came (as he was wont) into the Draums, but kept himself close, for fear of some greater mischief from thence. This Tumult thus overpassed, and all again well quieted, Selymus with all Royal Solemnity buried his Father in a Chappel, which he after the manner of the Mahometan Kings, had in his life time most stately built, with a Colledge and an Hospital. Where fast by his side is to be seen the Tomb of Roxelana his best beloved Wife, and of certain others his murdered Children; and by him hangeth his Scimitar, in which time he died in Wars; an Honour not otherwise granted to the Mahometan Princes. The Reveres assing of the Country about Siege, of late won from the Christians, at the time of his death, were given to the Maintenance of his Hales by him built of devotion; which for the Magnificence thereof, exceed all the rest before built by the Mahometan Kings and Emperors, except those which were the Buildings of Muhamet the Great, and Bojanet the Second. 'It was by many thought, that Selymus was in good time by death cut off, as purposing that year to have wintred in Hungary, and the year following to have done great matters against the Christians both by Sea and Land.

1567. The great Army of the Turks that drew off of Hungary by the death of Selymus, in some part affwaged, but altogether appeared not the endless Troubles of that unfortunate Kingdom. Maximilian the Emperor on the one side, and John the Vayvod of Transylvania with the Turks Captains on the other, renting it in pieces, as if they had sworn the destruction thereof. The Vayvod desiring to recover the strong Castle of Tokay, in the frontiers of Hungary, first late; by taken from him by Swendi the Emperors Lieutenant, laid hard siege to it, and had brought it to great extremity, although it was nobly defended by Janos Raimond, the Captain thereof, when suddenly News was brought unto him, That the Tartars (whom he had called into his Country to have aided him against the Emperor) did with all sollicitly after their barbarous manner, burn and destroy his Country; before them, making havock of all things, so that the Country-people were glad in defence of themselves, to take up Arms against them. Whereupon he forthwith left the Siege, and went to Aid his distressed Subjects against the Tartars, with whom he had many an hot Skirmish; and after much bloodshed, at last overcame them, and with much ado rid himself of the said Guefts. Now in the mean time Swendi strengthened with new Supplies sent unto him from the Emperor, had taken the Castle of Zackmar in the Borders of Transylvania, and with like good Fortune had the Castle of Mungatz yielded unto him, and after that besieged the Town of Hufib; so that the Vayvod was glad to crave Aid of the Turkish Emperor Selymus, under whose Protection he was; who presently commanded Parias one of his chief Baffas, and then his greatest Lieutenant in Romania, to go with his Forces into Transylvania, to relieve them. But hearing that Embassadors were coming from Maximilian the Emperor, he called him back again, until he had heard the effect of that Embassage. At which time also the Baffa of Buda enclining unto Peace, sent Presents to the Emperor, requesting him to remove certain Hungarian Captains from off the Frontiers, lest happily they should interrupt the Treaty of Peace, then on both sides purposed; promising for his part, to punish with death all such Turks as should make any further Invasion, or raise any new Troubles. He writ Letters also to Count Salma, That he could not but marvel, to what end Maximilian the Emperor was about to treat with his Lord and Master of Peace, whilst Swendi in the mean time was raging in Transylvania; then under the Turks Protection; which if he proceeded still to do, Selymus would thereof take occasion (as he said) to turn all his Forces that way; wherefore he requested him to perswade the Emperor to take some more easie course in that behalf, promising also, that he would for his part effectually gravel with his Master, to have better liking of Peace than of Wars, willing him also to do the like. Which things as soon as the Emperor understood, he commanded Swendi to give over the Siege of Hufib, and to keep himself quiet until he might by his Embassadors understand what the Great Turk purposed, and how he was affected towards Peace.

Now indeed these two great Princes, Maximilian and Selymus (although they notably differed the nature of their minds) were both of them heart desirous of Peace, and that for divers great and urgent considerations. Maximilian for want of money saw it was not possible for him to fend into the field such an Army the next year as he had the year before. And Selymus, beside his other Troubles, was to take order for the appeasing of a great and dangerous Rebellion in the farthest part of his Dominions in Arabia Felix; where the people rising up in Arms, and having slain the Baffas and Sanzacks their Governors, were ready to have cast off the Turkish Obedience; neither was he but of fear of the Persians, ready (as was reported) to make War upon him. For which causes he wished rather for Peace with the Emperor Maximilian, than Wars; and so much the more, for that it was impossible for him to fend an Army of any puissance into Hungary, for want of many necessary Provisions for the maintenance thereof. In a Country so much impoverished by reason of his late Wars; wherein no Victuals were to be found for the relief of such a multitude of men as he was to fend, if he would do any good there. And truth it was (as the Turks themselves afterward reported) that Maximilian with his late Power he had in field, the last year, might have easily recovered the greatest part of that Kingdom before lost; but well knowing his own wants, and ignorant of theirs, he altogether inclining to Peace; and by Count Salma advertised from the Baffa of Buda, That if he would send Embassadors to Constantinople, with the Kibitbe woe to be there paid for his Journey, a Peace upon reasonable conditions might be easily obtained; he resolved upon that point. And to certain Messengers being sent up and down to Constantinople to the same effect, it was concluded, That if the Emperor would send Embassadors to Constantinople, with the Kibitbe yet behind, and a large Commission for the Treaty of Peace, Selymus should give him his life conduct, with liberty at their pleasure, to return to his Country of Peace or War. Which agreed upon, and fully promised on both sides, Selymus let at liberty the Lord Albert de Vais, who, six years lieger in Constantinople, first for the Emperor Ferdinand, and after for Maximilian, had now been bravely imprisoned in his own house by the space of 22 months, in such fort that neither he nor any of his household could go abroad, Watch and Ward being kept both day and night about his House, and his Windows also boarded up, to the end that he should not so much as look out into the City, or any whither else more than the Court of his House only. So the Emperor Maximilian now resolved to send Embassadors to Constantinople with the Tribute money and divers other rich Gifts and Presents, as well, to the Great Turk himself, as to the Vicer. Baffas his Counsellors; and conferring with his wisest men to be most fit, with Wisdom and Honour to bring this so weighty a matter about, having to do with so barbarous, covetous, and mighty a people, made choice of the Lord Anthonius Varanini, of Agria (of his Council for the Kingdom of Hungary) a Prelate of great Estimation, who being a man of 63 years, old, beside his great Learning, had the experience of 27 Embassies at wherein he always so discreetly bare himself, as well contented his Prince, and purchased unto himself the Reputation of a most grave and wise man; and about ten years before this Embassage, being sent by the Emperor Ferdinand Embassador to Selymus, and now by Maximilian, to Selymus at Constantinople, returning with good Success, was by the Emperor created a Prince of the Empire, and Bishop of Agria, unto which so honourable a Personage, having the charge of this so weighty a Matter, the Emperor the more to ennoble this Embassage, as also to purchase the greater Credit to his Embassador, joyed unto him a most honourable Baron, called the Lord Christopher Tufenbach of Stria, one of his Counsellors also for the Wars; who with full Instructions both taking their leave of the Emperor (then holding a Parliament at Freiburgh) departed, and being attended upon with a great and honourable Retinue, set forward the first of July, 1567. and so came to Comara a strong Town in Hungary, not past a League from the Turks Frontiers. In which place the Embassadors stayed until the seventh of July; and in the mean time gave knowledge of their coming unto the Governor of Strigomium, demanding for their security in the Enemies Country, to be met and received by some of his Garrison; which granted, they took their Barks brought from Vienna and Poffonium, sufficient for their greatness to have carried them down the River to Belgrade, with Horse and Wagon, and their whole Furniture; and to entering upon the Turks Dominion about a League or little more from Comara, being so far waisted by the Souldiers and Gallies of Comara, they were met by an Aga of the Turks, with a Chief called Decram (sent by the Baffa of Buda) in certain Gallies armed with Turkish Souldiers. To whom the Embassador at his landing delivered them to understand, that they were all fully to conduct both him and all his to the Baffa of Buda; which they answered to him ready to accomplish; and so courteously invited by the Embassadors, they came aboard their Bark, and there dined together. Here they that were went with them, leaving them in the hands of the Turks, having Licence to depart, returned to Comara; and they that day after five Leagues sailing arrived at Strigomium, where they were by the Governor of the City denied landing; for which so dishonourable a part he was afterward sharply rebuked by the Baffa of Buda. Yet as they lay that night upon the water, certain Turkish Minstrels, to do them Honour, and to get a Large, with their barbarous bawling Instruments played them up many a homely fit of mirth; and divers others with sundry sorts of vaulting and tumbling, and sometime leaping one upon another's shoulders, and sometimes doing their Tricks on the Earth, all the Evening shewed them great sport and pastime. From Strigomium they with five Leagues sailing came to Buda, leaving behind them the Castle of Vicerade, two Leagues distant from Strigomium. In this City of Buda lieth the great Baffa by whom all Hungary, with the Provinces thereto belonging (in Turkish Power) is governed. This City, sometime the Royal Seat of the Hungarian Kings, is situate upon a little Hill on the South side of Danubius, having in the South point thereof a Castle, much higher than the City, and of a most brave Prospect; in which Castle lieth a Captain with a Garrison of five hundred Souldiers (as the Turks say) howbeit it is thought that they are not altogether so many; it is the left of his Head to stir out of his Charge; and beside, he hath Commission to deny the Baffa himself Entrance, unless he come very slightly accompanied; so jealous are the Turks of that Castle, as if the State of Hungary depended thereon. Herein standeth the Kings Palace, which taketh up most part of the place, greatly beautified by Marbries, and shewing outwardly to have been a very stately thing; for there are in it both large Halls and fair Galleries and Chambers built in most Royal manner; where amongst other Rooms, the Embassadors found a decayed Library full of Pictures and Latin Titles of Books; all which things when they present themselves to the Eyes of the Christian beholders, offer a just consideration of noble and reverend Antiquity, and wishall strike into their hearts a certain compaction joy for many great Kings all waisted and brought to nothing. The next morning the Embassadors went to speak with the Baffa; whose House was reasonable fair (considering their gulf and custom, not much delighting in the beauty of their private buildings) situate upon the River side at the bottom of the Hill whereon the City standeth. Unto this Baffa the Embassadors presented two great gilt Cups, a Clock all curiously wrought in Gold, and a thousand Dollars; which Present the Baffa received in his Divano (being a large Hall) where he fate with his Counsellors, Officers, and other Turks in their places and order; some on his right hand, and some on his left, all richly attired in Garments of Silk of divers colours and fashions, reaching down to their Ankles after their manner; their Heads covered with their passing white and well made Turbans; in which Assembly nothing being then to be seen but goodly order and grave silence, they seemed to the strange beholders for many Counsellors of exceeding gravity and Reputation. Round about the Hall wherein the Embassadors had Audience, were many Seats covered with Turkey-Carpets; the rest of the Room being all vacant. The Baffa in a place more apparent than the rest, sitting in great Majesty; before whom was set two little Chairs on which (after he had stood up a while and embraced the Embassadors) he caused them both to sit down. Whole Speech delivered in the Italian Tongue, after they had discharged themselves of the Emperors Letters and Greetings, was to this common benefit of their Subjects, (in Hungary) requested him to continue in his good purpose, and dealing for Peace; and further, to give safe Conduct unto them his Embassadors with their Retinue, until they were come unto the Turks Court, where they were to entreat and conclude a Peace, to the ending of all Troubles, and the Privilege Benefit of their Subjects in general. Which Speech with cheerful and friendly countenance ended, many of the Embassadors Followers were admitted to kiss the Baffas hand, accounted no small Favour amongst those Barbarians. The Interpreter of these things was a Jew of Padua, who declared all that was spoken, in the Turkish Language unto the Baffa, and in the Italian unto the Embassadors. And although (if it had been their pleasure) they might have told their mind each to other in the Croatian Tongue without an Interpreter; yet the Baffa standing more upon his Reputation, and for some other respects beside, would have the matter propounded and likewise answered in the Turkish. In which sort they also conferred continually afterward with the Baffas at Constantinople, unless it were in some particular and private talk of small Importance, or else in some point beside the matter; for then the Interpreter spake in the Croatian or Slavonian Tongue, which is familiar to most of the Turks, but especially to the men of War. Before this Hall where the Embassadors were entertained by the Baffa, in the base Court stood all the Janizaries in goodly Array, and his Slaves with their red Zarcus on their Heads, and other Souldiers with high and long Plumes of Feathers standing upright; all which made a beautiful shew, and gave all great grace to the Basses Court. These men sit not one foot in their standings, and if the Constitution do last four hours long, so long are they to continue standing without moving. The Embassadors having stayed two days at Buda, were by the Bassa dismissed, sending with them his Chieftain (the Steward or Governor of his House) a man of great Reputation, and Becram the Chiaus (the same that came to meet them at Comara) with a sufficient Guard and certain Janizaries, sent for their more safe travelling, and to provide for them from place to place, all things necessary for their Diet, as also for their Horses, at the Turks charges. And thus accompanied, they embarked on the tenth day of the afore said month, towed up the Turks Gallies, which helped by the swiftness of the River, carried them down in eight days to Belgrade, where they arrived the eighteenth of July. So having staid at Belgrade, and there leaving their Boats, and taking their Coaches, they set forward by Land the twentieth of the said month, and with great pains travelling through Rascia, Bulgaria, and Thracia, and passing a part of the great Mountain Scardus, and after that, the Mountain Rhodope, to by the way of Philippolis and Hadrinople, the two and twentieth of August gathered fast upon Constantinople; where many of the Spahies and Chiaus of the Court, with a number of the Janizaries and other Soldiers, for their greater Honour came to meet them: a great way without the City. By whom the Embassadors honourably mounted on Horseback, were by them conducted to their Lodging appointed for them about the middle of the City; where the Lord Altera de la the Emperor's Embassador Liager (not long before Emperor's Embassador Liager) having long looked for their coming, now most joyfully received them. It was then Friday the Turks Sabbath, and a day of them above all other days in the week regarded, and about ten of the Clock two hours before Noon; at which time the Embassadors were no sooner alighted, but that Selymus going to hear the Ceremonies of his Religion, in the Moschey of his Father Solyman (as his manner was sometime to do) passed along before the Gate where the Embassadors lay, with the whole Train of his Court; and peradventure somewhat more than ordinary, to shew the Magnificence of his Power and State, to the end that the Embassadors (above the former opinion by them conceived) might hold him in the Reputation of a most puissant and mighty Monarch. He passing by, vouchsafed not once to give them a regard, or so much as to cast his eye aside upon them, although they were strangers, and but even then arrived; but with a Countenance as if he had known not so much as any thing of their coming, held on his way as it lay. But Mahomet the chief Vicer Bassa, with the other Basses and great Courtiers, in most gracious manner as they passed by cast their eyes upon them; all the courtiers they could then shew them. Six days after, being the eight and twentieth of August, the Embassadors all three went to visit and salute Mahomet (or as the Turks call him Mahomet) the chief Vicer Bassa, as the manner was, presenting him from the Emperor, with four Cups of Silver all gilt, of most fair and curious Workmanship; of which, two of them being greater than the other, were three spans high, the other two being not so high by a span, but having in them two thousand Turks of Gold; besides which, they gave him also a Clock, being a most curious piece of Work, and all over

double gilt. After which Greetings and Presents delivered, besides the contents of his Majesties Letters, they declared unto him in general points, the cause of their coming, and the mind of the Emperor well disposed to a Peace; and what great benefit would arise thereby to both Parties; and lastly turning over the blame of the late Wars, and laying the fault thereof to the charge of others, sweetened thereby the fower of their former dealings. Neither was the Bassa likewise for his part to seek for goods words, but answered them in Turkish by the mouth of El-brain the chief Dragoman, who drew his mind to them in Latin or Italian, according as the Embassadors had before uttered theirs, which Parle so ended, certain of the chief of the Embassadors Followers were admitted into the Divano to kiss the proud Basses hand. The same day the Embassadors also saluted Pertau the second Bassa, and Ferat the third in Order and Authority. To Pertau they presented two Cups of Silver all gilt, beside a Clock of the same making with the afore named, and two thousand Dollars; and the like to Ferat. The next day they went to visit the other three Basses, Achmet, Fial, and Mahomet, presenting very one of them with two fair Cups and a thousand Dollars. These were the six Vicer Basses to Selymus, then lying at Court with him, men that for Wealth and Authority went before all other in the Turkish Empire; as in the course of this History may appear. And so having visited them in general, the Embassadors to fix their Affairs on foot, the fourteenth of September closed with Mahomet, to whom the ordering of El-kait-matters was especially committed. Yet after this first Conference, because it was necessary before so weighty Affairs were broached, first to do the Turk Reverence, and to deliver the Presents, with the Emperors Letters to him written; for some few days there was not any Point at all of the Embassadors business handled.

Selymus not long after the Embassadors were arrived, went out for his disport and pleasure on hunting; so that in the mean time, after the Presents were given to the Basses, matters stood still altogether unadvanced, until the 21 of September; and that day (Selymus being now returned from his Disport) it was appointed that the Embassadors should have Audience at the Court. Whereupon they made choice of their Followers, of those that should attend upon them, which were not in all above twelve persons; for they to whom this Charge was committed, said it was neither the manner, nor yet meet, that any great Train should come before so great a Prince, and that they might not bring with them above that number: whereupon they appointed but six a piece to attend them; and five of fifteen Cups of Silver and gilt, being most of fifteen Cups of Silver and gilt, being most of twelve to carry, and they ordered to go by two and two before the rest that came after in order with the rest of the Presents; which was two exceeding precious Clocks, like in bigness to them before given to the Basses, but far above them in value; and 45000 Dollars for the Tribute, behind and yet unpaid. The greatest of those Cups was six Spans and a half, and the least two spans in height; some of them being double those Spans, after the High-Dutch manner. The Embassadors (whose coming a great multitude of Janizaries attended below at the Gate of their Lodging; besides made of the Spahies and Chiaus, and others of good fort (which were come to honour them with their Presence to the Palace) putting themselves in readiness betimes in the Morning, and taking Horse set forward toward the Court. The form they were that did bear the Presence in their hands, and people of the City in every Street flocking together in exceeding multitudes to behold them as they passed; and verily there had been feldom times seen the like Embassage in those parts; for besides the Fame that was blown abroad in every quarter, That they were Men sent from one of the greatest Princes in Chriftendom; the diversity of their Attire (so few as they were) more of the Christian Emperor to them, than any thing beside, did represent the Majesty which they carried; and that they gazed upon his Embassadors and their Train, the people conceiving thereby, that he was Lord and Ruler over many Provinces and Countries. For they that were Hungarians belonging to the Bishop of Agria (the chief Embassador) being attired in long and fober Garments of very fine Purple-Cloth, having their Shooes pieced over the soles with Iron-Plates, and half their Heads shaven, seemed to differ from them but little; but on the other side, the High-Dutch attired in black, with their Velvet Caps, and short Cloaks laid with Silver Lace, and long Breaches little less than Rutter-wife, and Chains of Gold about their Necks, appeared very strange and uncouth to the Turkish people; so accompanied in this honourable wife, the Embassadors entered the first Gate of the Great Turks Palace. This Gate is built of Marble in most sumptuous manner, and of a stately piece, with certain words of their Language in the front thereof engraven and gilt in Marble. So passing through the base Court, which hath on the right side very fair Gardens, and on the left, divers Buildings serving for other Offices, with a little Moschey, they came to the second Gate, where all such as come in riding, must of necessity alight; here so soon as they were entered in at this second Gate, they came into a very large Square Court, with Buildings and Galleries round about it, the Kitchens standing on the right hand, with other Lodgings for such as belonged to the Court, and on the left hand likewise Rooms deputed to like Services. There are moreover many Halls and other Rooms for resort, where they sit in Council, handling and executing the Publick Affairs either of the Court or of the Empire, with other matters, where the Basses and other Officers assemble together. Entering in at this second Gate, in one part of the Court, which seem'd rather some large Street, they saw the whole Company of the Solahs set in a goodly rank, which are Archers keeping always near unto the Person of the Great Turk and serving as his Footmen when he rideth; they use high Plumes of Feathers, which are set bolt upright over their Foreheads. In another place there stood the Capitani in like Array, with black Staves of Indian Cane in their hands; they are the Porters and Wardens of the Gates of the Palace, not much differing in their Attire from the Janizaries; who stood in rank likewise in another quarter. And beside all those, with many more that were out of order, as well of the Court as of the common people, those Knights of the Court which accompanied the Embassadors thither, with other great Ones also of like degree, were marshalled all in their several Companies. And among the rest, the Murshachas, Men of all Nations and all Religions (for their Valour the only free men which live at their own liberty in the Turkish Empire) stood there, apparelled in Damask Velvet and Cloth of Gold, and Garments of Silk of sundry kinds and colours; their Pomp was great, and the greater; for the Turbans that they wore upon their Heads, being as white as whiteness it self, made a most swift and goodly shew well worth the beholding. In brief, wher they were to be considered all at once, or in particular, as well for the order that they kept, as for their sumptuous presence, altogether without noise or rumor; they made the Embassadors and the rest of their Followers there present, eye-witnesses both of their Obedience, and of the great State and Royalty of the Othman Court. Passing through them, the Embassadors were led into the Hall, where the Basses and other great Men of the Court were all ready to give them Entertainment; they of their Train being at the same time brought into a Room that stood apart under one of the afore said Lodgings all hung with Turkey-Carpets. Soon after (as their use and manner is) they brought in their Dinner, covering the ground with Table-Cloths of a great length spread upon Carpers, and afterward fastening upon them a marvelous number of wooden spoons, with so great store of Bread, as if they had been to feed 300 persons; then they set out Meat in order, which was served in 44 great Platters of Earth, full of Rice-pottage of three or four kinds, differing one from another, some of them seasoned with Honey, and of the colour of Honey; some with four Milk, and white of colour; and some with Sugar; they had Fricases also, which were made of like Bacon; and Mutton beside, or rather a dainty and toothsome morsel of an old foddren Ewe. The Table (if there had any such been) thus furnished, the Guests without any Ceremony of washing, face down on the ground (for Stools there were none) and fell to their Victual, and drank out of great earthen Dishes, Water prepared with Sugar, which kind of Drink they call Zerbet. But lo! having made a short repast, they were no sooner risen up, but certain young Men, who were called Giamagani, with others that stood round about them, snatched it hastily up as their Fees, and like greedy Harpies ravished it down in a moment. The Embassadors in the mean time dined in the Hall with the Basses. And after dinner certain of the Capitazies were sent for, and twelve of the Embassadors Followers, before appointed to do the Great Sultan Reverence; by whom (their Presents being already conveyed away) they were removed out of the place where they dined, and brought on into an under Room, from whence there was an ascent into the Hall, where the Basses were staying for the Embassadors; who soon after came forth, and for their ease sat them down upon the Benches, whilst the Basses went in to Selymus; who before this time had made an end of Dinner, and was removed in all his Royalty, into one of his Chambers, expecting the coming of the Embassadors. All things now in readiness, and the Embassadors sent for, they set forward with their Train, and came to the third Gate, which leadeth into the Privy-Palace of the Turkish Emperor, where none but himself, his Eunuchs, and the young Pages his Minions, being in the Eunuchs custody, have continual abiding; into which inward part of the Palace none entrench but the Capitazies (who have the keeping of this third Gate) and the Cesigniers (that serve in the Turks Meat) with the Basses and some few other great Men; and that only when they have occasion so to do by reason of some great business, or sent for by the Sultan. Being entered in at this Gate, which is of a Stately and Royal Building, the Capitazies whom they were conducted suddenly caused them to stay, and set them one from another about long Plumes of Feathers standing upright; all which made a beautiful show, and gave all grace to the Basses Court. These men stir not One foot in their standings, so long are they to continue standing without moving. The Embassadors having stayed two days at Buda, were by the Bassa dismissed, sending with his Chieftain (the Steward or Governor of his House) a man of great Reputation, and Besim the Chiaus (the same that came to meet them at Comera) with a sufficient Guard and certain Janizaries, sent for their more safe travelling, and to provide for them from place to place, all things necessary for their Diet, as also for their Horses, at the Turks charges. And thus accompanied, they embarked the tenth day of the aforesaid month, towed up the Turks Gallies, which holpen by the swifts of the River, carried them down in eight days of July, where they arrived the eighteenth of July. So having staid at Belgrade, and there leaving their Boats, and taking their Coaches, they set forward by Land the twentieth of the said month, and with great pains travelling through Rafcia, Bulgaria, and Thracia, and passing a part of the great Mountain Scardus, and after that, the Mountain Rhodope, by the way of Patria, the Mountain Hedrimople, the two and twentieth of August gathered fast upon Constantinople; where many of the Spahies and Chiaus of the Court, with a number of the Janizaries and other Soldiers, for their greater Honour came to meet them: a great way without the City. By whom the Embassadors honourably mounted on Horseback, were by them conducted to their Lodging appointed for them about the middle of the City, where the Lord Albert de Vau the Emperors Embassador Lierge (not long before enlarged) having long looked for their coming, now most joyfully received them. It was then Friday the Turks Sabbath, and a day of them above all other days in the week regarded, and about ten of the Clock two hours before Noon; at which time the Embassadors were no sooner alighted, but that Selymas going to hear the Ceremonies of his Religion, in the Mosky of his Father Selymas (as his manner was sometime to do) passed along before the Gate where the Embassadors lay, with the whole Train of his Court; and peradventure somewhat more than ordinary, to shew the Magnificence of his Power and State, to the end that the Embassadors (above the former opinion by them conceived) might hold him in the Reputation of a most puissant and mighty Monarch. He passing by, vouchsafed not once to give them a regard, or so much as to cast his eye aside upon them, although they were strangers, and but even then arrived; but with a Countenance as if he had known not so much as any thing of their coming, held on his way as it lay. But Mubame the chief Visier Bassa, with the other Basses and great Courtiers, in most gracious manner as they passed by cast their eyes upon them; all the courtiers they could then shew them. Six days after, being the eight and twentieth of August, the Embassadors all three went to visit and salute Mubame (or as the Turks call him Mubame) the chief Visier Bassa, as the manner was, presenting him from the Emperor, with four Cups of Silver all gilt, of most fair and curious Workmanship, of which, two of them being greater than the other, were three spans high, the other two being not so high by a span, but having in them two thousand Ducats of Gold; besides which, they gave him also a Clock, being a most curious piece of Work, and all over

double gilt. After which Greetings and Presents delivered, besides the contents of his Majesties Letters, they declared unto him in general points, the cause of their coming, and the mind of the Emperor well disposed to a Peace; and what great benefit would arise thereby to both Parties; and lastly turning over the blame of the late Wars, and laying the fault thereof to the charge of others, sweetened thereby the fower of their former dealings. Neither was the Bassa likewise for his part to seek for goods words, but answered them in Turkish by the mouth of Hibram the chief Dragoman, who delivered his mind to them in Latin or Italian, according as the Embassadors had before uttered theirs; which Parle he ended, certain of the chief Basses, Achmet, Pial, and Mubame, presenting every one of them with two fair Cups and a thousand Dollars. These were the six Visier Basses to Selymas, then lying at Court with him, men that for Wealth and Authority went before all other in the Turkish Empire, as in the course of this History may appear. And so having visited them in general, the Embassadors to set their Affairs on foot, the fourth of September dined with Mubame, to whom the ordering of Estate-matters was especially committed. Yet after this first Conference, because it was necessary before so weighty Affairs were broached, first to do the Turk Reverence, and to deliver the Presents, with the Emperors Letters to him written; for some few days there was no Point at all of the Embassadors business handled.

Selymas not long after the Embassadors were arrived, went out for his disport and pleasure on hunting; so that in the mean time, after the Presents were given to the Basses, matters stood still altogether unadvanced, until the 21 of September; and that day (Selymas being now returned from his Disport) it was appointed that the Embassadors should have Audience at the Court. Whereupon they made choice out of their Followers, of those that should attend upon them, which were not in all above twelve persons; for they to whom this Charge was committed, said it was neither the manner, nor yet meet, that any great Train should come before so great a Prince, and that they might not bring with them above that number; whereupon they appointed but six a piece to attend them, and of fifteen Cups of Silver and gilt, being most curiously and cunningly engraven, one of the fairest among the rest was given to each of those twelve to carry, and they ordered to go by two and two before the rest that came after in order with the rest of the Presents; which was two exceeding precious Clocks, like in bigness to them before given to the Basses, but far more them in value; and 45000 Dollars for the Tribute behind and yet unpaid. The greatest of these Cups was six Spans and a half, and the least two Spans in height; some of them being double Cups, after the High-Dutch manner. The Embassadors (whose coming a great multitude of Janizaries attended below at the Gate of their Lodging; besides made of the Spahies and Chiaus, and others of good fort (which were comto honour them with their Presence to the Palace) putting themselves in readines betimes in the Morning, and taking Horse set forward toward the Court. The foremost were they that did bear the Present in their hands, the people of the City in every Street flocking together in exceeding multitudes to behold them as they passed; and verily there had been feldoms times seen the like Emphange in those parts; for besides the Fame that was blown abroad in every quarter, That they were Men sent from one of the greatest Princes in Christendom; the diversity of their Attire (so few as they were) more than any thing beside, did represent the Majesty of the Christian Emperor to them that gazed upon his Embassadors and their Train, the people conceiving thereby, that he was Lord and Ruler over many Provinces and Countries. For they that were Hungarians belonging to the Bishop of Agria (the chief Embassador) being attired in long and fober Garments of very fine Purple-Cloth, having their Shoes pieced over the soles with Iron-Plates, and half their Heads shaven, seemed to differ from them but little; but on the other side, the High-Dutch, the Attire in black, with their Velvet Caps, and their Cloaks laid with Silver Lace, and long Breaches little less than Rutter-wire, and Chains of Gold about their Necks, appeared very strange and uncouth to the Turkish people; so accompanied in this honourable wife, the Embassadors entered the first Gate of the Great Turks Palace. This Gate is built of Marble in most sumptuous manner, and of a flame bright with certain words of their Language in the front thereof engraven and gilt in Marble. So passing through the safe Court, which hath on the right side very fair Gardens, and on the left, divers Buildings serving for other Offices, with a little Mosky, they came to the second Gate, where all such as come in riding, must of necessity alight; here so soon as they were entered in at this second Gate, they came into a very large Square Court, with Buildings and Galleries round about it, the Kitchens standing on the right hand, with other Lodgings for such as belonged to the Court, and on the left hand likewise Rooms deputed to like Services. There are moreover many Halls and other Rooms for resort, where they sit in Council, handling and executing the Publick Affairs either of the Court or of the Empire, with others, where the Basses and other Officers assemble together. Entering in at this second Gate, in one part of the Court, which seem'd rather some large Street, they saw the whole Company of the Solahs set in a goodly rank, which are Archers keeping always near unto the Person of the Great Turk and serving as his Footmen when he rideth; they use high Plumes of feathers, which are bolt upright over their Foreheads. In another place stood the Capizai in like Array, with black Staves of Indian Cane in their hands; they are the Porters and Wardens of the Gates of the Palace; not much differing in their Attire from the Janizaries; who stood in rank likewise in another quarter. And beside all those, with many more that were out of order, as well of the Court as of the common people, those Knights of the Court, which accompanied the Embassadors thither, with other great Ones also of like degree, were Marshallled all in their several Companies. And among the rest, the Musliarches, Men of all Nations and all Religions (for their Valour the only free men which live at their own liberty in the Turkish Empire) stood there, apparelled in Damask Velvet and Cloth of Gold, and Garments of Silk of sundry kinds and colours; their Pomp

was great, and the greater, for the Turbans that they wore upon their Heads, being as white as whiteness itself, made a most brave and goodly shew well worth the beholding. In brief, whether they were to be considered all at once, or in particular, as well for the order that they kept, as for their sumptuous presence, altogether without noise or rumor; they made the Embassadors and the rest of their Followers there present, eyewitnesses both of their Obedience, and of the great State and Royalty of the Ottoman Court. Passing through them, the Embassadors were led into the Hall, where the Basses and other great Men of the Court were all ready to give them Entertainment; they of their Train being at the same time brought in, and stood apart under one of the aforesaid Lodgings all hung with Turkey-Carpets. Soon after (as their use and manner is) they brought in their Dinner, covering the ground with Table-Cloths of a great length spread upon Carpets, and afterward fastening upon them a marvelous number of wooden Spoons, with so great store of Bread, as if they had been to feed 200 persons; then they set on Meat in order, which was served in 42 great Plates of Earth, full of Rice-pottage of three or four kinds, differing one from another, some of them seasoned with Honey, and of the colour of Honey; some with four Milk, and white of colour; and some with Sugar; they had Fritters also, which were made of like Batter; and Mutton beside, or rather a dainty and toothsome morsel of an old fiddens Ewe. The Table (if there had any such been) thus furnished, the Guests without any Ceremony of washing, fate down on the ground (for Stools there were none) and fell to their Victual, and drank out of great earthen Dishes, Water prepared with Sugar, which kind of Drink they call Zerbet. But so having made a short repast, they were no longer risen up, but certain young Men whom they call Giamasars, with others that stood round about them, snatch it hastily up as their Fees, and like greedy Harpies ravened it down in a moment. The Embassadors in the mean time dined in the Hall with the Basses. And after dinner certain of the Capizais were sent for, and twelve of the Embassadors Followers, before appointed to do the Great Sultan Reverence; by whom (their Presents being already conveyed away) they were removed out of the place where they dined, and brought on into an under Room, from whence there was an ascent into the Hall, where the Basses were staying for the Embassadors, who soon after came forth, and for their ease fat them down upon the Benches, whilst the Basses went in to Selymas, who before this time had made an end of Dinner, and was removed in all his Royalty, into one of his Chambers, expecting the coming of the Embassadors. All things now in readines, and the Embassadors sent for, they set forward with their Train, and came to the third Gate, which leadeth into the Privy-Palace of the Turkish Emperor, where none but himself, his Eunuchs, and the young Pages his Minions, being in the Eunuchs custody, have continual abiding; in which lower part of the Palace none entred but the Capizai Bassa (who hath the keeping of this third Gate) and the Cesigniers (that serve in the Turks Meat) with the Basses and some few other great Men; and that only when they have occasion so to do by reason of some great business, or sent for by the Sultan. Being entered in at this Gate, which is of a Stately and Royal Building, the Capizai by whom they were conducted suddenly caused them to stay, and for them one from another about five Paces, in a little Room, which nevertheless was paffing-delicate, all curiously painted over with divers Colours, and flood between the Gate and the most inner Lodgings. On both sides of which Room, where all things else were white and in a deep Silence, certain little Birds only were heard to warble out their sweet Notes, and to flicker up and down the green Trees of the Gardens (which all along cast a pleasant shadow from them) as if they alone had obtained Licence to make a noise. Selymus himself was in great Majesty fit in an under Chamber, parted only with a Wall from the Room wherein the Embassadors Followers attended, whereinto he might look through a little Window, the Portal of his said Chamber standing in counterpoint with the third Gate above mentioned. The Embassadors entering in, were led single, and one after another, to make their Reverence unto the Great Turk. And in the mean time certain of the Capitaz with the Prefents in their hands fetching a compass about before the Window, muttered them in his sight. All this while not the least found in the World being raised, but a sacred Silence kept in every corner, as if men had been going to visit the holiest place in Jerusalem. Yet for all that, the Embassadors Followers placed one from another (as is aforesaid) were not aware that the great Sultan was so near, looking fill when they should have been led on forwards all together; howbeit they were for in one after another, neither did they that were so set out, return again into the Room, but were generally done their Reverence, were all (except the Embassadors, that fill staid in the Chamber) by one and one sent out another way into the Court; neither could he that came after, see his Fellow that went before him, after he was once taken in to do his Reverence; but suddenly as the former was let out, the next was advanced forward to the door, where Yman the Capitaz-Bassa and the Odda-Bassa, taking him by both Arms and by the Neck, the one at the right hand, and the other at the left, and so leading him apace, by the way softly felt his wrists with their hands, lest peradventure he might have some short Weapon in his sleeve. Yet were they not all thus gazed, as Marc, Antonio Pigafetta (the Reporter of this Negotiation) faith of himself and some others also. Howbeit this hath been, and yet is the manner of giving of Access unto the Person of the Great Turk, ever since that Anwarat the Fifth was after the battle of Caffera murdered by one of the Emperors Followers; men, who admitted to his Presence, in revenge of the wrong done unto his Master, with a short Poniard that he had closely hidden about him, so stabbed him in the Belly, that he presently died. And thus like men rather carried to prison by Sergeants, than to the Presence of so mighty a Monarch, they were presented unto his Majesty: he sitting upon a Pallat, which the Turks call Adahis, used by them in their Chambers to sleep and to feed upon, covered with Carpets of Silk, as was the whole floor of the Chamber. This Chamber it self being not very great, was but dark, altogether without Windows, excepting that one whereof we have before spoken, and having the Walls painted and set out in most flesh and lively Colours by great cunning, and with a most delicate Grace; yet use they neither Pictures nor the Image of any thing in their painting. The six Vifier Bassas before mentioned, were standing at the left hand as they entered in the Chamber door, one by another in one side of the Chamber, and the Embassadors on the right hand on the other side standing likewise, and uncovered: The Dragomans were in another part of the Chamber, near the place where the Sultan sat gorgeously attired in a Robe of Cloth of Gold all embroidered with Jewels; when as the Embassadors Followers by one and one brought before him, (as is aforesaid) and kneeling on the ground, a Turk standing on his right hand, with his Reverence taking up the Hand of the Great Turk, gave it them in their hands to kiss. Selymus himself all this while sitting like an Image without moving, and with a great State and Majesty keeping his countenance, dained not to give them one of his looks. This done, they were led back again, never turning their backs towards him, but going fill backwards until they were out of his Presence. So after they had all thus made their Reverence, and were departed out of the Chamber, the Embassadors delivered unto Selymus the Emperors Letters, and briefly declared unto him their Message; whom he answering in four words, as, That they were to confer with the Bassas; presently they were dismissed. And so coming out of the two inner Gates, they mounted on Horseback, and took the way leading towards their Lodging, being at their return accompanied with the whole order of the Janizaries, with their Aga and other Captains; among whom were certain of their Religious Men called Hagi (which use to follow the Janizaries) who continually turning about, and in their going, singing or rather howling out certain Palms and Prayers for the Welfare of their Great Sultan; gave the Embassadors and their Followers occasion to wonder, that they either left not for weariness, or fell not down like Noddies for giddiness. All these were sent, the more honourably to accompany the Embassadors to their Lodging; and beside these, many more on Horseback than attended them at their coming forth; in regard whereof, the Embassadors when they were come to their Lodging, to require their greedy courtiers, frankly distributed amongst them above four thousand Dollars, and yet well contented them.

The Embassadors after this Entertainment at Court, had divers times Conference with the great Bassas concerning Peace, as Selymus had commanded; wherein by reason of the Turks unreasonable Demands (as their manner is at their first meetings) nothing could be as then concluded; so that Selymus himself being shortly after to depart for Hadiamople, where he was to continue for some months (but rather as it was thought for that they could not come to a Point of great Conference) the Treaty for Peace was intermitted, until such time as a Messenger dispatched in Post, might return unto the Turks Court, with some resolute Answer concerning that matter. So it was, that during the Reign of the late Emperor Ferdinand, that the Turk his Subjects in Hungary paid all their Taxes and Tributes unto their old Lords and Masters, abiding and living in the Emperors Jurisdiction, as did the Subjects Ferdinand, to their Lords that dwelt in the Turks Dominion and Territories; now in this Treaty for Peace, the Turks (amongst other their unreasonable Requests) demanded to have these Subjects freed, and yet the Subjects of the Emperor to pay as they were before accustomed. Which was it was a request nothing indifferent, for it was no less prejudicial and hurtful unto the Emperor his Subjects in Hungary; for which cause the Embassadors would not by any means consent thereto, before they knew the Emperors farther Pleasure concerning the same. Whereupon they dispatched one Sig. Olsendorf a Gentleman of Altmark, very skilful in the Turkish Language and in such like affairs, by reason that as well about this business business as at divers times before about other the like, he had been employed from Vienno into the Emperors Service. So Selymus shortly after, viz. the twentieth of October, departing from Constantinople, in great Magnificence passed by the Gate where the Embassadors lay, with his whole Court in Arms, and in the same order that is usually kept when he goeth to War, or take any great Journey. After whose departure, the Embassadors having sufficiently viewed the City of Constantinople, and then at good leisure, to pass the time and to see the Countries they had so often both heard and read of, together with the Ports and Havens on both sides that narrow Sea which divideth Europe from Asia, embarking themselves, and crossing the mouth of the Haven betwixt Constantinople and Pera, passed all along the Coast on Europe side, unto the Euxine or Black-Sea, and to back again by the other side of that Straight Sea; curiously noting the great ruins of the ancient Cities of Bithynia, with some others amongst the Asian shore, together with the pleasant situation they in former times had, whilst they yet flourished in their glory, but now for most part (or rather for altogether) laid in the Dust and brought to nought; and so returned again to Constantinople. But whilst they thus decided the time, and lay long expecting the return, as well of their own Messenger unto the Emperor, as of Selymus himself, they were advertised in all haste to repair unto him to Hadiamople, whether the aforesaid Messenger was now come with full Instructions of all things concerning the Treaty for Peace. For which cause, they with great speed making themselves ready, and taking their leave of the great Admiral, then lay Selymus his forward the first of January, in the year 1568, and so after nine days travel, at length arrived at Hadiamople, about an hundred fifty three Italian miles distant from Constantinople. Here they stayed until the Peace was concluded, which was the seventeenth of February; the chief Capitulations whereof were, That either of those great Princes should fill hold what they had got each from the other in the late Wars: That the Emperor should yearly pay thirty thousand Ducats to the Turkish Sultan, as a Tribute for Hungary, the Tribute to begin in the beginning of January last past this year 1568. That the Subjects of the Turk should pay nothing to the Subjects of the Emperor, neither the Emperor any thing to the Turks, but to be both of them free from any more. And that upon these Conditions there should be a firm and sure Peace betwixt these two great Monarchs for eight years next following; wherein the Payvod of Transylvania was (as the Turks Tributary) to be also comprehended. Nevertheless, all things at this time thus agreed upon, the Turks after their subtil manner finding sundry Cavitations, and raising many doubts about the aforesaid Capitulations, did what they might to have in some sort altered what they had before agreed upon, to the benefiting of themselves and the hurt of the Christians; and so with many other unreasonable Demands stayed the departure of the Embassadors until the twentieth of March following. At which time, having their Dispatch, and taking their leave of the Great Turk and the Bassas, accompanied with Hidram-Beg (Selymus his Embassador unto the Emperor) they by Land returned towards Vienno, where they arrived with the joyful News of Peace the tenth of May, arrived, being there two days after at the Court most honourably received. And five days after, Audience was given unto the Turks Embassador, who well heard and better rewarded, shortly after returned with a full conclusion of Peace from the Emperor, to Constantinople.

But whilst this Peace was thus in concluding, and the Embassadors yet resident at Hadiamople, the sixteenth of February came an honourable Embassage from Shack Tamaz the Persian King, unto the Great Sultan Selymus, to treat a Peace betwixt them, or rather to conclude the same, being before agreed upon the Controversies, for which they afterwards fell to open War. Which Embassage for that it is so truly thus not plainly set down in a Letter sent from Eretrum (a City then in the Confinnes of the Turkish Dominions towards the Persian) written by a Chiaus to Muhamed Chief of the Vifier Bassas; which Chiaus was of purpose sent from Constantinople, to meet the said Persian Embassador: I thought it not amiss for the better understanding thereof, to set down the effect of the same Letter as it was translated out of the Turkish into the Italian by the Emperors Embassadors Interpreter.

The effect of the Letter written to Muhamed Bassa, the Chief Vifier, by a Chiaus sent of purpose to meet the Persian Embassador.

After due Salutations, this is the effect of that which we thought good to make known unto your Lordship. Now at this present (to wit in the beginning of the month Giama Sulacchi) is in good health arrived the Embassador of Persia, the King's Chief Counselor, called * Schach Kuli Soltan, attended with a hundred and twenty Gentlemen, with Schach Kuli Soltan on their Heads; and well furnished with his three Elephants led in Mien bands. Besides whom he was accompanied also with two hundred Knights all apparelled in Clab of Gold, with four hundred Persian Merchants, in all above four hundred Persons; with a thousand nine hundred Reas, Camels, Mules, and Horses, five couple of Drums, every couple being placed upon a several Camel, five Nears, three Trumpets, five Flutes, and other Instruments, in all about thirty Musicians, playing upon these Instruments: There were also two Quarters of or Chaunters of the discram, one Organist, one playing upon a Turkish Instrument like a Lute, two Players upon Soghar, with two other Musicians, eight in all. There were also four Bandumens serving in the Embassadors own Chamber. Who when he was with all this Magnificent Pomp came within one day's journey of Eretrum, the * Sayms and * Sayms Sables assembling themselves together in the number of eight thousand Men, went to meet him; and among whom were an hundred and more, all apparelled in Clab of Gold and Satin, two thousand the Spahs, Men with gilt Morions on their Heads; in which having their bravery well marching forward, the Persian Embassador amazed to see so great Majesty and Pomp, said that all the Army of Constantinople was after as come to meet him; and so being come unto the City, the left flank all the Instruments to be played upon, even out of the town, sounding until night. The next morning, the Persian Embassador received the Bassa with all the Lords, Towns and Officers; who being come, he entertained them to Village. Hidram-Beg (Selymus his Embassador unto the Emperor) going to the Banquet, came another Salutation of the King, who brought unto the same Embassador a gilt Turban, and a rich Crown wrought with Gold, which

which he caused him to put on by the way. By this Embassador the Persian King hath sent all the Armour of Sultan Bajazet, with all his Camels and other Wealth. The causes of the long stay of this Embassador were especially two; the one for that the Persian King had to be made two Pavilions of one Piece, the Curtains being interlaced with Gold, and the Supporters interlaced with the same; and the other this, he sent two Books of Histories, and two Pearls, which in weight weighed ten Mycali; one Ballas as big as a little Pearl; fourfcore and two times an hundred & twenty of Stuff, amounting to fourfcore and two fims of Aspers, and forty Falcans; all which the Persian King hath sent unto the Great Sultan, as to the only Monarch and Patron of the World. This Schach Culi is the next in Authority the King, and so was in the time of great King Hymael. The two Persian times are the Kings chief Sultans and Courtiers, and therefore sit themselves forth with all the Pomp they can. Yet notwithstanding all their Bravery, being come to Erzurum within the view of our Army, the Persians were amazed to behold the goodly order of the Othomans. One part of these Persians returned again into Persia. And if it please God, at the coming of my Ambassador unto you, your Lordship shall understand of the Condition and State these two Princes and Sultans are. They have each of them yearly fix Taxmans; which maketh after the computation of the Othomans, six thousand Aspers. Your Lordship after this account may judge of the rest. The other cause of the long stay of this Embassador, was for that in Syrtan the people were up in Rebellion, wherein many of them were slain; to the appeasing of which Sedition, the Schach Culi was sent, and new at last is come. From Erzurum in the beginning of the month of * Giuma Salaccir, in the year of the Prophet Mahomet, 975.

This Persian Embassador was with the greatest Pomp that might be entertained by the Turks at his first coming to Hadrassano, all the brave Courtiers with the Janizaries and other Soldiers of the Court going forth in most seemly order to meet him. Who now entered the City, and came before the house where the Emperors Embassadors then lay, and seeing certain of their Retinue before the door, asked of Ismam the Capitai Bafia, what people they were; who told them that they were the Followers of one of the greatest Princes of the Christians, namely the Emperor, who was desirous to make Peace with the Great Sultan his Master. Whereunto the Embassador replied, That he would willingly salute them; which Ismam hearing, straight way turned his Horse towards the place where they stood. Now the Emperors Embassador being secret within a Lattice, and seeing him come towards them, went forth and stood upon the Door-threshold, and so with signs and words saluted one another. Among the others the Persian Embassador said unto the Emperors, That he would gladly talk with him, if it might please the Grand Seigneur; Hebrahim the Dragoman who then was with the Emperors Embassadors, being Interpreter. So having courteously saluted one the other, they departed, but never after came together. Two days after, the Persian Embassadors (according to the manner of those barbarous Nations, who with empty hands salute not one another) by his Chocai or Steward of his Household, presented all the Vifier Baffes with divers rich Gifts and Presents every one of them according to their degrees and places; and the day after went himself to visit them; where by the way fell out a strange matter, like enough to have cost him his life. For a Giamoglan (as the Embassador was saying) who was the chief of the Vifier Baffes for the first) meeting him, shot at him with an Harquebush, with purpose to have slain him; but as God would, missed him, and hurt but one of his chief Followers in the Arm. Wherewith the Embassador not a little dismayed, as supposing himself to have been betrayed, turning his Horse, was about to have gone to his Lodging; but the great Bafia in the mean time having knowledge thereof, presently sent out men to Guard him, and to excoise himself of the Fact. Wherof the Embassador being assured, held on his way. In the mean space, the Fellow who shot the Harquebush, being apprehended, was brought before the Embassador and the Bafia; who asking him for what cause he discharged the shot against the Embassador? he without change of countenance boldly answered, That he did it for no other cause, but for that the Embassador was an Heretic, and sent that on a Heretical King, and an Enemy to their Religion; and therefore that it was not convenient he should come to intreat of Peace with his Lord; adding further, that he was not worthy of any Peace. Which the Bafia hearing, adjudged the desperate Villain the next day to be drawn at an Horse-tail through the City, and then to have his right Hand cut off, and afterwards his Head, which was accordingly put in execution. After this, the Persian Embassador the 22th of the same month went to deliver the Presents sent from his Master unto the Grand Seigneur, and to kiss his Hand; sending first before him the Presents upon 44 Camels, whereof 34 were the Kings of Persia, and the other ten his own. The Kings Present was an Alcoran, with the Austrie of Alit, as they hold. For this is their Custom, to present one such Alcoran unto the always to persons to whom they send their Embassadors. It was covered with Gold, and garnished with most precious Stones. He presented also a Book of Histories, covered as the other; he gave also a Box, wherein was a very fair precious Stone called Ballas, and two Pearls of a wonderful greatness, with two Purples of an handfull long, full of Jewels. Besides these, he presented also eight Finnari or Porcellaine Dishes (which we call Cine-Dishes) made of most pure Earth, kept above fifty years buried under the ground, to the end so to be fined and purified, which (as some say) will melt and dissolve if any Poison be put into them. He gave also two most stately Pavilions, twenty great Carpets of silk, and many other lesser of Silver the Persians call Tefich, things not used among the Christians. He gave also nine very fair Carpets of Camels hair, nine Saddles fit with Stones after the Persian fashion, seven Staves of Silver, seven Scimiters with red Scabbars, seven Bows with Arrows and Quivers, all wrought with Gold and precious Stones; he presented also the finest Laven-Carpets called Tefich, made of the finest Laven, and so large, that seven Men could scarcely carry one of them. All the Falcons were the Embassadors gave unto the Great Turk in his own Name; were also these; An Alcoran, a Pavillion fair and large, certain Scimiters, Bows and Arrows richly garnished, with certain Carpets of Silk, and Camels hair. After which Presents he delivered, and Reverence done unto the Great Sultan by the Embassador, and thirty of his Followers all in Cloth of Gold, he returned to his Lodging, very honourably accompanied, as well by the Turks as them of his own Retinue. First, besides many others

The Persian Embassador in going to visit Mahomet the Vifier Bafia, is in danger to have been slain.

The Vifier Bafia sent first by the Persian King unto Selymus.

there were a great Company of the Spahies and Chiaufes, and other Courtiers, mounted upon goodly Horses well furnished and in decent order; here might a Man have seen flocks of Cloth of Gold, Velvet, Damask, and other kinds of Silk. After these, there followed about three hundred Persian Horsemen, apparelled after their manner, some with Gowns made of divers little pieces of Taffata of sundry Colours, representing the Pictures of Men, Women, Horses, and other Beasts; and some of them embroidered with Flowers and Fruits of sundry sorts; some had also Gowns of Cloth of Gold, but not so fair as the Turks; and some of Velvet, but very few of Cloth; for that the Persians have no great plenty either of Velvet or yet of Cloth, except such as they have from the Portugals that travel unto those Eastern Countries; yet of Silk and Wool it appeareth they have great plenty, most part of their Gowns being of Wool quilted with Bombast. After these followed a large number of Persian Footmen, adventurers all Servants; after whom came the Turkish Horsemen; and last of all came a Horse of the Embassadors led by a Persian; after which Horse followed two hundred Janizaries; and in the Rearward of all came the Embassador alone, gorgeously attired both himself and his Horse. He himself was invested with crimson Velvet, mingled with some other Colours; his Saddle and Bridle were all bedecked with Jewels; the Caparison of his Horse, was all embroidered with Turquoises and other precious Stones; the Horn upon the top of his Turbant (which the Turks call Metevencia) was altogether wrought with Gold, and set with precious Stones; in brief, upon every part of his Body he hung Jewels of great price. After the Embassador, followed about an hundred and forty Persian Horsemen, and others of the Courtiers, followed as before, some well, some ill, according to their Ability. Now although the Persians (as is to be thought) shewed all their Pomp, yet they made nothing so fair a show as did the Turks; neither are they so fair Men of complexion, being for the most part of a swart and brown Colour, and rather little Men than otherwise, not much unlike to the Spaniards. The Embassador being departed, the Presents were all brought and shewed to Selymus; who allowed for their ordinary Charges five hundred Ducats a day, for that indeed their number was great, and their Beasts many. These Expenses bestowed upon the Embassadors, do presently begin as soon as any of them enter into his Dominions; and end, so soon as the business for which they come is finished. But long it was not, but that this Embassador having concluded a Peace between the two great Princes, Tamag and Selymus, and dispatched such matters as he came for, returned home again into Persia. The Venetians also now at this same time, by their Embassadors fought to renew the League they had made with the great Turk, now expired; which as it was easily obtained, so was it of small advantage. Selymus the next year quarrelling with them, even then began new Wars, to the great hurt and disturbance of that State, as shall forthwith appear.

Selymus now at Peace with all the World (a thing of the Turks not much desired) began to think of Works of Charity; and purposing to build a magnificent Temple at Hadrassano for his own Sepulture, with a Monastery, a College, and an Alms-House (as had his Father and other his Ancestors before him at Praga and in other places, led thereunto with a vain and superstitious Devotion) was troubled with nothing more, than

how to endow the same with Lands and Revenues sufficient for the maintenance of so great a Charge; for that the Mahometan Kings are by their Superstition prohibited to convert any Lands or Possessions to such holy uses, other than such as they have with their own Sword won from the Enemies of their Religion, which they may (as they are persuaded) as a most acceptable Sacrifice, offer to their great Prophet; which Devilish persuasion, ferveth as a Spur to prick forward every of those ambitious Princes to add something to their Empire. This his devout purpose once known, excited not the fearfulness of many ripe Heads, desiring none one thing, some another, as they thought best fitted his humor. But amongst many things to him presented, none pleased him so well, as the Plot laid for the taking of the rich Island of Cyprus from the Venetians; a Conquest of it self sufficient, both for the eternizing of his Name, and performance of his own charitable Works intended; with a large view plain for the supplying of whatsoever wanted in his Fathers like devout Works at Constantinople. But that which moved him most of all, was the glory of such a Conquest, which as his Flatterers bare him in hand, might make him equal with any his Predecessors; who in the beginning of their Reign, had usually done or attempted some notable thing against the Christians. Hereupon the matter was by Selymus propounded to the great Baffes, to be considered without whole Advice and Counsel, the Turkish Emperors seldom or never take any great Wars in hand. Amongst these grave Counsellors, Mahomet the chief Vifier Bafia, a Man of greatest Authority (unto whom Selymus was beholden, that he had so quietly obtained the Empire) and a secret Friend unto the Venetians, seemed much to miller of that motion; persuading Selymus not to yield therein, to the bringing of his danger and uncertainty of the expedition, that his Father Solyman at the time of his death had charged him strictly, that the League with the Venetians should be religiously kept; and that he could not with his Honour without just cause so quickly break the League, which he himself had but a little before most solemnly confirmed. But Musapha the second Bafia, sometimes Selymus his Tutor, and therefore of him much honoured, with Pial Bafia the Admiral (both envying at the great honour of the Vifier Bafia) so mightily impugned that he had before said, and so importuned Selymus with the shew both of Honour and Profit attending that action, as also with the easiness thereof (a great part of the Venetian Arsenal being but a little before burnt, and their Forces much weakened) that he rejected the Counsel of Mahomet, calling him in his Choler, Christian (which among the Mahometans is a Word of no small disgrace;) and yielding wholly to the persuasion of Musapha and Pial, presently caused preparation to be made both by Sea and Land, for the performance of that his resolution. Which was not so covertly carried in the Turks Court, but that it was discovered by Mr. Antonius Barbarus the Venetian Embassador; and not without cause suspected by the Venetian Merchants, whom the barbarous Turks began now to cut short in their Traffick, looking big upon them, as Men suddenly changed, and evil intreating them with hard speeches, the undoubted signs of greater troubles to ensue. The Venetian Embassador now out of doubt of the Turks purpose for the invasion of Cyprus, came unto Mahomet the chief Bafia, and earnestly besought him to leave the League, and putting him in mind of the Fidelity of the Venetian State towards the Turkish Emperor;

Mahomet Bafia did send Selymus from the invading of Cyprus.

Emperor; requesting him that Selymus might make too much haste to begin that War, which would fit all Europe on a broil; but rather by the Embassadors first to declare his mind to the Senate, for that it might hardly come to pass, that all might be quieted, to the good of both parties without War. Which the politick Embassador requested not of the Bassa for any hope he had to avert the War, for which the Turk had now all things in a readines, but only by such an hope of composition, to hinder the Turks endeavours, and to win time, until that the State (being fully certified of all these matters) might make ready their Fleet and Forces, and so in Arms be ready to answer their armed Foes; Neither did he ever leave the Bassa, until he had by his means procured, That one Cubates should be sent Embassador to Venice, to prove the minds of the Senators, whether they would willingly deliver the Island, or adventure to have it taken from them by Force. These things, and such like as were then done at Constantinople, being by Letters sent in Post from the Embassador, made known at Venice, brought a general heaviness upon the City; for why, that understanding and provident State, warned by their former harms, of all others most dread the Turks Forces. Cubates the Embassador accompanied with Alofius Barbarus the Embassadors Son, and Bonuricus his Secretary, departing from Constantinople, came by long journeys to Rhodes, where Eugenius the Senate sent from Venice to meet him, was ready to receive him, who being taken into his Gally, brought him to Venice.

In the mean time the Senators sitting oftentimes in Council, were divided in opinions concerning the chief matter they consulted upon; some there were, that thought it not good to wage War against such an invincible Enemy; that to trust upon a vain and hope, rather to commit all unto the hazard of such Fortune as was unto them in that War by the Enemy pronounced; they alledged, That they had always unfortunately taken up Arms against the Turks, and that therefore they should sit before their Eyes, what harms they had suffered, and how that beside the losses already furnished, they had always in the winding up of the Wars lost something more; that it were better to depart with Cyprus, so that they might quietly enjoy the rest, rather than enter into Arms: Time they said, would at length give them some one fit occasion or other to recover that they had lost, and to restore their State unto their former Honour; which for the present, was above their power to maintain; To put their trust in their Confederates (they said) was but to deceive themselves; they should remember how often even final causes of false fulsom, or hope of profit, or fear of harm, had utterly frustrated and broken in funder the most solemn Capitulations of the strongest Leagues; how often destruction had come thence from whence aid was always to have been hoped for, they needed not to seek farther for examples, than from their own Domestical Affairs. Others were of a contrary opinion, as that the Island was by force of Arms to be defended; saying, That nothing could be more dishonourable, than without fight to make any notable part of their Signiory; neither any thing more commendable, than to prove all things for defence of their Honour; neither would the proud Turks, with whom no assured League could be made (as they said) hold themselves content with this yielding up of the Island, but by intreating of them and giving them way, become more insolent; and when they had taken Cyprus from them, would also seek after Greece and Corycia, and so yielding them one thing after another, spoil themselves of all together; ambitious and greedy Princes (they said) grew more bold and insolent by other Mens fear; and that no great or notable matter was to be done without danger; that hard beginnings had oftentimes merry endings; that the Favour and good Will of that infatiable and greedy Nation, was not to be gained but with so great loss and charge as that such a costly Peace would be much more hurtful than War is itself, beside that, it much concerned other Christian Princes to have the Venetian State preserved, and that therefore it was to be hoped, that they would to the uttermost of their power give them aid. The matter thus debated to and fro, it was in the end resolved upon, to take up Arms in defence of their Honour, and by plain force to withstand the Turk.

So when Cubates the Turks Embassador came to Venice, neither did any Man of Council meet him, neither was any Honour done unto him; or so much as common Courtesies shewed unto him; but being afterward admitted into the Senate House with his two Interpreters only, he delivered Selymus his Letters, inclosed in a little Bag wrought with Silk and Gold; and so whilst the same Letters were in breaking up, and translating out of the Turkish Language into Italian, delivered also his Message by word of mouth, as followeth:

What great account the mighty Sultan my dread Sovereign hath always made of your most honourable City Friendship, is therein right well declared; That in the very entrance of himself into his Empire, he forthwith and without any hard or new Conditions: renewed his League with you; which he hath on his part always kept most faithfully and unviolently; worthily giving the like kindness; not to be shewed on your behalf, but the like care of keeping your Faith inviolable in you; who by harboring of Pyrates in your Havens, and murdering of his Subjects, have oftentimes broken the League. Which injuries, although they were by War to have been revenged; yet hath he, so mightily a Monarch, hitherto been always more mindful of your Honour and Friendship, than of his own Majesty and Profit. But forasmuch as there is no end of these injuries and Wrongs, and thus it is now come to that point, That longer to forbear, might be imputed unto him rather for Cowardice than Courtesy, as also that it much more concerned your State than him, and that therefore you ought no less than to be desirous, that all causes of unkindness might be cut off, and order taken, that in so great and mutual goodwill, there should be no falling out by new quarrels: daily arising the only remedy thereof is, if you shall deliver unto him the Island of Cyprus, the cause of all these grievances. Now it behooveth you for your great Wisdom, to make small reckoning of so small a matter in comparison of the Favour of so great a Prince; which if you willingly of your selves yield unto him, you shall right wisely provide for your Affairs, and have him so great a Monarch always your Friend and Confederate; whereas if you shall these your selves estimate, and not to yield to him so small a request, his purpose is by strong hand not only to take from you the Island, the cause of the War, but also to prosecute you with most cruel War both by Sea and Land. And therefore I take God to witness, all the blame of the calamities to ensue of so mortal a War, to be imputed unto your selves, as the worthy reward of your unwillingness and breach of Faith.

Which said, he in the name of Mahomet the Viceroy Bassa told the Senators. That he was right sorry that this breach was fallen out betwixt the Emperor

Emperor Selymus and them; and that although he doubted not but that they would right wisely consider of all things, yet he could not for the good Will he bare unto them, but admonish them of such things as he deemed for them both profitable and wholesome; and therefore did most instantly request them, and withal advise them, not to enter into Arms against so mighty a Prince, neither willingly to plunge themselves into such dangers, as they could hardly or never find the way out of; for that their strength was nothing answerable unto his, and that the event of that War would be unto them deadly; and therefore he took God and the love he bare unto them to witness, that he had in friendly sort forewarned them of their harms, and advised them for their good. Giving them further to understand, that Selymus did nothing but thunder out most cruel Threats against their State; which his indignation was raised of the manifold complaints brought against them to his Court at Constantinople.

Selymus his Letters answerable to his Embassadors Speech, was also full of false-furnished grievances; he complained, That the Venetians had in warlike manner entered into the Frontiers of his Empire in Dalmatia, and there had done great harm; that they had put to death certain Turkish Pyrates, whom they had taken alive; that their Island of Cyprus was an Harbor for the Pyrates of the West; and that from thence they robbed his peaceable Countries, and furnished his Subjects travelling that way for Devotion unto the Temple of Mecca, or otherwise about their Affairs. And that therefore those causes of discord might be taken away, and the hindrance of Traffique removed, he required them to yield unto him the Island of Cyprus; which if they refused to do, he would by force of Arms take it from them; and by force of strong hand cause them to do that which they might, the better have done frankly and of their own accord; and further to make them understand how far the Turks did excel all other Men in Martial prowess. As for the League before made betwixt his Father and them, he said he had renewed the same, not because he had any liking thereunto, but because he had as then set down with himself, for a while in the beginning of his Empire peaceably to endure all things.

The Venetians, for that they knew the Embassadors errand before his coming, having now read his Letters, gave him such answer as they had before resolved upon; which was, That the Venetians had at all times inviolably kept their Leagues with the Ottoman Emperors, and had in regard thereof let slip many opportunities and fit occasions for them to have augmented their Dominions in; That they could without any danger to themselves, have destroyed the Turks Fleet both at the Rhodes and Maha, and other places also; but that they more regarded their Honour; and always thought, that nothing better became great and magnificent Princes, than to perform their Faith once given, and in all their actions to be like themselves. And therefore had diffembled and put up many grievous and bitter indignities, lest they might be thought to have first broken the League; That they had never passed their own Bounds, or invaded the Turks; only to have taken order, that no Pyrates should at their pleasure roam up and down the Seas. Now whereas all Duties being on their part sincerely and most religiously kept, Selymus complained himself to be wronged, whereas he himself had done the wrong, and had contrary to the League, denounced War against them, expecting nothing less; fithence that they could not by the power of the League, they would by force of Arms defend that Kingdom, which they by ancient usage had lawfully right possessed, delivered unto them by their Ancestors. That God, in whose help they trusted, would weigh in indifferent Balance, all Mens Words and Deeds; whom they took to witness, that they were the Authors of Peace, and Selymus the cause of War; and that the same God would be now present unto their just complaints, and forthwith after with his power to take revenge on them; which satisfying their Faith and Promise given, and violating the sacred League, had enforced them to take up most just and necessary Arms, which they would with the same Courage mannaage, that they had taken them in hand.

With this answer the Embassador departed, let out by a secret Postern, for fear of the People; who having got knowledge of the matter, were in great number assembled at the Court Gate, muttering among themselves, that it were well done to rend in pieces that accursed Turk, the Messenger of his faithless Master. Which outrage it was thought they would in their fury have performed, had not such as by the commandment of the Magistrates guarded him, better assured him of his safety, than either regard of Duty or the Law of Nations; he by the way, as he went full of burning anger, beseeching by his Alms to be of that to give an indignity revenged. This answer of the Senate unto the Turks Embassador concerning War, was of some well liked and highly commended, as full of Honour and Valour. Others deemed it too sharp, thinking nothing that was said or done to the further incensing of the Turkish Emperor; being of opinion, that they might have of him obtained a more indifferent Peace by Courtesy, than by Rigor. As for the decreed War, they utterly disliked, forasmuch as all Wars were woful, but especially those that were to be maintained against them that are too strong for us. In such diversity of opinions it appeared, That the Senate should of that so honourable a Decree reap such commendation, as the Event thereof should afford (than which nothing is more unreasonable); if things fell out well, then it was wisely and worthily done; if otherwise, than was it like to be reputed a foolish, rash, and woful resolution.

The greater the danger was now feared from the angry Turk, the more careful were the Venetians of their State; wherefore they forthwith sent Messengers with Letters unto the Governors of Cyprus; charging them with all carefulness and diligence to make themselves ready to withstand that Turk, and to raise what power they were able in the Island, not omitting any thing that might concern the good of the State; and at the same time made choice of their most valiant and expert Captains both by Sea and Land, unto whom they committed the defence of their dispersed Signiory, with the leading of their Forces. Eleronimus Zanius was appointed Admiral, Lucas Michael was sent into Crete, Franciscus Barbarus into Dalmatia, Sebastianus Venerius into Cyprus, all Men of great Honour, Experience and Valour. Other meaner Captains were also sent with less charge unto the aforesaid places, as Eugenius Singlicus a noble Gentleman with a thousand Footmen into Cyprus, who had also the leading of all the Horsemen in the Island; after whom Count Martinengus promised to follow with two thousand Footmen more. The strong Cities were now by the Venetians in all places new fortified, Armor, Ordnance, and Victual provided, and whatsoever else they thought needful for defence of their State. And forasmuch as they well knew they had to do with too mighty an Enemy, they by their Embassadors sent for that purpose, earnestly solicited most of the Christian Princes to join with them in League, and to give them aid against the common Enemy, who as he was too strong for any one of them, so was he not able to stand against their united Forces. But the Emperor Maximilian excused himself by the League he had not long before made with the Turk for eight years, which he said he might not break; yet he had before his Eyes a most pregnant example, the small reckoning of the Turk's match with the League, which he without any just cause had broken with the Venetians. The like excusals used also Charles the French King, and Sigismund King of Poland; who both seemed to be very sorry for that the Venetians were fallen out with the Turk, but could not help them, for that they were in League with the Turkish Emperor. Nevertheless the French did them the Courtesy, to offer himself to be a Mediator, if they so pleased betwixt them and Selymus. The young King of Portugal Don Sebastian pretended also for his excuse the great Plague which had but a little before raged in his Kingdom, and much diminished his People; as also that he was to maintain Wars by Sea against the Turks in the East-Indies, to the no less benefit of the Christian Common-wealth, than if he should aid the Venetians in the Mediterranean. Only First Prince then Pope, and Philip King of Spain, with certain of the Princes of Italy, namely Philibert Duke of Savoy, Guido Ubaldo Duke of Urbino, Cosmus Medici Duke of Florence, and the Knights of Malta, promised them aid, which they afterward most honourably performed.

Selymus of himself angry with the Venetians, and firm in his resolution for the Conquest of Cyprus, was upon the report of these Embassadors bad entertainment at Venice, further enraged; he deemed the Majesty of the Turkish Emperor contemned, and himself in the person of his Embassador disgraced: seeing that they whom he had thought would have yielded unto any thing, rather than the League should have been broken, had sent him such a short answer, and so contemptuously used his Embassador, unto whom they had not intended so much common Courtesy. It did not a little move him, that the Venetians had in their Letters sent by his Embassador, omitted the glorious Titles usually given the Turkish Emperors; wherefore in some part to satisfy his angry mood, he caused Marcus Antonius Barbarus the Venetian Embassador, and all the Christian Merchants of the West throughout his Empire, to be clapt up in prison, and their Ships laid under an arrest. And for the delecting thereof, as the Stage whereon the bloody Tragedy following was as it were acted; as also how it came first into the hands of the Venetians, and by what right of them so long possessed (although it be in some part before declared) until it was now by Selymus the great Turk, against all right injuriously demanded, and at length by strong hand by him wrested from them. This Island lieth in the farthest part of the Cilician Sea; it hath on the East Syria, on the West Pamphilia, Southward it regardeth Egypt, and Northward Cilicia, now called Caramania. It is worthily accounted amongst the greatest Islands of the Mediterranean, containing in circuit four hundred and twenty seven miles, and is in length (after the description of Strabo) an hundred and twenty five miles, and in breadth not above sixty five. It aboundeth with Corn, Wine, Oyl, Cotton-wool, Saffron, Honey, Rosin, Turpentine, Sugar-Canes, and whatsoever else is needful for the sustentation of Man, whereof it sends forth great abundance to other Countries, of whom it craveth no help again. It was in ancient time called Aradus, that is to say, Blessed. The People therein generally lived so at ease and pleasure, that thereof the Island was dedicated to Venus, who was there especially worshipped, and thereof call'd Cypris. Marcellinus to shew the Fertility thereof, saith, That Cypris aboundeth with such plenty of all things, that without the help of any Foreign Country, it is of it self able to build a tall Ship from the Keel to the top Sail, and so put it to Sea furnished of all things needful. And Strabo Rufus writing thereof, saith, Cypris famula divitum, pampertem populi Romani, ut occuparetur sollicitavit, ita ut juxta ejus insula avarius magis quam injustus assensit, scil. Cyprus famous for Wealth, allured the Poverty of the People of Rome to lay hold upon it, so that we have rather covetously than justly got the rule thereof. In the heart of the Island standeth Nicosia, sometime the Regal and late Metropolitane City thereof. And in the East end thereof Famagusta, sometime called Tamassus, a famous rich City, the chief and only Port of all that most pleasant Island. Other fair Cities there be also, as Paphos, Amathus (now called Limisso) and Cyrene. This Island of it self long time maintained the Majesty of a Kingdom, as then when Richard the First, King of England, passing that way with his Fleet for the recovery of the Holy Land, then distressed in the Holy Land about the year 1191, was prohibited there to land; and certain of his People by force of Tempest there cast on Shore, were by the Cypriots either cruelly slain or taken Prisoners; which barbarous violence King Richard took in so evil part, that he there by force landed his Army, and refted not until he had taken Isaac the King Prisoner, and subdued the Island. The King he sent to Chains of Silver to Tripoli, there to be kept in close Prison; the Kingdom he kept a while in his own hand, which not long after he gave, or as some say, exchanged with Guido the titular King of Jerusalem, for which cause the Kings of England for a certain time afterwards were honoured with the Title of the Kings of Jerusalem. This Kingdom by many descents came at length to Jamus Son of King Peter, who in the year 1259, was married to a Sultan of Egypt, and by her afterwards for the ransom of an hundred and fifteen thousand Sultanins was set at liberty and restored to his Kingdom, paying unto the Sultan and his Successors a yearly Tribute of forty thousand Crowns. This Jamus left a Son called John, who after the death of his Father married the Daughter of the Marquis of Mont-Ferrat; after whose death he married one Helen of the most noble House of the Palatini in Cyprus; by whom he had one only Daughter called Carlotta; but by another Woman a base Son called James. This King John was a Man of no Courage, altogether given to pleasure, and according to the manner of his effeminate education, shewed himself in all things more like a Woman than a Man; which Helen his Wife, a Woman of a great Spirit, quickly perceiving, took upon her the Sovereignty and

and whole Government of the Realm, gracing and dignifying them the pleased, and promoting to the Ecclesiastical Dignities such as she best liked abolishing the Latin Ceremonies, and bringing in them of the Greeks, and took forth further order as pleased her self in matters of State concerning both Peace and War; her Husband in the mean time regarding nothing but his vain pleasure; whereby it came to pass that all was brought into the power of the Greeks the Queens Friends. Now did Queen her self was much ruled by the Council of her self, and the Nobles by her Daughter; so that the People would commonly say, The Daughter rule the Nurse, the Nurse the Queen, and the Queen the King. The Nobility affamed and weary of this manner of Government, by general consent of the People, sent for John the King of Portugal Cousin-German (whom some call the King of Portugal) to whom they gave Carlotta the Kings Daughter in marriage, with full power to supply that want of Government which was in King John his Father in Law. He taking the Authority into his Hands, quickly reformed the disordered Kingdom, as well in matters concerning Religion, as civil Policy. The Latin Ceremonies were again restored, and the Government of the Daughter, the Nurse, and the Queen, brought to an end. But the mischievous Queen doubting the Continuance of the young King, perswaded her Mother, as she tendered her own Life, to poison the King. Which thing the wretched Woman (by the consent of the Queen Mother, as was reported) in short time performed, and so brought that noble Prince, well worthy longer life, unto his untimely end; whereby the Government was again restored unto the Greek Queen, who in the name of her weak Husband commanded again at her pleasure. But above all, the Nurse and her Daughter insulted upon the young King, which he not well brooking, grievously complained thereof to James her base Brother, requiring his help for redress thereof; who not long after slew the Nurses Daughter, not so much in revenge of the wrong by her done unto his Sister, as to prepare a way for himself for the obtaining of the Kingdom; grieving inwardly, that she or her Husband should be preferred before himself. Which thing Helen the Queen quickly perceiving, perswaded the King her Husband to cause his base Son to enter into the orders of Priesthood, and so to become a Churchman, thereby to cut off all his hope of aspiring unto the Kingdom; which the King at her instance did, and made him Archbishop of Nicosia. In the mean time Carlotta by the perswasion of her Mother and the Nobility of the Country, married Lewis Son to the Duke of Savoy; who being for that purpose sent forth, came with all speed to Cyprus. For appearing the Queen-Mother and the old Nurse (desiring nothing more, than to revenge the death of the Nurses Daughter upon Jamus now Archbishop) desired first how to thrust him out of all his spiritual Promotions, which were great, and afterward quite banish him the Kingdom. Hereupon the Queen wrote Letters against him to the Pope, to have him degraded, for that he being a Man base born, with his hands imbrued with innocent Blood, was unworthy of holy Orders. Which Letters by chance came to James his hands; who jarred therewith, accompanied with a number of his Friends and Favorites, suddenly entred the Court, slew such of his Enemies as he found there, divided their Goods amongst his Followers, and as King possessed himself of the Regal City. In this Brail the Greek Queen Helen died, and shortly after her Husband also. All things being thus in an hurry and out of order, certain of the Nobility for redress thereof, sent for Lewis the Husband of Carlotta, as far from him to whom that Kingdom in the right of his Wife most justly belonged; who upon his arrival was of all sorts of Men joyfully received and welcomed as their King. James the Usurper understanding before of the coming of Lewis, and perceiving the inclination of the People towards him, fled with divers of his Friends to Alexandria to crave aid of the Egyptian Sultan; in whose Court he found such favour, as that he was by the Sultans commandment Royally apparelled, and honoured with the Title of the King of Cyprus, which he promised for ever to hold of the Sultans of Egypt as their Vassal and Tributary. At which time the Sultan aid by his Embassadors commanded Lewis to depart the Isle, who by all means fought to have pacified the Sultan, declaring unto him his rightful Title, yet offering to pay unto him the wonted Tribute, and to allow unto James a yearly Pension billie, and to allow unto James his life. But all in vain, for Jamus still presented in the Sultans Court, and wisely following his own suit, at last concluded with the great Sultan (who thought it more honour to make a King, than to confirm a King) and receiving of him a great Army, returned into Cyprus; where in short time he so distressed Lewis, that he was glad to forsake the Island, with his Wife, and to return into his Country; leaving the Government of Cyprus again to Jamus; who now by the support of the Egyptian Sultan possessed thereof, yet lived not without care of Carlotta and her Husband Lewis, whom he knew the Cypriots wonderfully affected. Wherefore for the more assurance of his Estate, he thought it best to join in League and Friendship with the Venetians, whom he knew he to be of great power at Sea, and of all other best to cross whatsoever Lewis should in the right of his Wife attempt against him, which League he afterwards made, and the better to confirm the same, took to Wife Catharine Cornelia, the Daughter of Marcus Cornelius a Magnifico of Venice, being before adopted to the Senate, and ever after their reputed Daughter. Not long after this marriage, Jamus died in the year 1470, leaving the Queen great with Child, who in due time was delivered of a fair Son, unto whom with the Mother the Venetian State became Tutor, as their adoptive Fathers, and in their behalf took upon them the Government of the Realm. This Child shortly after died also, not without some suspicion of Poison, after whose death great Troubles arose in the Kingdom, inasmuch that Andrew Cornelius the Queens Uncle, a most grave Counsellor, and Governor of the Realm under the Queen, was by the Conspiracy of certain Noblemen slain, and all the Island ready to revolt from the Queen. For appearing of which Troubles, the Venetians were glad oftentimes to send their Admirals with their Gallies into Cyprus, to take order in the matter, and to aid the Queen; who at length perswaded by George Cornelius her Brother, whilst it was yet in her power, as a loving Daughter to yield up the Kingdom unto her adoptive Fathers, which she did, both of her Counsel and Power, could not long hold so far from her Friends, before she fled with the great Turk, and on the other with the mighty Sultan of Egypt. She I say thus perswaded by her Brother, came to Venice, where she was with the greatest Honour that could be devised, received by the Duke and whole State at Sea in their great and goodly Ship the Bacchanale, and so with all Royal Triumph brought through the midst of the City unto the place with small Shot, Arrows, and Stones, overwhelmed the Defendants, as if it had been a shower of Hail: so to have driven them from off the Wall and Rampiers. In few days, not only all the Curtains betwixt three of the Bulwarks, was by the fury of the great Ordnance beaten down, but all places thereabout lay full of the dead Bodies of the assailants and defendants. For although the Christians fought at great disadvantage, both for the number of Men, and indifference of the place; yet desperation joined with extreme necessity, of all other the greatest Weapon, gave them such courage, as with Shot, Stones, Timber, and such like, to keep down their Enemies, and defend their Walls: and oftentimes to make great slaughter of them, with their Artillery and murdering Pieces, bent upon them as at a certain mark, who the thicker they stood the greater was their harm. They also oftentimes dismounted many of the great Pieces, and made them unserviceable; and with Feather-beds and Sacks of Cotton-wool, made up their Breaches: which the Turks laboured again to burn with Pitch-barrels, and Earthen-pots full of Wild-fire. After long fight the Turks entering the Ditch, made themselves two ways to the Walls, which they fortified on both sides with Fagots and Earth; in such fort, as that they were safe from the loops of the Bulwarks which flanked the Ditch. All this quickly performed, they presently set up scaling Ladders; others filled the Ditches with Rubbish, Wood, Fagots, and Earth: and others in the mean time with Mattocks and Leavers were digging down the Foundations of the Bulwarks Confiance and Poderastera, taking name of them that had the chief charge in the building thereof. The Christians right valiantly endured the first Assault of the Enemy, and thruck down dead into the Ditch many of the Turks, and climbing up the Ladders; and had in short time slain more than they were themselves in number, and enforced the rest to give over the Assault. These things were done in the beginning of the Siege, whilst yet both parties were strong; in which had confided a great number of Soldiers were loit and most of the Canoniers slain. After this Assault, both parties for a while bided themselves and spent the time in their ingenious devices; wherein it appeared, that the Turks were much cunninger in devising of means to take Cities, than were those Christians in defending the same.

Now had the Venetians in the first motions of these Wars, prayed aid of divers Christian Princes, from most part of whom they received but cold comfort, as is before declared; yet now at length (though somewhat late) they had drawn into the consideration of this War, the Pope and the King of Spain; by whose example some other Princes had moved, put to also their helping hands. The Venetians, as they whom the matter most concerned, had in good time put their Fleet to Sea; but knowing themselves too weak to encounter the Turks, they lay still upon the Coast of Dalmatia, about Zadera, expecting the coming of the Spanish Admiral with his Gallies. Two Months (wherein much might have been done) were now past in this expedition, and yet no news of his coming; so that what the speed and industry of the Venetians had well prepared, was by the delay and lingering of the Spaniard, marred. Besides that, the Plague began to arise in the Fleet, lying so long in one place; which at length grew so hot, that many of the Gallies had neither Mariner nor Soldier left in them; neither did this Mortality cease, until there were twenty thousand dead thereof; amongst whom were many

Summer now almost half spent, and the Plague well ceased, the Venetian Admiral weary of expecting the coming of Spain the Spanish Admiral; gathering together his Fleet which he had before dispersed to avoid the infection, sailed to Coryra, where he met with Venerius, another of the Venetian Commanders, who there staid for him, having but a little before taken from the Turks Ceftria, now called Suputo, a Town upon the Sea Coast over against Coryra. The whole Fleet of the Venetians being assembled together, was an hundred and seventeen Sail, amongst which were twelve great Galeasses; but all too weak to give Battle to the Turks, as being themselves stronger in Shipping than in Men. Nevertheless, the Admiral forry and weary to see the Spoil of the Venetian Town, and moved with the distress of the besieged in Nicozia, rather than for any hope he had with that strength to do any good against the Turks Fleet, departed from Coryra towards Crete, and the twelfth of August landed at Suda, a Port of that Island. In the latter end of this month, Columinus the Popes Admiral, and Aurica Admiral for the King of Spain, arrived there also, whom the Venetian Admiral welcomed with great joy and triumph. The whole Fleet of the Confederate Princes now at length met together, consisted of an hundred ninety-two Gallies, and twelve Galeasses; beside Viduales and other small Vessels, laden with Munition and other necessary provision for the Fleet. Of these Gallies the Pope had for twelve, the King of Spain forty-two, the rest with the Galeasses were the Venetians. In this Fleet were embarked thirteen thousand six hundred three score Soldiers; of whom the Pope furnished ten thousand, the King of Spain three thousand nine hundred, and the Venetians eight thousand six hundred and sixty. These three great Commanders entering into counsel, what course to take in their proceedings in this War, after long discourse too and fro, at length by the persuasion of Zaninus the Venetian Admiral, resolved to go directly for Cyprus, and to give the Turks Battle, in hope thereby to raise them from the Siege of Nicozia. About the middle of September, this great Fleet, furnished with all things needful for such an expedition, loosed from Crete, and with a fair gale of Wind set forward for Cyprus; in all their Course keeping such order, as if they should presently have met with the Enemy. In the midst of these troubles died Petrus Loredanus, Duke of Venice, leaving the rest of the care of that War to Aloysius Moceninus, who succeeded him in the Redemption.

Whilst the Christians thus slowly proceed in their too weighty Affairs, Musapha in the mean time laid hard Siege to Nicozia; and dividing his Army into four parts, assaulted four of the Bulwarks of the City, with greater force than at any time before from the beginning of the Siege. The Assault was both long and terrible; Fury, and the very sight of the warlike General, who was there a present witness, and beholder of every mans forwardness or cowardice (a matter of great moment) besides their natural fierceness, carried the Turks headlong without any peril or danger. And on the other side, the greatness of the danger, the fear to lose both life and liberty, with the hope of relief, encouraged the Defendants to dare any thing; so that the Turks could not approach the Walls, or mount the scaling Ladders, but they were presently slain, or together with the Ladders thrown to the ground. Many

Many of the Turks were there slain, but especially such as were most forward; and of the Defendants were also more lost than stood with the safety of so small a number; and forasmuch as few or none escaped out of that fight un wounded, the poor Defendants were brought unto a small number. Many skillful men were of opinion, that the City might have been that day taken, if the assault had by the Bassa been longer maintained, by bringing still on fresh men; but such was his loss, as that he was glad for that time to give over the assault, and so with dishonour to retire.

After this Assault, it was by some of the Captains thought good, that they should (whilst they were yet of some reasonable strength in the City) fall forth upon the Enemy; so to make shew, that they had yet some good hope in themselves, and withal by so sudden an eruption to perform something upon the secure Enemy. Of which motion, Dandulus the Governor in no case liked, as both by such a dangerous piece of Service to diminish the number of the Defendants, and so to give the Enemy an easier means to take the City. Yet seeing all the Captains generally of another mind, he yielded unto their desire. So in the hottest time of the day, when as the Turks least thought that the Christians would have fallen out, certain Italian Companies under the Conduct of Cesar Plovianus of Vincenza, and Albertus Scotus, issued out by the Gate that leadeth to Ramagusa, and upon the sudden brake into the Enemies Trenches; where they found the Turks some playing, some sleeping, but fearing nothing less than that the Christians, whom they daily braved, durst to have adventured to come forth. At the first entrance the Italians prevailed, and brought a great fear upon that quarter of the Turks Army, and slew many. But when the Turks, awaked with the Alarm, came running in on every side, the Italians oppressed with the multitude, were glad to retire; in which retreat divers of them were slain, and amongst them their two Leaders Cesar and Albertus; so that this fall served to no other purpose than to weaken the Defendants themselves, and to cause the Turks to keep better Watch and Ward against such sudden Eruptions.

All hope of long defending the City now almost lost, and that the Defendants could hardly stand upon the Walls, or shew their Heads without present danger; they for want of better Counsel, rather than for any hope of good Success, sent out certain Scouts, Men skillful of the Ways and Passages of the Country (whom they had for great Reward induced to undertake the matter) to crave Aid of the Country-people, that were in great multitude fled into the safety of the Mountains; and to tell them, that if they came not in time to their Relief, their Wives and Children, whom they had before sent into the Enemies hand, or perished with hunger; but these Messengers were by the vigilant Enemy intercepted, and in the sight of the besieged tortured to death.

About the same time divers Letters were forth with Arrows into the City, to persuade the besieged Christians yield themselves; for that in so doing they should find the Bassa a mild and merciful Conqueror; whereas otherwise if they should by wilful holding out delay his Victory, they were fure to endure whatsoever could be endured or suffered. But when Musapha had thus in vain with hope and fear tried the minds of the Defendants, he called forth to Rasley certain Soldiers that were standing upon the Bulwark called Confiance, of whom some were by the content of the Governor sent forth unto him; unto whom Musapha by his Interpreter complained, That no answer was given unto his Letters; he set forth unto them the Glory, Power, and Greatness of the Turkish Empire; and debased the strength of the Venetians; then he persuaded them to yield, propounding unto them the misery that would fall upon them if the City should by force be taken; which he threatened would be far greater than the danger the Turks were to undertake for the winning thereof; and that therefore it concerned none so much as themselves, whether the City were given up, by Composition, or else won by strong hand; he shewed unto them the profit that should arise unto them by yielding of it up, and offered to them large Entertainment, if they would serve him; and to conclude, told them, that they should never afterwards find at his Hands so great Grace as was at that instant offered them. The crafty Bassa did what he might to hasten the winning of the City, both for that he doubted the coming of the Christian Fleet, and that his great Army was exceedingly troubled with contagious and grievous Diseases, arising from the immoderate heat and drought in that hot a Country. But the Soldiers thinking any thing more assured than the Turkish Faith, answered him. That they did not as yet doubt their own strength, and that they were ready to endure any thing that could happen, rather than to prefer the uncertain Friendship of an unknown Prince, before the gracious Favour of such worthy Princes as they had for good experience of.

This Answer cut off all the Bassas hope for taking of the City by Composition; wherewith being both grieved and enraged, he commanded all things to be made ready for the Assault; and the more to encourage his Soldiers, promised unto them great Rewards and Honours that should first or second mount the Walls. After that, he gave a general assault unto the City, with all his Power; wherein both he as a most worthy Captain, and his Soldiers, fought most fiercely. You have to do (said he) with the small and late remainders of your Enemies; which are scarce able to stand or hold their Weapons in their Hands, rather than with Enemies indeed; shall you not then easily overcome them, being both few and feeble, that have vanquished them when they were many and lusty? The end of your Labours is at hand, your great Rewards approach; only play you the men, and faint not in this Assault; the Spoil of this rich City shall be the worthy reward of your Labours, the fruit of all your Travel consisteth in this one moment. Whilst he thus incourageth some, and reproveh others, they mindful of his Promises, and these of the disgrace, altogether with their thick thor suffer no Man to stand in safety upon the Walls, and out of their Forts also with their great Ordnance greatly annoyed the Defendants. This done, they attempted by the ruins of the Wall, and in other places by Scaling-Ladders to have entered the City. Which terrible Assault was by the onset Enemy maintained, not for some few hours, but for divers days together without any intermission, fresh men still coming in instead of them that were wounded or slain. Yet did the Defendants valiantly endure all that Storm, and in such weak case as they were, worthily performed what was possible for so few to do; yet still in hope (the poor comfort of men in misery) military) that Relief might come by the approach of the Christian Fleet. At length, when the matter was brought to this Point, that the Turks were in great hope to have gained the Walls, and Musapha himself probably guessed, That the Christians were now weary of the long Assault, and fore weakened with Wounds and other infinite Misfortunes, and so took in a City so hardly distressed, and was in that his opinion also confirmed by certain Fugitive Christians; he nevertheless upon the sudden caused a Retreat to be founded, and so retiring into his Trenches, lay still all the next day without any thing doing. The Defendants thinking that he had given over the Assault, because of some hardy distress, and the Relief, became the more careless of the Enemy, and upon the vain hope of such Aid, with less diligence repaired their Breaches, and provided for the repulsing of their Enemies. But the Bassa in the mean time had chosen out of his whole Army about 200 of his best Captains and Soldiers, all Men of approved valour and agility of Body, whom the next day after, he sent early in the Morning, to make proof if they could with Scaling-Ladders secretly and without any noise for us, get into the four Bulwarks which he had before fore shaken with his great Ordnance. These resolute Men leading the way, got first up, after whom followed divers others, and so took the aforesaid Bulwarks; when presently after, other Companies of their Fellows which stood ready for the purpose, coming on forward, did with their Scaling-Ladders in divers places recover the top of the Walls; for now the matter was not done by secret surprise, but by open force. In every one of these Bulwarks were 70 Italians and as many Epirots, who there kept Watch and Ward; these Men part asleep, as fearing no such danger, and part lying lazily upon the ground, were there surprised on the sudden and slain; other-forme of them awaked with the strange and uncouth noise, betook not themselves lustily to their Weapons, but forsaking their stations leapt down out of the Bulwarks at such places as were next unto them, some for fear ran unawares into the midst of their Enemies. Upon this Alarm some of the Christian Captains came speedily to the Walls with their Companies, as did Eugenius, who whilst he in vain cried out to such fearful Soldiers as he met, that they should not so cowardly fly, and sayest others that were flying, was himself, forth through with a small flock and slain. Other Captains in other places likewise laboured in vain to have flaid the flying Soldiers, whose Perfwasions, Requests, and Authority in so general a fear, nothing at that time prevailed.

Nicofia taken by the Turks.

The Defendants thus beaten from the Walls and Bulwarks, gathered themselves into the Market place, but the Citizens hesitating to their own Houses, there stood in the Entrances of the same, fearfully expecting the destruction of the Country, together were their own. In the mean time the Governor of Aleppo with his Regiment scoured the Walls of the City round about, as he had in charge from the General; and without respect put to Sword all that he met armed or unarmed. At the Bulwark called Barbarus, is furnished him to light upon a Company of Italians, who for a while fought desperately, but were in the end overthrown and slain. When he had thus cleared the Walls, and left such Companies as he thought good in places convenient for the keeping of them, he came down into the more open places of the City; and seeing them that were gathered together into the Market place to have cast themselves into a Ring, and to fight as Men: altogether desperate, he caused certain murdering Pieces to be bent upon them; which they perceiving, laid down their Weapons, and yielded themselves unto the mercy of the Enemy. By and by all the Gates of the City were strongly guarded by the Enemy, to the intent that no Man should go in or out. Dandulus the Governor, and Costantinus the Bishop of Pythos, with the rest of the Nobility, and better sort of the Citizens, had got themselves into the Town-Hall, and there stood upon their Guard; unto whom Musapha sent word, that he would take them all to mercy, if they would without further resistance yield themselves. But while Messengers run to and fro, the Turks violently brake in upon them, and there slew them every man. After the death of these Noblemen, the cruel Enemy spared none; and having slain such as they found abroad in the Streets, brake into the Houses, where they made havock of all things; young Babes were violently taken out of the Arms of their Mothers; Virgins were shamefully ravished, and honest Matrons before their Husbands faces despitely abused, Churches were spoiled, and all places filled with mourning and dead Bodies; the Streets were in all places stained with blood, for in the City was slain that day fourteen thousand eight hundred three score and six persons. Neither was there any end of the spoil, until the greedy Enemy had carried away all the Wealth that long Peace had heaped up. It is reported, that the Prey there taken, amounted to twenty hundred thousand millions of Ducats; 200 of the most goodly and beautiful Youths were chosen out of purpose to be sent to Constantinople for a Present for Selymus. In the City were taken also 250 Pieces of great Ordnance; whereof some were by the Enemy carried away, and the rest left for the Prisoners of the Turks. Thus the famous City of Nicofia, sometime the Regal Seat of the Kings of Cyprus, fell into the hands of the Turks, the ninth day of September, in the year, 1570. in whose Power it still remaineth.

Musapha having as he thought best disposed of all things in Nicofia, with the very terror of his name, rather than by any force, brought most part of the rest of the Towns in the Island under his Obedience; and by fair intreaty and promise of good usage, brought back again unto their wonted dwellings the rude Country-people, who upon the coming of the Turks were fled with all they had into the Mountains; them as Men, not to be feared, he commanded to till and sow their Land as they were wont. The City of Cyrene is strongly situated, not far from the Sea, and was then well furnished of all things needful for the enduring of a long Siege. Hither the Bassa sent one of the Sanzacks to Summon the City, more to prove the courage of the Defendants, than for any hope he had to have the City delivered unto him. But Alphonfus Palatinus then Governor of the City, terrified with the loss of Nicofia, no sooner saw the Enemy, but that without any further deliberation or force used against him, he delivered up the Town unto the Sanzack's commanding only in reward of his cowardice. That he might in safety depart from thence with all his Garrison-Soldiers; which was easily granted, and the City surrendered.

Not long after, Musapha leaving a thousand Horsemen, and three thousand Foot in Garrison in Nicofia, marched with the rest of his Army to besiege Famagusta. And the more to terrify them

Musapha's relief his Siege.

Agreeing to the Siege.

The Turks at the relief of Famagusta, doubting the coming of the Christian Fleet, which then lay at Crete, sent out six Gallies to discover the doings of the Christians; who returning with certain Prisoners taken in the Island of Crete, declared unto the Bassas what they had learned concerning the Christian Fleet, and that it was already upon the way to Cyprus.

Upon which intelligence the Bassas put their Fleet into the order of Battle, and far forwards towards Limisso to have met with the Christians; who with a prosperous Wind were coming before the Island of Caprathos and the Rhodes; but there understanding by their Espials, that Nicofia was lost, and that the Turks were come to besiege Famagusta; they called a Council of all the chief Commanders in the Fleet, to consult what were best to do in so dangerous a case.

Columanus the Pope's Admiral, and then chief Commander in the Fleet, with Zaninus the Venetian Admiral, were of opinion, That they were best to hold on their course for Cyprus, and to relieve Famagusta; for that it was like that the Turks proud of their late Victory, were for desire of prey, for most part gone ashore into the Island, and so left their Fleet but slenderly manned.

But that they alleged, That the Venetian Senate had expressly decreed, That they should give the Turks Battle.

But donus the Spanish Admiral thinking it, as indeed it was, to be a matter of great difficulty and danger, was quite of another mind, saying, That he could not but marvel, how the Venetian Senators sitting at their ease in Counsel, could before they knew their own strength, and power of the Enemy, the nature of the Country, and purpose of their Forces, determine what to do for Martial Men to do; unto whose actions no certain rule could be prescribed.

All the Shoars (he said) were kept with the Enemies Garrisons; so that what need favour they should have, they could neither come by Water or Wood, or put into any Harbor.

Beides that, the Enemy would give them Battle at his own pleasure, and not at theirs; for that they were not of so much power, as to enforce him to fight: And that if the Senate, which used to do all things warily, and with great advice, did but see the weakness of their Gallies, wanting both Souldiers and Mariners, they would be of another mind.

He alleged further, That they were to wage War in the Enemy's Country, where there was no Port to receive their Fleet, no peaceable place, no confederate City, nor King to friend; whereas the time of the year grew every day worse and worse, when as they had neither Harbour to put into, neither were able to abide the Sea.

And now that Nicofia was lost, there was no reason longer for them to flay, the Enemy so strongly possessed the Island with his great Army, as that there was no any hope to do any good against him.

And that to keep him from Victual, and so to distress him, was not possible, lying in a most fertile Island, and in the midst of his own Dominions; whereas they, who were to be still relieved from far, should sooner feel the want than the Enemy. He was victualled (as he said) when he came from home, but for three months, in hope to have made a short dispatch, and had now two thousand miles home. He said moreover, that he had express commandment from the King, to return to Messina before Winter, and that therefore so soon as the month was out he would depart.

The Venetian Admiral desiring nothing more, than by Battle at Sea to overthrow the Turks, and so to relieve the distressed Cypriots, urged the Spanish Admiral to proceed in the Voyage; saying, That so great aid was not sent from the Pope and the King, only for the relief of Nicofia, but to deliver the whole Island from the danger of the Turk.

Of the same opinion with the Spanish Admiral were divers other great Captains in the Fleet; namely Sforza, who said, That nothing was to be done, as might rashly exopte unto casualty or power of the Enemy, the publick Fortune and Majesty of the Christian Commonwealth, which was in that Fleet greatly hazarded: That longer stay might bring further danger; that in that Fleet consisted the whole welfare of the Commonwealth, wherein more might be lost, if any mishap should chance thereunto, than was good to be gained by the relieving of Famagusta.

The great Commanders thus differing in opinions, the Council was in a heat dissolved, and nothing concluded. Upon which so foul a disagreement the Fleet began now to return back again, but so, that it was not now as before, one, upon the first dissent, but three Fleets, every Admiral by himself drawing after him his Fleet.

Auria the Spanish Admiral, who first returned, after he had been two days wonderfully with Tempest tossed at Sea, came at last to Caprathos, and departing thence, with much ado arrived with his Fleet in the Island of Crete; from whence he by a Messenger sent of purpose, requested leave of the Pope's Admiral, that he might with his good will presently return home. Whereunto Columanus answered, That he would give him no such leave; but rather charged him, in the duty he ought to the good of the Christian Commonwealth, not to depart, but to keep company with the rest of the Fleet until they were past Zacynthus, that so with their united Forces they might more safely pass by the Enemies's Countries; whereas otherwise, if any thing should by his hasty departure fall out otherwise than well, it should be imputed to the dishonour of him that had forsaken his Friends, and not of them that were so by him forfeaken. But unto this Auria answered, That the welfare of the Kingdoms of Sicilie and Naples consisted in the safety of this Fleet; and that therefore having haft home, he could not stay to keep company with their heavy Gallies and other Ships of burthen, which must oftentimes be towed forward. This he openly pretended to his departure; yet he secretly sought (as it was deemed) to find an occasion whereby to withdraw himself (being as he accounted the better Man at Sea) from the command of Columinus, whereunto he was full free against his will subjected.

Zanlus the Venetian Admiral, differing of his Office, and out in bonds to Venice.

After they had thus a while spent the time with reasoning the matter to and fro, Auria of himself without further leave hoisted Sail, and so at length came to Mylina in Sicily; neither did Columinus and Zanlus stay in those Quarters long after him, but having endured much trouble at Sea, arrived at last, Columinus in Italy, and Zanlus at Corycia. Thus this mighty Fleet, which had all this Summer filled the Mediterranean with all the Countries thereabout, with the expectation of some great matter, was by the discord of the Generals dissolved, having done nothing at all worth the remembrance. In this idle expedition many thousands of right valiant Men lost their lives, being dead of divers proceeding of change of Diet, and of unseasonableness of the Weather in that hot Climate; amongst whom was the valiant Count Hieronymus Martinengus, sent by the Senate with three thousand Soldiers for the defence of Famagusta; who also most of them perished in that Voyage. The Venetian Fleet was no sooner arrived at Corycia, but Augustinus Barbadias was sent from the Senate to discharge Zanlus the Admiral of his Office, and to send him Prisoner to Venice; in whose room he placed Sebastianus Venerius Governour of that Island.

A desperate Fall of a woman.

The Turks Baffles at Sea certainly advertised of the departure of the Christian Fleet, were not a little proud thereof, as by the confession of their Enemies, their Betters. Yet forasmuch as the Seas began then to grow rough, and no Enemy appeared, they thought it to no purpose to keep the Seas with so great a Fleet, and therefore resolved to leave Musapha with his Army in Cyprus, the next year to make an end of his Conquest; to happily begun; and seven Gallies at Sea before Famagusta, that no relief should that way be brought into the City, and so to depart themselves with the rest of the Fleet to Winter in more safer Harbours; Pial with the greater part of the Fleet to Constantinople, and Haly with the rest to the Rhodes. And because they would for their greater credit prepare for worthy Prefect for their great Lord and Master Selymus, they fringed a great Gallion of Adonatus the chief Baffes, and two other tall Ships, with the richest of the Spoil of Nicosia, and the choice of the Prisoners taken. But when they were now ready to hoist Sail and depart, as they were carrying out of the Gallion, certain Barrels of Gunpowder which Musapha the General had commanded for his better provision to be landed, a noble Gentlewoman Captive in the Gallion, wishing rather to die with honour, than to live dishonoured, secretly fired the Powder; by force whereof the said Gallion with the other two Ships, were suddenly rent in pieces; and all that was therein blown up into the Air. Of all that were in those three Vessels, none escaped with life but the Master of the Gallion, and two Christian Captives, but there perished together with the rich Spoil. But the Baffes following their former resolution, departed from

Cyprus, and afterwards in safety arrived at Constantinople; where both then and all the Winter following, such preparation was in making, as if Selymus had the next year purposed some far greater matter than the Conquest of Cyprus.

Whilst Sebastianus Venerius (now the Venetian Admiral) yet lay at Corycia, the rude Accorantian people, more famous for nothing than for their Theft and want of all things; by trusty Messengers promised to deliver into his power the strong Castle of Chymra, kept by a Garrison of three hundred Turks, if he himself with a few Gallies and a convenient number of Footmen, would come into the Bay of Ambra; offering him good Hostages for the better assurance of their promise. Of which their offer he gladly accepted, and forthwith went to the appointed place with a Company of Horsemen, three thousand Footmen, and certain Gallies; who were no sooner landed, but that presently a thousand of those rude Mountain people came unto them; with which power taking the Hill, and repelling the Turks Garrison coming to the relief of the Castle, he so discouraged them that were in the Hold, that the next night they let themselves down with Ropes into the Valley below; but being deceived, were there all either taken or slain. And so a very short time was that strong Castle taken by the Admiral, and a strong Garrison of Christians put into it in stead of the Turks.

Not long after, Quirinus the Viceadmiral, a Man of great Courage, landed with twenty four Gallies in Peloponnus near the Bay of Maine, and there upon the suddain both by Sea and Land besieged a strong Castle, which the Turks but two years before had built to trouble the Christians passing that way. Which Castle he took in five hours, and put to the Sword five hundred Turks which lay there in Garrison; and razing it down to the ground, carried away with him four and twenty great Pieces of Artillery into the Island of Zacynthus.

At such time as Musapha before lay at the Siege of Famagusta, Brigadinus Governour of the Town, and Helenius a most expert Captain, from out of the high places of the City beholding the great Army of the Turks (which covered the ground almost as far as they could see), with the cunning manner of their Fortification, were therewith much moved; and therefore thought it good betime to give the Senate knowledge thereof, and in so great a danger to crave their aid. And that their request might be of more weight, and have the better hearing, they intricated Hieronymus Ragazinus Bishop of the City, a reverend and devout Man, to take upon him that charge; unto whom they joyntly Nicholas Donatus a noble Gentleman of Cyprus. The Bishop at the first was very unwilling to go, as loath in so great danger to leave his Flock; but at length overcome with the entreaty of the Governor, and Tears of the besieged, suffered himself to be entreated; and embarked in a Gally about the going down of the Sun, loading out of the Haven, and hoisting Sail, with a fair gale of Wind passed through the Turks Fleet, which then lay at Anchor before the City; and by the coming on of the night, and by the great way he made, got him quickly out of sight. After four days failing he came to Crete, and so at last to Venice; where, as he had before unto the Admiral, so there unto the Senate he declared the dangerous estate of the City, the strength of the Enemy, the weakness of the Defendants against so great a multitude, and the want of many things needful for the holding out of the Siege; and to

to be brief, that except they sent speedily relief, the City could not be kept. Zanlus at that time Admiral, careful for the besieged, caused four tall Ships to be laden with all manner of Victual and a great quantity of Gunpowder, and put into them seven hundred select Soldiers, all which he sent from Crete to the relief of the City Famagusta; appointing Mattheus Quirinus with twelve of the best Gallies in all the Fleet, to conduct the same thither. This Quirinus was a most valiant and expert Captain, meanly descended, but by service grown to be a Man both of great reputation and wealth; and therefore Zanlus at his departure to Venice although he knew the matter required haste, yet presuming upon his wisdom, and carefulness, left it to his discretion, when and how to perform that piece of service. Quirinus (not without cause) doubting to let forward, the Seas as then full of the Turks Gallies, staid until Winter was well spent, and then setting forward the seventeenth of January, kept aloof from the Ships, which with a prosperous Wind came directly before Famagusta; in hope that the Turks Gallies which lay in the mouth of the Haven, might be drawn farther into the Sea, in hope of some good Booty, by himself staying with his Gallies in place convenient out of sight. Neither had the event deceived his expectation, had not his fierce nature hindered the fame; for the Turks upon the dawning of the day despoiling the Ships, made hastily toward them; but Quirinus not able longer to stay himself, and before desirous to fight with them, flew himself too soon in the open Sea, before the Enemy was come near the Ships; whom as the Turks had seen, and that there was no hope to withstand him, they raised their Oars, and with all speed retired. But Quirinus following faster upon them, they were glad for safeguard of their lives, with all the power they could to run three of their Gallies aground, and to run to shoar themselves; which three Gallies, Quirinus did with his great Ordnance beat all to pieces, and fore gale the other four. The Haven thus cleared, he returned again unto the Ships, and brought them with the supply in safety to Famagusta; upon whose arrival was great rejoicing both amongst the Garrison Soldiers and the Citizens; for the Turks thought nothing less, than that the Christian Gallies durst at that time of the year have put into those dangerous Seas; which Quirinus well knowing, came forth again with his Gallies, and roaming up and down at his pleasure, took two of the Enemies Ships richly laden, coming to the Camp; with which Booty he enriched his Soldiers; and further incited by occasion, landed his Men in divers places along the Sea Coast in Pamphilia, and there did great harm. So having filled the Country with the terror and fame of his Name, he returned again to Famagusta; where he notably encouraged the Garrison Soldiers, persuading them to remember their wonted Valour; and filling them with hope that the Christian Fleet would be with them in the beginning of the next Summer, to deliver them from their Enemies, and to raise the Siege. So having in twenty days dispatched that he came for, and done what good service else he could, he departed from Famagusta, and within five days after arrived at Crete.

Nicholas Ragazinus Bishop of Cyprus, sent by Selymus.

It was not long, but Selymus had knowledge of this last supply sent to Famagusta; and so the harms done by Quirinus; whereupon he was so highly displeased, that he commanded the Governor of Cibis his Head to be struck off, and the Governor of the Rhodes to be disgraced, whose charge it was to have kept those Seas, so that nothing should have been conveyed into Famagusta. Neither spared he Pial Baffa, but deprived him of his Admiralty, and placed Parvus Baffa Admiral in his stead; for that he had not the year before discomfited the Christian Fleet at the Island of Crete, as it was supposed he might have done.

From the beginning of this War, the Venetians, with Pius Quirinus, then Pope, who greatly favoured their cause, had most earnestly from time to time solicited Philip King of Spain, to enter with them into the participation and fellowship of this War; which their request standing indeed with the good of his State, he seemed easily to yield unto; and therefore sent Auria, his Admiral the last year, with his Fleet to aid them, but with such success as is before declared. As for to join with them in perpetual League and Confederation (as it was termed) against the common Enemy, that he referred unto the discrete consideration of the two Cardinals, Granvella and Pace, and Jo. Zunica his Embassador, sent for that purpose to Rome; promising to perform whatsoever they should on his behalf agree upon or consent unto. At the same time, and for the same purpose lay also Swianus the Venetian Embassador at Rome; unto whom the Pope joyntly Cardinal Morone, Albrandinus, and Rufinus, with certain other of the chief Cardinals, as Men indifferent to both parties, to moderate and compose such differences and difficulties: as should arise betwixt the aforesaid Commissioners for the King and the Venetians, concerning the intended League. But these grave Men, sent from so great Princes about so great a matter, (as well there could not be a greater) were no sooner met together as they began in consultation, but that forthwith they began to jar upon the Capitulations of the League. Necessary it was: thought that a League should be agreed upon against so puissant and dangerous an Enemy, but to find the way how the same might be concluded to the contentment of all parties, seemed a matter almost impossible. Oftentimes these Commissioners far, but the oftener the farther off, if one difficulty were by the discretion of some appeased, in stead thereof at the next meeting arose three others. The chief command of the Army to be raised, the proportion of the Forces, the manner of the War, with many other like circumstances incident to so great Actions, made great differences among them; but most of all, the indifferent proportioning of the charge, the Spanish Commissioners seeking to turn the greatest part thereof upon the Venetians, and the Venetians upon them; which was done with such earnestness and study of every Man towards his own part, as if they had all thers met for the bettering of the particular State from which they were sent, rather than for the Common good; For the Spaniard, who in former time was glad to keep the Frontiers of his large Dominions in Italy, Sicily, Sardinia, Corfica, Majorca, Minorca, yea and of Spain itself, with strong Garrisons for fear of the Turk; now that the War was risen betwixt the Venetians and him, and the danger thereof translated far off into other Mens Territories; enjoyed now in his own an unwonted quietness, to the great content of his Subjects and easing of his own Charge in maintaining of so many Garrisons as before; whereof many were now thought needless. Besides that, he by the Indulgence of the Pope raised such great Sums of Money upon his Church, as was thought by many, sufficient to discharge the charge of the War: For which causes he cared not for entering in any further League with the Venetians, but as it were in courtesy to fend them a yearly Aid, to maintain a defensive lingering War, and so to keep the Turks bated upon the Venetian, a far off from his own Territories. But the Venetians, in whose Dominions the fierce Enemy daily raged, as well in Dalmatia as in Cyprus, were even for the same reasons moved to hasten and shorten the War, that the Spaniard was to prosecute it; for beside the nearness of the danger, and the infinite calamities by them sustained, their yearly revenues arising for most part of their Customs, were greatly impaired; and their Traffick (the maintenance of their State) almost quite cut off; which caused them more earnestly to confederate themselves with the Spaniard. But hard it was to join in one State so far distant, differing in respect of their particular profit, and almost by nature contrary. Thus was all the last year, and a great part of this also, spent by the aforeaid Commissioners in turbulent and fruitless Conferences, but nothing was as yet concluded concerning the League; which troubled the Venetians not a little, being of themselves too weak for so mighty an Enemy as was Selymus, and yet not other certain strength from their Friends to rest upon. But whilst they stood thus doubtful of the League with Spain, and quite out of hope of any attornment with Selymus; upon the sudden when they least expected, it was by good Fortune laid as it were in their Laps, to make choice whether they would (as they had before most earnestly desired) join in League with the Pope and the King of Spain, or else fall to agreement with Selymus; and that by this means.

Muhamet the chief Bassa, a secret friend unto the Venetians, of whom he had been of long time honoured, had no great liking of the prosperous success of Mulapha in Cyprus, and therefore devised night and day, how to cross the rising of him, the Competitor of his Honour; and with all to help the Venetians, unto whom he was much beholden. He by secret Messengers had before oftentimes founded the mind of the Venetian Embassador, and put him in hope, that if suit were made unto Selymus for Peace, it would undoubtedly be granted; and further promised, to be himself a helper and intercessor for the same. But finding the Embassador to cast many perils, and to give small credit unto their talk, who had before by trusting them deceived him; he did not so give over the matter, but referring the further tempering with him unto a more fit time, for the present he took opportunity to enter into discourse with Selymus himself concerning the Venetians, and told him that it was reported, That they weary of the long altercation they had had with the Spaniards concerning the League, and now destitute of all hope and aid, would now happily of their own accord grant him that which they had before to him denied. And perceiving him not unwilling to hear so of them, he proceeded further in the matter, to know his pleasure what he would have done therein; cunningly by the way of good Counsel persuading him unto that which he most wished himself to be done. Immediately after, he secretly advertised M. Antonius the Venetian Embassador, That there was great hope of Peace, and that therefore the Senate should under the colour of exchanging of Prisoners, and redemption of Merchants Goods, send some fit Men to Constantinople, with whom he would in secret confer of all such matters as might farther the pacification. This unexpected news from the Embassador brought to Venice, was well heard of the Senate; for they thought it much to concern their State, to have a way opened whereby upon tolerable conditions to make Peace with the mighty Tyrant, if that the League betwixt them and the King of Spain could not be concluded. Hereupon they made choice of one Jacobus Ragacinius to go about the matter to Constantinople. This Ragacinius was a Man of great spirit and dexterity of Wit to take any matter in hand, and of a great reach and deep judgment in the managing thereof; and withal exceeding rich, and of so good carriage of himself, as that he was therefore famous; all which things were thought of great moment to win the favour of that covetous and barbarous Nation. The Senate, although they had not yet made proof that he was fit for the matter, yet doubted not, but that upon the report of the sending of this notable Man, Men would thereof diversely divine, every Man according to his own fantasy; and that many of the wiser fort would indeed surmise, as the truth was, that he was sent for to entreat of Peace, although the exchange of Prisoners, and redemption of Merchants Goods, were the only things were openly pretended; and the Senate, although they thought it not amiss to have it so understood, because such a suspicion was like enough to stir up both the Pope and the Spaniard to accept of such conditions of the desired League, as they had before rejected; yet left the hope of the League (which they for many causes thought good to cherish) thereby cut off, might cause the Pope and the Spaniard both to be cold in the matter, they certified both them and other Christian Princes, of the sending of Ragacinius; yet of purpose concealing the secret drift of his going. Ragacinius thoroughly instructed by the Senate, was in a Gally conducted to Ragafium; which Cassan-Beg (the great Bassa Muhamet Son, Governor of Liburnia) understanding, met him upon the Frontiers, and told him, That he was sent by his Father, both to meet him and give conduct him; which the Martial Man, contrary to the manner of the Turks, courteously performed, honourably entertaining him, and afterward sending him with a safe Convey into he was out of all danger. Ragacinius coming to Constantinople, was there by night secretly received into the City, and at first brought unto a little bafe Inn, and a Guard set over him that he should speak with no Man. But after three days he was removed to a much better place, and appointed with some kinds of dainty Dishes of sundry kinds of Meats. The effect of his Message was, to try the Turks minds, and after conference had with the Embassador, to entreat of Peace. At length having access to the great Bassa Muhamet, after he had delivered unto him (as he had in charge) his Message concerning the exchange of Prisoners and Merchants Goods; Muhamet asked him, If he had nothing in charge from the Senate concerning a pacification to be made? Whereunto he answered, That he had, but that he must first speak with the Embassador, without whose Advice and Counsel he was not of himself to do any thing. At that first encounter, the Bassa to terrify the Messenger, declared unto him the innumerable multitude of the Turks Horsemen and Footmen, which no Nation (as he vainly boasted) was able by force or policy to withstand: Also his great and invincible Fleet at Sea, with whom all the power of the Christians joyned together, was not able to encounter; and much other such like strength and wealth of his; And that the Venetians were now no more able to withstand Selymus, than they were in times past to resist his Father and his Ancestors. Yet he discoursed of this matter in such sort, as not thereby to cut off the hope of the pacification; but said, That the Venetians should best have provided for the safety of their State, if at the first they had lifted unto him, friendly and faithfully advising them not to have entered into Arms, in which doing they showed more courage than power; and that yet, as the case now stood, and that Selymus was in most assured hope, in short time to become Lord and Master of the whole Island, it should be to their great good, to prefer the favour and good will of the Turks before War, and by the voluntary yielding up of Cyprus, gain unto themselves perpetual Peace and Tranquillity. As for the file itself, it was not now worth the hazard of many lives, being delicate of the inhabitants, which were almost all either slain or fled, the Cattel driven away, the Towns ranlackt and burnt, and the whole Country, of late most pleasant and beautiful, now so spoiled and unpeopled; that it could not of long time yield unto him that should have it, any profit or commodity. Ragacinius being a cool and advised Man, and withal perceiving that the Bassa was not to be contradicted in his talk, so tempered his answer, as that he shewed no token of fear, neither let any word fall that might offend his ears, saying, That he was right glad that he had found so much favour in his sight, as to have access and leave to talk with so great a Prince, who for wisdom and gravity excelled all the rest of the Princes of the great Emperors Court; who so far as he might with his Loyalty towards his Sovereign, had always most graciously favoured the Venetian State; who also not ignorant of the uncertainty of worldly things, knew of all others best, that on both sides were both Men and Arms, and that most mighty Princes had oftentimes with small forces been overthrowen, the event of things never deceiving Men more than in matters of War; no power upon Earth being sure, which could not within some bounds contain the strength of it self; and that therefore he was in good hope, that he so worthy a Man knowing best what belonged both to Peace and War, would devise some such course as might sort to the good and quiet both of the Venetian State and Turkish Empire; in which doing he should find sufficient matter for his eternal praise and glory, if by his discreet wisdom a pacification might be made. Such talk having passed at their first meeting, Ragacinius had leave to speak with the Embassador, who then lay at Pera under his keeping. In passing over to Pera, Ragacinius might see a Fleet of Turkish Gallies encountering one with another in manner of a Fight at Sea, which the Turks had of purpose provided to shew unto him as a strange sight. Whereat Ragacinius smiling, said unto the Turks that were present with him, That it was a pretty Childlike Sport for him that had never seen the like before; but not to the Venetians, who were accustomed with their matters in earnest; as the Turks should well know whenever they had a mind to make proof what they were able to do at Sea. Ragacinius coming to the Embassador, had conference with him at large, and resolved with him what to do in his negotiation. And so returning to Muhamet, easily dispatched with him for the exchange of Prisoners and Merchants Goods; but then they came to talk of the stipulations of a pacification to be made, at the first they were so far off, as if they would never have met; but after much and often Conference, sometime the one yielding, and sometime the other, the matter was brought to some conformity, so that there was no such great difference betwixt them; but that they were like enough to have agreed. First the Pope, and Philip the King of Spain, advertised of the sending of Ragacinius to Constantinople, began to imagine as the truth was, that he was sent about some treaty of Peace, what colour soever the Senate pretended to cover the same. And therefore doubting left the Turkish Emperor having once made Peace with the Venetians, should turn his great Forces already prepared, upon the one or both of them, they thought it good for troubling of that Peace, now with all speed to hasten the League, which they had so long before delayed. For which purpose the Pope sent the noble Columnius to Venice, who admitted unto the Senate, declared at large how matters had passed at Rome concerning the League; and afterwards, what profit might arise of such a League concluded, and what harms might ensue of the same, neglected. And to hasten the matter, for as it were before their Eyes, how much it concerned the Common good, but them especially, to have the same with speed confirmed. As for to give any trust unto the Turks, was (as he said) not becoming to their deep wisdom and judgment, seeing they so often had been by them rather deceived than vanquished. In conclusion, he requested them, That for his Holiness sake, moderating in some part their hard demands, they would with speed joyn with him and the King in a most firm and Christian League. Although this Speech of Columnius had much moved the minds of the Venetians, so that many inclined to the League, yet were there many doubtful thereof, and could not be resolved whether it were better to embrace Peace with the Turk, or the League with the Pope and the King. Peace pleased them, neither did the League displease them; it seemed a matter most difficult, whether to resolve upon. They were fearful of the League either received, or rejected; The hope of Victory, the inconsistency of the Turks, their own strength at Sea, the large promises of the Christian Princes, the certain hope of the League, and uncertainty of the Peace, persuaded them to embrace the League. On the other side, the bad success of the year before, their Forces shaken, and almost spent in Cyprus, the suspected and doubtful faith of their Confederates, with the uncertainty of the success, induced them to prefer the hoped Peace before the League. So the Venetians in suspense betwixt both, gave the Embassador daily more doubtful Answers than other; neither by promise binding themselves, neither by Express denial cutting off the hope of the League, by Examples and Arguments rather telling what was by others alledged, than any way declaring what they themselves thought. Sometime they alledged such things as might make a Man believe, that they were willing to joyn in League, and by and by again they would seem neither to reject nor accept of the same. In which doubtfulness many days passed. At length the matter being propounded in the Senate, there found not one like disposition of minds that it had among the manner sort; for some of the Senators inclined to the League, whose reasons were grounded not upon profit only, but upon credit and honour also, which they wished to be chiefly regarded; declaring also, what great security, honour and glory, should redound unto them, by entering into such a honourable League. But the remembrance of former losses, the strength of the Turk, possessing a great part of the World, compared unto their own, the terror of the Enemies Name, the fear of the evil success, the small hope of prevailing, induced others to like better of Peace,

The Pope and Philip the King of Spain, advertised of the sending of Ragacinius to Constantinople, began to imagine as the truth was, that he was sent about some treaty of Peace, what colour soever the Senate pretended to cover the same. And therefore doubting left the Turkish Emperor having once made Peace with the Venetians, should turn his great Forces already prepared, upon the one or both of them, they thought it good for troubling of that Peace, now with all speed to hasten the League, which they had so long before delayed. For which purpose the Pope sent the noble Columnius to Venice, who admitted unto the Senate, declared at large how matters had passed at Rome concerning the League; and afterwards, what profit might arise of such a League concluded, and what harms might ensue of the same, neglected.

whole opinion was also confirmed by this, That the Confederation with those Christians, was of no more affurance or continuance than the Turks Peace; Beside that, they alleged, That Leagues were therefore of less affurance, for that Confederations and Amities were seldom or never sincerely and faithfully kept, on both sides, every Man commonly serving his own turn without care of other Men. They also set it as were before their Eies what great occasions, even small suspicions might give Princes to break their Leagues, what strange effects the fear of the loss of Goods, or some part of their Territory might work. After this so weighty a matter had been thus with great contention thoroughly debated on both sides in the Senate, it was at last put by voices; and so by the consent of the greater part, the League was as more honourable received, and the Turks Peace rejected; and a Decree of the Pope to that effect made. Ragaximus by secret Letters form the Senate understanding of all these matters, began to deal more warily with Mahamet the great Baffa in matter concerning the pacification, and more hardly to yield to his demands; and propounding many difficulties of purpose defied; requested him, That he might by his good leave return to Venice, that he might be able himself to judge, and so to return to him again with more certain instructions; assuring him, that the Senate would upon knowledge of the conditions of the Peace do and devise many things for the furtherance of the same; which could not so well be done by Letters, as if he were there himself present to resolve them upon every particular. This his request obtained, he with great speed got him out of Constantinople; but was scarcely got out of the Gates when report of the League which the Venetians had made with the Pope and the King of Spain, was brought unto the Court, and had in short time filled the City; which made all the way as he travelled more troublesome, and frustrated that also which was before concluded concerning the exchange of Prisoners and Merchants Goods. Ragaximus being come to Venice, declared at large in the Senate the drift and purpose of the Turk, and what conference he had had with the great Baffa, and in what forwardness the Peace was; for which his discreet carriage of the matter, his wisdom was highly by the whole Senate commended, and he himself afterward honourably rewarded.

In the mean time the Commissioners at Rome after long consultation concluded a League, which they would have to be perpetual, as well for invasive as defensive Wars against the Turks; and was by solemn Oath confirmed by the Pope, the King of Spain, and the Venetian Senate the 24th of Spain, and day of May, in the year 1571. For the execution of which League, it was agreed upon, That the Sea and Land Forces should consist of two hundred Gallies, an hundred Ships, fifty thousand Footmen, and four thousand five hundred Horsemen; with a proportionate quantity of great Artillery, Victuals, and other things necessary, to be every year ready in March, or at farthest in April, to meet together at such a place in the Ea, as should be unto them for that purpose appointed; to be employed as the Admirals saw cause, and as the present state of things should require. For maintenance of which charge it was agreed, That the King of Spain should defray the one half and the other half to be divided into three equal parts; whereof the Venetians should bear two parts, and the Pope the third; which if it should be too heavy for him, then that remained by him undischarged, to be divided into five parts; whereof the King was to discharge three, and the Venetians two. The charge thus proportioned, they took order also for the provision of Victuals, to be at a reasonable price taken up in any the Confederate Dominions, where the Army or Fleet should chance to stay; yet so, that it should be at the King of Spain his discretion; out of his Kingdoms of Naples and Sicily, first to take his provision for the victualling of Gulietta, Malta, and his own Navy. It was also agreed, That if the King of Spain had no common War, invade Algiers, Tripoli, or Tunis, that then the Venetians should of their own charge, aid him with fifty Gallies well appointed; as also, That the King should in like manner and with like forces aid them as oft as they should by the King be invaded. But if it should fortune the Roman Territory to be invaded, that then the aforesaid Princes should be bound with all their Forces, to the uttermost of their power, to defend those places, and the person of the Pope. And that in managing of the Confederate War, the three Admirals should confer together of all matters, and whatsoever the greater part should agree upon, to be as reputed as agreed upon by them all: That Don John of Austria, Charles the Fifth his natural Son, and Brother to the King, should have the chief command of the Forces both at Sea and Land; but not to display his own Ensign, but the common Ensign of the Confederates; Also, that the places as should be gained from the Turk by the Confederate Army, should be divided amongst the Confederate Princes, excepting Tunis, Algiers, and Tripoli, which should remain only to the King of Spain: That all controversies arising amongst the Generals should be decided by the Pope, unto whom the Venetians should lend twelve Gallies, furnished of all things saving Men and Victuals, which the Pope should of his own charge supply: Which Gallies at the end of the War he should again deliver, in such case as they then were: That an honourable place should be left for Maximilian the Emperor, the French King, the King of Polonia, and the King of Portugal to enter into this League, whom with the rest of the Christian Princes, it should be seem the Pope to stir up in so good a Quarrel; and that it should not be lawful for any the aforesaid Confederate Princes to treat of Peace, or enter into League, without the knowledge and consent of the other Confederates. And for the order proceeding of all things it was agreed, That ever in Autumn the Confederate Princes should by their Embassadors at Rome consult of the next years Wars, and according as the time and occasions should require, to determine whether their Forces were to be encreased or diminished. This League thus at length with much ado concluded, was not long after in June with great Pomp and Triumph openly proclaimed in Rome, Venice, and Spain; to the great joy of the greatest part of Christendom.

Whilst these things were in doing, the Venetians the more to intangle the Turk, thought it the good to make proof, if they might by any means stir up Tamas the Persian King to take up Arms against him; who as he was a Prince of great power, so did he exceedingly hate the Turks, as well for the difference betwixt the Persians and them about matters of their vain Superstition, as for the manifold injuries he had oftentimes sustained. There was one Vincenzo Alexander, one of the Secretaries for the State, who having escaped out of Prison at Constantinople, was but

but a little before come to Venice, a wary wife Man, and of great experience, who for his dexterity of Wit, and skillfulness in the Turkish Language, was thought of all others most fit to take in hand so great a matter. He having received Letters and Instructions for the Senate, and furnished with all things necessary, travelling through Germany, Polonia, and the Forests of Moscow, in Turkish attire, came to Moncastrum, a Port Town upon the fide of the Euxine or Black-Sea, at the mouth of the great River Boriphemes; where he embarked himself for Trapezand, but was by a contrary Wind driven to Sinope, a City of great Traffick; from whence he travelled rough and broken Ways to Erzurum, leaving his left hand, because he would not fall upon any part of the Turks Army (which was then marching towards Cyprus through all those Countries) nevertheless he fell upon a part thereof, from which he with great danger rid himself, being taken for a Turk, and by blind and troublesome Ways, through Rocks and Forests, arrived at length at Erzurum, a strong City of the Turks, then upon the Frontiers of the Turks Dominions towards the Georgians. His Journey of Alexander was not kept so secret, but that it was vented at Constantinople by a Spy, who under the colour of friendship, haunting the Venetian Embassadors House at Pera, had got certain knowledge of the going of Alexander into Persia. Whereupon certain Curriers were sent out with all speed to beset the three straight Passages into Persia, whereby it was supposed he must of necessity pass; with certain Notes all of the favour of his win, of his Selymus, and other matters, whereby he was best to be known. But he in so dangerous a Country doubting all things, and fearing such a matter, leaving his Company behind him, with incredible celerity posted from Erzurum to Tauris, and was a great way gone before the Turks Curriers came into those Quarters: who yet hearing of him, followed after as far as they durst, but could not overtake him. Alexander coming to Tauris, understood that the Court lay at Casbin, about twelve days Journey further up into the Country; coming thither the fourteenth of August of this year 1571, he chanced to meet with certain English Merchants, with whom he had before been acquainted; by whose help he not only got to speak with Ayder Tamas the Kings third Son, but learned of them all the Manners and Fashions of the Persian Court, and how to bear himself therein. The Persians by reason of the intolerable Heat do most of their Business at that time of the year by night. Wherefore Alexander about midnight brought in to Ayder, declared unto him the cause of his coming; and the next night admitted unto the speech of his aged Father, delivered his Letters of Credence, and in the name of the Senate declared unto him; with what perfidious dealing Selymus the Turkish Emperor was about to take away Cyprus from the Venetians, with what greediness and pride he had set upon the Christians, and that discharged of that War, he would of all likelihood set upon the Persians; having the self same Quarrel unto the Persians that he had unto the Venetians, that is, An arrogant and insatiable desire of Sovereignty; a sufficient cause for the greedy Turk to repute every King the richer that he was, the more his Enemy. After that, setting forth to the full the Prowels of the Christians, the wonderful preparation they had made both at Sea and Land, and how he himself King with all his power, invaded the Turk, now altogether bated in the Wars of Cyprus; and to recover again such parts of his Kingdom as Solyman the Father of Selymus had taken from him. Wars he said were more happily managed abroad than at home; That since he alone (the Christian Arms all then at quiet) had withstood the Turks whole force and power, he needed not now to doubt of his most prosperous success, the Christian Princes now joining with him. That he was much unkind of his former losses and wrongs, if he thought he enjoyed an assured Peace; which he thought should be to nothing else but a deferring of War unto more cruel times; and that the Turk if he should overrun Cyprus, would forthwith turn his victorious Arms upon him. The end of one War was (as he said) but the beginning of another; and that the Turkish Empire could never stay in one state; and that he would observe not the Turks Words, but his Deeds; and how that the Ottoman Emperors according to the opportunity of the times, used by turns, sometime force, sometime deceit, as best served their purposes: That no Princes had at all times by dissembled Peace and uncertain Leagues more eluded him, until they had oppressed others. He wished also, that at length his cunning dealing might appear unto the World; and that Princes would think, that being combined together, they might more easily overcome the Turk, than being separated, defend their own: That in former times sometime will, sometime force, was wanting to them to unite their Forces; And that therefore they should now combine themselves for their Common good against the common Enemy: That it concerned no less the Persians than the Christians, to have the power of the Turk abated. And that this taking up of Arms, should be for the good of the Persian King howsoever things should fall out; if well, he should then recover what he had before lost, with much more than was the Turks; if otherwise, yet by voluntary entering into Arms to countenance himself, and to give the Turks occasion to think that he feared him nor; which was (as he said) the only way to preserve their common safety, which would be unto all the Confederate Princes easie enough, if they themselves made it not more difficult than the power of the Enemy. The Speech of the Embassador was willingly heard; whereunto the King answered, That he would consider thereupon what he had to do, and in the mean while, a fair House was appointed for the Embassador and his Followers, and bountiful allowance appointed of the Kings charge. He was also many times importunately flattered by the Noblemen, whom he first requested to be mediators to the King, to take that honourable War in hand. The King had at that time a Son called Ismail, a Man of a great Spirit, whom he then kept in durance, for that he with too much infolency made Roads into the Frontiers of the Turks Dominions, to the disturbance of the League his Father had before made with the late Turkish Emperor Solyman; unto him Alexander having access, was of him courteously heard; who fretting and languishing for very grief of revenge upon the Turks, wished, that either the King his Father had his mind, or he himself the power of a King; and said, That if ever it were his good Fortune to obtain the Kingdom, he would indeed show what he then in mind thought. But of him more shall be said hereafter. Whilst this matter went more slowly forward in the Persian Court than the Embassadors would have had it, news was brought unto the Court, of the great Victory which the Christians had much about that time obtained of the Turks at Sea; upon which

which occasion the Ambassador solicited Tamur more earnestly than before, to make him partaker of the Victory of the Christians, by entering into Confederation with them, and by taking up of Arms, rather than to hold uncertain friendship with the Turks in their miseries, by whom he had been so often wronged. This he said was the only time for the Persian King to recover his former Glory, the like offer whereof would neither often chance, neither long stay; and that if he suffered to fit an opportunity to slip away, he should afterwards in vain wish for the same, when it were too late. This so wholesome Counsel was well heard, but prevailed nothing to stir up the aged King; who then troubled with Rebellion in Media, or weary of the former Wars he had had with the Turk, and glad of such Peace as he had then with him; answered the Ambassador, That forasmuch as the Christian Princes had made a perpetual League amongst themselves, he would for two years expect the event, and afterward as occasion served, so to resolve upon Peace and War. This improvident resolution of the King, brought afterward unprofitable and too late repentance unto the whole Persian Kingdom; when as within a few years after, all the calamities which the Senate had by their Ambassador (as true Prophets) foretold, redounded unto the great shaking thereof, The Cyprian War once ended, and Peace concluded with the Venetians, Amurath the Son of Selymus, succeeding his Father in the Turkish Empire, invading the Persian King, took from him the great Country of Media, now called Silvan, with a great part of Armenia the Great, and the regal City of Tauris, as shall be hereafter in due place declared. At which time the Persian, who now refused to take up Arms, or join in League with the Christian Princes, repented that he had not before hearkened unto the wholesome Counsel of the Venetians; and taught by his own harms, wished in vain, that the Christian Princes would again take up Arms and join with him against the Turk.

Mustapha the great Baffa and General of the Turks Army, furnished with all things that could be defired for maintenance of his Siege; and Soldiers in great number daily repairing unto him out of Cilicia, Syria, the Leifer Asia, and the Territories thereabout, beside great Supplies brought unto him by Haly Baffa from Constantinople. In somuch, that it was thought he had in his Army two hundred thousand Men; began now that Winter was past, in the later end of April, to draw nearer unto Famagusta, and with incredible labour to cast up his Trenches and Mounts against the City, of such height, that the Defendants from the highest places of the City could scarcely see the points of the Turks Spears, or tops of their Tents, as they lay encamped; which was no great matter for the Baffa to perform, having in his Camp forty thousand Pioneers always ready at his command.

The City of Famagusta is situate in the East end of the Island, in a plain and low ground between two Promontories, the one called St. Andrew's Head, and the other the Head of Greacia. It is in circuit two miles, and in form four-square; but that the side toward the East, longer and more winding than the rest, doth much deform the exact figure of a Quadrant: It is almost on two parts beaten upon with the Sea, the other parts toward the Land are defended with a Ditch not above fifteen Foot broad, a Stone-wall, and certain Bulwarks and Parapets. Upon the Gate that leadeth to Amathus standeth a fix cornered Tower; other Towers stand out also in the Wall, every of them scarce able to contain fix Pieces of Artillery. It hath a Haven opening toward the South-East, defended from the injury of the Weather by two great Rocks, betwixt which the Sea cometh in by a narrow Passage about forty Paces over, but after opening wider giving a convenient Harbor to Ships, whereof it cannot contain any great number, and was now shut up with a strong Chain. Near unto the Haven standeth an old Cattle with four Towers, after the ancient manner of building. There was in the City one strong Bulwark, built after the manner of the Fortification of our time, with Palliades, Curtains, Calemets, and such like, in such manner, as that it seemed almost impregnable. All which, although they did much defend the strong and well fortified City, yet for that there wanted many things, it was thought too weak long to hold out against the great power of the Turk; but what wanted by reason of the situation and weak fortification, that the Governor and other noble Captains supplied in best force they might, with a strong Garrison of most valiant Soldiers, the surest defence of strong places. There was in the City two thousand and five hundred Italians, two hundred Albanian Horsemen, before entertained by the Governor; and of the Cypriots themselves were mustered two thousand and five hundred more, all Men resolutely set down to spend their Lives in defence of their Country.

Mustapha with wonderful celerity having brought to perfection his Fortifications, planted his Battery of sixty four great Pieces, amongst which were four great Basilisks of exceeding bigness, wherewith he continually without intermission battered the Walls of the City in five places, but especially that part of the Wall that was between the Haven and the Gate that leadeth to Amathus. And with great Morter-pieces cast up high Stones, which from high falling into the City, with their weight brake down the Houses they light upon, and fell oftentimes through their Vauls, even in the bottom of their Cellars, to the great terror of the besieged. The Walls in divers places fore shaken, and the Houses beaten down, he began to assault the City; which the Defendants (their Forces yet whole) valiantly repulsed, and not only defended their Walls and drove the Turks from the Breaches, but furiously failed out upon them, and with waving chain and wounded many wonderfully, killed their Fortifications, and abated their Courage; neither did the Enemy with greater fury maintain the battery or assault, than did the Christians the defence of the City, still sending their deadly Shot into the thickest of that great Multitude; in somuch that in few days the Baffa had lost thirty thousand of his Men; and the Captains themselves wondering at the Valour of the Defendants, as if they had not now considered, such Christians as they had before so oftentimes overthrow, but with some other strange people, began to despair of the winning of the City. The Turks thus doubting, and almost at a stand, the Christians in the mean time made up their Breaches with Earth, Baskets, Wool-bags, and such like, not sparing their very Beds and Bed-clothes, Chests, Carpets, and whatsoever else might serve to fill up the Breach. Among many wonders they feared, the greatest was, the want of Powder, which with continual shooting began greatly to be diminished; wherefore to relieve some part thereof against all extremities, they thought it best whilst yet some force was left, to use the same more sparingly, and to shoot more seldom. But the Turks still drawing nearer and nearer the City, and casting up Mounts higher than the Walls of the City, with Earth and Faggots filled up the Ditch; which done, they of the broken Stones made Walls on either side, to save themselves from the flanking Shot of the Christians; then giving a fresh Assault, they used not only their Shot, and other misfire Weapons, but came foot to foot, and notably fought in the Breach hand to hand. Which manner of fight (as if it had been so agreed upon) they every day maintained for the space of six hours. And although the Turks by reason of their multitude were divided into many parts, and fresh Men still succeeded them that were weary; yet such was the Courage of the Defendants, that every Man resolved to have the places of most danger, and from thence with courageous hand repulsed the Turks with exceeding great slaughter. But for all that, the furious Enemy maintaining the Assault, not only by day, but by often Alarms in the night also, kept the Christians continually in doubtful suspense and readines, as if they should have received a present Assault; and as soon as it was day, with fresh Men that had slept their fill, desperately assailed the Christians almost spent and meager for lack of sleep and rest. Force not prevailing, the restless Enemy leaving nothing unattempted, by a quaint device was like to have taken one of the Gates of the City: There was growing in the Island great plenty of a kind of Wood much of the nature of a Firre or Pitch-Tree, easie to be set on fire, but hardly to be quenched, but differing in this, that in burning it gave forth such a noisome smell, as was not by any Man well to be endured; of this kind of Wood the Turks brought a wonderful quantity to one of the Gates called Limsina, which once set on fire, could not be by the Defendants by any means be quenched, although they cast whole Pipes and Turns of Water at once into it, but most terribly burning close unto the Gate by the space of four days, with the vehemency of the heat, and loathsomeness of the smell, so troubled the Defendants, that scarce any of them could endure to stand upon the Wall, but forsaking the same, were ever and anon like to have given the Enemy leave to enter.

Bragadinus the Governor, more careful of the common safety than of his own danger, ceased not still to be going about from one place to another, telling the Islands. That now was given the firstest occasion they could desire, for them to test their Valour, and to gain great Honour of their barbarous Enemies; that it would be to their eternal Glory, if by their only means without any other help, the City so far off from the relief of the Christians might be defended: This (he said) was the only time wherein it stood them most upon to play the Men, for if they could keep that little was left, the rest of the Island would be easily recovered: And although the Turks Army exceeded far in number, yet did they excel them in Prowess and Valour; whereby a few, and as it were but an handful of Men, had oftentimes prevailed against most infinite multitudes; now all the cities of the World, as well Friends as Foes to be fixed upon them, so that if they held out against so great a power, both their Enemies would admire their Valour, and all Christendom extol their invincible Courage and Prowess; and that they themselves should thereby reap both great Profit and honour: neither that any thing could be alleged, why they should not be compared with the worthy Knights of Malta; who to their eternal Fame had delivered themselves out of the mouth of the Turk, and left unto the World a most fair example for Men valiantly to stand in to good a Quarrel upon their own defence: Nicolas (he said) was lost rather by the Cowardice of the Defendants, than by the Valour of the Enemy. He also praised the fidelity, and courage of the Gracians, who for any fear or danger could never be removed from the Venetians, or induced to submit themselves unto the Turks Government; and perwaded them, with the same resolution to defend their own City, that they saw in the Venetian Soldiers, fighting for them, and for their own honour to strive with the Italians, in defence of their State, their Country, their Wives, and Children, against the Tyranny of the Turks; forasmuch as it would in short time come, and set them free from all danger. The Senate also in like manner had sent Letters to Famagusta, willing them to be of good cheer, and yet a while to hold out the Siege, and that they should be in short time relieved. Balenius also General of the Garrison Soldiers, himself in Arms was present at every Skirmish, carefully foreseeing what was in every place and at all times to be done; and by encouraging of his Soldiers, and adventuring of his Person, shewed himself to be both a worthy Commander; and valiant Soldier. Neither did the Soldiers alone, but even the Women also what they might, striving above the power of the strength both of their minds and bodies; some bringing Meat, some Weapons unto the Defendants, and others Stones, Beds, Chests, and such like, to make up the Breaches. But Victuals beginning now to wax scant, eight thousand of the vulgar sort of People were turned out of the City, who all in safety were suffered to pass through the midst of the Turks Army, to seek their living in the Country.

This whilst open force prevailed not according to the Turks desire, they began in four places to undermine the City, in hope to have found entrance; but the Defendants doubting such a matter, by diligent listening, and great Vessels full of Water near unto the Walls, and Drums laid upon the ground, by the moving thereof discovered their Works, and with Countermine frustrated those of the Enemy; yet in so great a stir and hurly-burly all things were not possibly to be discovered; whereby it came to pass, that whilst the Defendants were altogether busied in defending the Walls, a Mine not perceived was suddenly blown up near unto the Tower standing upon the Haven, by force whereof a great part of the Wall thereabout was in a moment with a most horrible noise overthrow. With the fall thereof the Turks thinking the City as good as taken, with an horrible shout and outcry mounted the Wall, and in the Breach set up their Ensigns. Count Peter, who had the charge for that part of the Wall, being not now able to defend the same, so suddenly overthrow; which Nisfor Martinengus quickly perceiving, came speedily from his own Station, to repulse the Enemy now ready to have entered. The Fight became there most fierce and terrible, on the one side hope, on the other desperation, enraged their minds; the Turks were in hope, that if they forced themselves but a little they should forthwith win the City; and the Defendants propounding nothing unto themselves but shameful death and torture, fought as Men altogether desperate. The Turks trusted to their multitude; and the Christians to their valour: In the mean time Andrew Bragadinus with certain great Pieces apointed, out of the Cattle flew a number of the Turks as they were coming to the Breach. Balenius lemin hearing of the danger, came in haste with a Company of courageous Soldiers, to relieve them that were fighting at the Beach, and cheering up his Followers, thrust himself with the foremost into the face of the Beach; and there not only appointed what was to be done, and with cheerful countenance encouraged his Soldiers, but with his own hand having slain many, took one of the Turks Ensigns, when as he had before slain the bearer thereof, and tumbled him headlong into the Ditch. With this sight, witness of others encouraged, both on the right hand and on the left, made there a notable Battle, as Men fighting for their last hope. In fine the Turks were glad to retire, leaving behind them four thousand Carcases of their slain Fellows in the Town-ditch, with fourteen of their Ensigns, which were brought into the City. Neither was this Victory gained without some loss of the Christians; about a hundred were slain, among whom were Robertus Malvestrius, David Nocius, Celsus Fero, Evasmus Firmus, all Captains.

For all this, they in the City took small rest, the Turks great Shot still thundring in amongst them; and in such furious sort, as that in one day (which was the eighth of June) were numbered above five thousand great Shot, shot into the City. With which continual battery, one of the round Bulwarks of the Town was so shaken, as that a part of the Front thereof was fallen down into the Ditch; and another part floor leaning ready to fall, in such sort that it was not longer to be defended; which the Christians perceiving, presently undermined the same Bulwark, and in the Mine placed certain Barrels of Gunpowder. The Turks coming to assault the place they had so fore battered, the Defendants after some small resistance, fainted themselves to retire for fear, so to draw the Enemy the faster on; who was no sooner come to the place desired, but that fire being put to the Mine, blew up the Bulwark to great grief amongst the Turks. But by the ready firing of the Mine, there perished also about an hundred of the Christians, overtaken in their own device, amongst whom were also some of great account.

The Turks inflamed with their losses, were more enraged with the speeches and persuasions of Musiapha their General; who most earnestly exhorted them, with one consent to assail their Enemies, now driven into a Corner of the Island, spoiled of all their Country, trusting more unto the strength of the place, than of themselves; entreating for nothing more, than with their lives to depart thence. But what place (said he) is there impregnable for the Turks? Nicifusa, Zigeth, and such other strong Towns won, what are they but the monuments and testimonies of the cowardice of the Christians, and the proofs of the Turks? This day (said he) will confirm your former Labours and Victories; which you before undertook for Honour, but here you shall have Honour mixt with pain sufficient to make you all rich. The Turks encouraged with this speech of their General, as Men forgetful of all dangers, began a more terrible Siege than ever before; and having with incredible labour made three great

Mines, and blowing them up, overthrew a great part with the Wall of the Castle, the notable defence of the Haven; which done, they with all their force, oftentimes assailed the City, as if it should have been their last labour; neither ceased they to do day or night. At which time also that part of the City which is beaten upon with the Sea, was assaulted by them in the Gallies also.

The poor Christians spent with deadly wounds, continual labour, perpetual watching both night and day; and now brought to small number, hardly withstood the furious Enemy, assailing them in so many places at once, and held out that Tempest rather with courage than strength. In the mean time the Enemies Army encamped daily, the Turks in hope of the spoil they had at Nicifusa, continually repairing out of the Countries round about, unto the Camp. The Christian Captains seeing their Men with continual Alas for spent, in such sort, that how many fewer they seemed to be, there was not above three hundred found Men left; but seven Barrels of Powder remaining, want of all things daily encresing, hope of Aid (if decreasing, and the Venetians (their only comfort) so far from them; the Captains (I say) themselves began to quail in courage; and the rather, for that such relief as was sent from Venice, could not possibly be brought unto them, but that at Crete, the Turks Gallies still lying before Famagusta, so that nothing could in safety be brought thither. This fear of the Captains themselves could not long be hid, or dissembled, but that it was by the Citizens perceived; who having neither power to hold out the Siege, neither place left to sit upon, overcome with necessity, came flocking to the Governor, craving of him aid and comfort, and with abundance of tears besought him in this common desperation to take compassion on them, their Wives, and Children, who were daily exposed to well deserved of the Venetian State. Their Walls (they said) were beaten down, their Bulwarks overthrow, the few Soldiers that remained, spent with wounds, watching, and famine; the Enemies strength, encresing daily, so that they must needs in short time all perish with the Sword, if the City were by force taken; wherefore they besought him, that yielding to necessity, which no power was ever able to withstand, he would at the time they were served, provide for the safety of so faithful and kind a People, and not to refuse any conditions, how hard soever.

The requests and tears of the Citizens of Famagusta, with the due consideration of the desperate state of the City, moved Bragadinus to compassion, who comforting them in best sort he could, persuaded them to be of good cheer, for that he had care both of them and their State, and would so provide for them, as that they should never repent themselves of their Fidelity and Loyalty to the Venetian State. He in the mean time considering the greatness of the danger which presently hung over all their heads, propounded the matter in a general Council called together for the same purpose; wherein after a little debating of the matter, they all agreed to yield; only Balemus at the best dissenting, as doubtful of the Turks Faith; but afterwards yielding unto the opinion of the rest. An Herald being sent unto the Turks, that they were to have certain days to parley in, and Holdings on both sides given, during which time not much as a Dart was thrown, or an Arrow shot from either side. After a few days parley the conditions were agreed upon, whereupon the City should be

be yielded into the power of the Bassa, which were these: First, That the Inhabitants of the City yet alive, should in safety enjoy their Lives, Liberty, and Goods, with the free exercise of the Christian Religion; That the Governor with the rest of the Captains and Soldiers might in safety depart with Bag and Baggage, and their departure to take with them five great Pieces of Ordnance, and three Horfes, which sooner it should please them to make choice of, and that the Turks should safely conduct them into Crete, finding them both Victual and Shipping. All which things were with more kindness promised, than with fidelity performed. Yet all these matters agreed upon, and conceived into writing; as also by solemn Oath on both sides confirmed; the Governor sending a Messenger before, requested that he might have leave to come to see the Bassa, and to deliver unto him the Keys of the City. Leave being granted, Bragadinus the Governor, Balemus, Andreas Bragadinus, Laurentius Theopulus Earl of Paphos, Jo. Antonius Quirinus, Alysius Martinusque, with a great sort of other Captains came into the Camp; but before they entered into the Bassa's Pavilion, they were commanded to deliver their Weapons, which they all did. At the first meeting, Musiapha entertained them courteously, and with many glorious words, as if he had been in admiration, extolled their worthy valour and courage; saying, that he was glad now to know them by face; whose valiant minds he had before known by their most valiant deeds. Now prowess and valour seemed not only in safety, but also honoured of the Enemy. When after a long discourse the safe Bassa revolved upon the mischief and misery he had before the whole process upon; complaining that certain of his Men taken at the Siege, had been afterward against all reason and order slain. Which the Governor, contrary to his Oath and Promise, caused them all to be slain. At which time Bragadinus and Theopulus were oftentimes commanded to lay down their Heads, to have had them struck off; yet was this execution deferred, and their lives reserved, not to save them, but with more exquisite punishment and torture to satisfy the barbarous Cruelty of the faithless and unmerciful Tyrant. The next day after, Bragadinus having his Ears before cut off in despite, was brought forth to be wounded at, and tortured with the most extreme kind of Torture that Tyranny it self could have devised; for dispoiled of Jewels and Attire, and a Bashir laid upon his Shoulders filled with Earth, he was enforced oftentimes to carry the same, to repair the Rampiers that were overthrow; and ever as he passed by, the proud Bassa insulting upon him to fall down and to kiss the ground at his feet; and so battered with the Turks Fists, and purned as a Dog with their Feet, was in great derision and despite asked, Whether he hoped that Christ his God would come to help him or not? Which indignity of it self bitter and miserable, the dignity of the Man made much more miserable; whose comely and stately Countenance, with his long and reverend Beard, even in that extreme misery added unto him a certain Majesty and Grace. In this so foul a sight of verue rotten under foot, the poor Christians could neither well stay their ears, nor their eyes, for fear of the displeasure of the Turks. But the foremost Bassa, not only forgetful of all Humanity, but enraged rather with extreme Cruelty, caused that noble and worthy Bragadinus to be fet in a Chair, and his Skin to be flain off from him quick; a punishment unworthy of him that suffered it, but most worthy him that inflicted the same. Yet in so great and horrible a Torture he was not heard to let fall any word not befitting a faithful Christian and the honour of his Country; only he called upon God for mercy, and detested the Turks peridious Treachery, and so breathed out his life. But the Tyrant, worthy of eternal Infamy, not satisfied with the Torture of the living Man, caused the Head to be cut off from the dead Body, and upon the point of a Spear to be set up on a high place for all Men to look of upon. His Skin also stuffed with Chaff, he caused to be hanged up at the Yards-arm, and so to be carried about; not for thus a Trophy of his Victory, as a Testimony of his peridious and Turkish Cruelty. Two days after, Count Theopulus after he had been most shamefully entreated, full of the marks of the Turks Cruelty, was (to make an end withal) shamefully hanged in the Market-place. With what Cruelty the Bassa had tyrannized upon the Nobility, with the same he also raged upon the meaner sort of the Citizens, of whom some he slew, some he chained in the Gallies, and carried away the rest into Bondage. Three hundred Christians, some Soldiers, some Citizens, which came forth with the Governor to see the Turks Camp, were there also all slain. Nesfor Nestor Martinusque a famous Captain escaped the Tyrants hands, being hidden by one of the Bassa's Eunuchs, who by the help of a Greek Fiferman got to Lepis, and from thence to Crete, and so forth afterwards to Venice, where he faithfully reported Alysius Martinus the fate, the whole process of the War with the loss of the City; and that in the space of threecore and ten days there was above a hundred and forty thousand great Shot discharged against the City. Such Noblemen and Gentlemen as escaped out of this so general a slaughter, banished their Country; and in misery, dispersed without hope of return, led afterward a miserable and vagrant life, though some of them even at this day (as I have been credibly informed) are by the Venetian State right well maintained. The Country people and Artificers were generally by the Turks spared, for the peopling of the Country. This was the fatal ruin of Cyprus, one of the most fruitful and beautiful Islands of the Mediterranean; the loss whereof, not without cause, grieved many Christian Princes, as sometime a Kingdom of it self, but now a Province of the Turkish Empire, ruins, or by the evil agreement of Christian Princes, or by the cause thereof, I know not; neither if I did, durst I to say.

Whilst Musiapha yet lay at the Siege of Famagusta, the other two great Bassas, Parau and Haly, the one the Admiral, and the other General of the Soldiers (appointed by Selymus for the keeping of the Sea, that no relief should be sent by the Venetians to Famagusta), and further as occasion served to infect their Dominions about the middle of May arrived in Euboea with two hundred and thirty Gallies; whether Ulanas, Vice-roy of Algeria, with divers other ripe, Turks notable Pyrates, returned unto them with their Gallies; With this Fleet departing from Euboea, and falling alongst the Coast of Assia, Ionis, Caria, and so directly toward the Rhodes, they were met with thirty Gallies more of the Turks adventures. After that, having left certain Gallies for to lie before Famagusta, they directed their Course for the Coast of Crete, and the 13 of June put into with the Bay of Amphipolis, now called Suda, and there landed 12000 Men.

Alexander
Farnese
Prince of

quisimus (Don John his chief Counsellor; without whom he willingly did nothing, and without a Man of great valour and experience) speaking first, said, That the Enemies strength was necessarily to be known, before they committed all to the fortune of a Battel; and that therefore delay was to be used, lest imprudent haste overthrow all. Matters of War that were to be decided by the Sword, were (as he said) with great and found advice, to be admitted, for that the errors of Battel, whereby all was lost in hazard, were not to be again amended. He highly commended the advice of Scipio Africanus, who counselled great Commanders, not to fight with the Enemy but upon some great advantage, or else thereunto forced by necessity. But as things now stood, what opportunity could be mislaid, or advantage taken; the Enemy keeping himself close within the Bay of Corinth, and no apparent means how to draw him out from thence? Whether that he for his part was of so great spirit, as within the Harbor in place of disadvantage, without hope, to set upon an Enemy in common estimation stronger than himself; for what dishonour should they incur, if having received some notable loss, they should be enforced with shame to give over the enterprise begun? And to besiege Orizus, Durrachium, or Castellum Novum, frontier Towns of the Turks, so to draw them out to Battel; what were they other than to feed a certain fear and distrust in themselves, and to discourage the minds of the Souldiers? For as well the Enemy, as the common Souldier, would forthwith deem such a poor attempt to proceed of a meer fear, as to make a vain shew of something doing, when as they durst not encounter the Enemy in his full strength. As for the other reason drawn from necessity, what necessity had they, so desperately to fight upon the Enemy, who upon the approach of Winter must needs in short time lay up his Gallies; and being already in safe Harbor, would never be drawn to the hazard of a Battel, especially like hope, like strength, and like danger appearing on both sides? Wherefore, it were best (in his opinion) only to make a great shew of their Forces, so to terrify the barbarous Enemy, but in no case to hazard the hope of the whole Christian Commonwealth, upon the fortune of a Battel. He farther also propounded unto them, the uncertain events of things, the common chance of War, the strength of the Enemy, as well by Sea as by Land; with whom they themselves were not (as he said) indeed comparable; then, what an infinite heap of miseries was like to overwhelm the Christian Commonwealth; and that they should in any thing misadvise, and that therefore, safe advice was in this case to be preferred before that which was attended upon with greater danger.

On the other side, the Venetians, who thought all delay both infamous and dangerous to their State, were far of another opinion. Wherefore Venerius and Barbadiuc not only vehemently perswaded, but most instantly requested the General and the rest of the great Commanders, that so soon as opportunity forced, they would commit the matter to the trial of a Battel, and not to make that Council, which their courageous minds might make most glorious and fortunate, by declining of Battel to become dishonourable or frustrate. If desire of honour (said they) move us not, shall neither these things move us. The loss of so great and chargeable a preparation, the spoiling of our Frontiers, and the holocausty of our Enemies, which we increase by delay. We defend our selves and ours, we invade not them; we go not about to drive the Turk out of his Empire; but that we our selves be not by him driven out of our own Countreies. Wherefore we ought so much the more readily & speedily to think of Battel, by how much the necessity of him is greater that repulseth a danger, than of him that offereeth the same. What are our Weapons blunt, or our hands benumbed? Shall the Turks so often provoke us, and we still be unrevenged? Shall we always shew our Weapons, and never fight? One fortunate Battel is able to blot out the infamy of former time, and to fill us with the hope of future happiness; if nothing else, let the very indignity of the matter fit us up to Battel. Add what doubt is there, but that the Enemy dwelling with pride, will come forth with his Fleet, and give us Battel? Think you that a small difference will ensue to our honour and reputation, if contented with a vain brag, having not once skirmished with the Enemy, or so much as seen him, we shall return home, to the general shame of all Christendom? See how many tedious inconveniences will ensue, if we shall take this course. This manner of proceeding will fill all Mens minds with despair; the people will murmur. That they are to no purpose oppressed with exactions and tributes. The confederate Princes (careful of this War) will say, that they have in vain wearied themselves with often embassages and care thereof: The proud Enemy will account our departure, or declining of Battel, for a manifest Victory. The next year we may look for him again with a greater and a stronger Fleet, which will not only make a more heavy War, but destroy and bear down all before it; as which one, we may assure us that the Christians shall be like the preparation, if we shall now delay to fight? What labour is to be taken; what cost to be bestowed, to set forth again so great a Fleet? Unto these causes which impose upon us a necessity and force to fight, is adjoined not only a singular regard of our honour, but a most notable opportunity also offered; we never had a greater Fleet, nor better furnished with Men, Munition; and all things else to be required for the gaining of a notable Victory; and who knoweth not, that the Christian Gallies are far stronger than the Turks? Besides that, the greatest part of their best Souldiers are in hope of prey gon into Cyprus, who there seeking after the spoil, and forgetful of the Enemy, without controulment glit themselves with the pleasures of that rich Island; whereby their Fleet is so much the weaker. All which things, as they promise but the Prince, so do they propound unto us Honour, Glory, Fame, and most honourable Rewards; and open unto us the way both for the defence of the present, and recovery of that hath been before lost. What then stand we still looking for? Or why do we not in Gods Name joyne that Battel, which is unto us, not only necessary, but profitable also?

Thus much said, they began to entreat and beseech the General, and the rest, not long to suffer the Christian Commonwealth to receive loss upon loss, but to repose their only hope in the good success of one worthy Battel, and never to look for the like opportunity, if they let slip the present. This matter of so great consequence, thus thoroughly debated amongst the greatest Commanders, they thought it good to hear also the opinions of other notable Captains, of no less experience than themselves, in the Fleet; and so the whole assembly would conclude any thing. Amongst the rest, Antonius Cornus, and Gabriel Sordello, both Spaniards, and for their great wisdom and valour

Cornus, Sordello and Selymus the Second, were placed about a mile before the middle of each Wing, and the other two before the middle Battel, so far distant one from another, as that with equal facility they answered the whole breadth valour had in general reputation of all Mens being demanded their opinions, with most substantial reasons, declared the necessity of giving Battel, and that it was not so dangerous, as to be therefore flunured or delayed; forasmuch as that violent Enemy was far easier to be dealt with, all at Sea than by Land; where he must fight without his high multitude of Men, the Turks chief hope, and only means whereby they have obtained so many Victories against the Christians. And so concluded their opinions, with an effectual perswasion to set forward to Corcyra, and without delay as occasion served to give the Enemy Battel. Which their opinion being generally well liked, was shortly after by the General and the rest approved, and a resolution set down for the giving of Battel; which was no sooner known, but there was general rejoicing through the Army, every Man cheerfully preparing himself to lay down his life in the publick defence of the Christian Commonwealth, and that with such an earnest desire of Battel, that every day seemed now nothing all, but a delay of a most assured Victory.

Yet before they should come into the fight of the Enemy, the three Admirals thought it good to bring forth the Fleet into the Sea, and there to martial the same, in such sort, as if they should even then presently have joyned Battel; to the intent, that by such orderly disposing of their Fleet, and by appointing unto every Man his place he was to keep, they might to acquaint them with the order of the Battel, as that they should, when time forced of themselves without further direction, martial themselves, and so more readily enter into Battel. The next day the Admirals brought forth their Fleets into the open Sea; in the right Wing (which consisted of three and fifty Gallies) was Auria placed; in the left Wing was Augustinus Barbadiuc with the like number of Gallies also; And in the middle Battel stood the General with twenty Gallies. On the right hand of the General stood Columinus, and on the left Venerius, his Associates. Thus with equal front the Fleet set forward, as if they should even presently have joyned Battel. Betwixt the Wings and the middle Battel, was left no more space but for three Gallies to row; In the Rearward behind the General, followed Requisimus, the great Commander of Castile, with his Gallies; after Columinus followed the Admiral Gally of Genoa, wherein was Alexander Farnesius Prince of Parma, and behind Venerius came the Admiral Gally of Savoy, and in her the Prince of Urbino; in the space betwixt the middle Battel and the left Wing, was placed Paulus Fardanus; and betwixt the middle Battel and the right Wing, was Petrus Juslinianus with the Gallies of Malta; Upon the left Wing attended Antonius Camalis and Quirinus on the right. About half a mile behind all the rest, followed Alvarus Baciarius Marquis of Sanoracy and Admiral of the Neapolitan Fleet, with thirty Gallies; a Man of great experience in matters at Sea; and now placed, to be at all times ready to relieve this or that part of the Fleet, as the fortune of the Battel, or impression of the Enemy should require. The Christians had reposed great hope in six Galeasses, which furnished with great stores of Ordnance and certain select Companies of most resolute Souldiers, seemed rather like Castles than Ships. These Galeasses conducted by Franciscus Dada a most expert Captain, were placed about a mile before the Fleet; two of them before the right Wing, and the other two before the middle Battel; so far distant one from another, as that with equal facility they answered the whole breadth of the front of the Fleet, which was almost the space of five miles, and served the same in stead of most strong Bulwarks. The Gallies throughout the Fleet kept not close together, but such a convenient distance one from another, as might serve for them at liberty to discharge their Ordnance when time should require. In the Wings, as also in the main Battel, were the Popes, the Kings, and the Venetian Gallies indifferently intermixed; that by the equality of the danger they should have move care to relieve one another, than if they had parted apart. Joannes Cardinus, a most valiant Captain, with eight Gallies of Sicily and two Gallions, was appointed to go miles before the Fleet to defy what he might, of the Enemies doings, and in his return to join the one half of his Gallies to the one Wing, and the other half to the other.

In this sort they departed from Adriana, with purpose to seek out the Enemy; and not long after came to Passo, where, of a small broil at the first, was like to have risen a great mischief; for the next day, whilst Don John staid there to take a view of the Venetian Gallies, and how they were furnished both of Men and Munition, he finding them but weakly manned, for supplying of that want, appointed four thousand Spaniards, and a thousand Italians to be put aboard into the Venetian Gallies, where most need was.

Amongst these Souldiers, was one Company under the command of Mutius Tortosa their Captain, a Man of an unquiet and furious Nature; who going aboard the Gally of Andreas Celer Gally, and after the first shot begun, so that in a trice they were altogether by the Ears, as well the Souldiers as the Captains; of all which stir, Mutius was the only author. Venerius being not far off, and hearing of the matter, sent the Captain of his own Gally to appease the tumult, who thrusting himself into the midst of the furious multitude, was by Mutius in his fury cruelly entreated, and divers of them that came with him shrewdly beaten. Which thing Venerius (himself also of an hot nature) taking as done in disgrace of the Venetians, and therewith exceedingly moved; to the terror of others, caused Mutius and his Ensign-bearer to be hanged up at the Yards-arm of the same Gally, to the great offence of all the Spaniards. The General also taking this execution in evil part, full of choler and indignation, grievously complained, That he himself as General, was therein not a little wronged; and that it became every Commander, to know what belonged to his place, and not to encroach upon his betters; so should the conditions of the League be the better kept, if every Commander could keep himself within the bounds of his own Authority. Venerius he said, (whose authority was inferior unto his) could not of right without his command determine any thing against Mutius a Spanish Captain; And that therein his honour was impaired; for which if he had not a publick and honourable amends, wronged, and by force of Arms to redress his wrong, and the League better looked, to carry away with him the Kings Gallies. Neither would there some, who favouring Don John's quarrel, and angry with the Venetians, laid fire upon the Coals on the fire that was already too great. Hereunto Venerius sent word unto the General, That he should do well to moderate his anger, and at leisure to advise himself, and better to understand the matter; so should he plainly see, that there was never more just or wholesome execution done upon any, than upon those mutinous tinuous persons : But if he, carried away with the heat of youth, should attempt any more violent course than flood with the common quiet, it were not to be marvelled if he afterward repented. He (as he said) was also in Arms, and ready to flem himself a Man. The matter was grown to that heat, that it was not only not far from the breaking off of the League; but even at the point to have fell on a brawl, and to have put the whole Fleet in danger; had not the Venetian Admiral, against this Tempest opposed himself; he with all his power laboured to cure the wounded mind of the General, and to appease his anger; telling him, That the common Enemy would hardly be withstood by them all, being at unity and concord amongst themselves; but if unto the foreign danger were also joyned domestical Difcord, then were the Christian Common-wealth undone. But if he would moderate his anger, and more regard the honour and credit of the Venetian Admiral, than the punishment of a felicitous Man, even they which were unto him Friends, and Enemies unto the Venetians, would highly commend his moderation and staynedness; yea, that howsoever the matter was done, it could not be now undone. But whatsoever Venerius had done, was in his opinion justly done: That it was always so accounted and observed, that when many Princes joyned their Forces together in matters that concerned the common managing of the War, nothing was to be done, without the command of the General; but in matters belonging to the private Government of every Mans Regiment, every General had power of life and death over them that were under his command; which to be so, was as he said hereby to be understood. King Philip was King of many Kingdoms, and that he might long to be, he heartily wished now at a time, that he had committed any capital Crime worthy death in the Kingdom of Naples, should the judgment of that crime be of right to be referred unto the King himself, as the chief Sovereign? Or unto the Governor of Mallain, where the offender was born? Or rather to the civil Magistrate of Naples, in whose jurisdiction the fault was committed, and so of right there to be executed? What difference was there then, but that Martin might rightly seem to have been justly punished by Venerius, who although he were a Spanish Captain, had yet raised a Mutiny in a Venetian Gally, which was under the command of the Venetian Admiral? Beside that, the discipline of War sometime required a severe and exemplary kind of punishment: For which cause it was both notably and truly said of Clarence, that a General ought to be more feared of his Soldiers, than the Enemy; and that amongst the ancient Romans it had been the custom, even for private Men with more severe punishment to restrain the factious Citizen, than the most cruel Enemy: That the fact was not so much to be regarded, as the intention of him that did it: That it was the duty of Commanders to withstand the madness of the mutinous. The author of sedition and tumult he said had suffered but condign punishment to his fact; who if he had escaped unpunished, would have been the more disordered; but now by his exemplary punishment, would deter others from the like infolency. Besides that, the external danger was such, as ought to reconcile them, were they never so much Enemies: That such Men as they were, should above all things regard what might profit or hurt the common cause; in contemplation whereof all private injuries were to be remitted; and the rather, for that the honour and dishonour of the good or bad success of such an important action, should redound unto themselves, but especially unto the General. His own duty he had as he said discharged, in dealing so plainly and faithfully with him, and could no more, but pray unto God, with meritorious eye to behold the troubled Christian Common-wealth in such a most dangerous time.

Thus was the mutiny at Paxo by the great labour of Columinus hardly appeased: Nevertheless Don John could not afterwards, endure to participate unto Venerius his Counsels, or so much as to come in his company; all was done by Barbadiensis the Venetian Provveditor. This Barbadiensis was not inferior to Venerius in courage and valour, but far beyond him in discretion; a tall and goodly personage, well coloured, his beard grizly, though not for age, for why he was not above fifty years old: Beside that, in his eyes and countenance appeared a vivacity or liveliness of spirit; in his very gate and comely motion of his body, he carried a certain grace and majesty: His talk and speech was always calm and temperate, his counsel grave and sound; so that he was both greatly honoured and beloved of all Men. His chief endeavor also was, to further the hope of atonement betwixt, the Spaniards and the Venetians, so well begun by Columinus. And so all things brought unto some reasonable terms, they departed from Paxo, and came to Coryra; the spoil whereof well declared the Enemies late being there. From thence they departed to Cephalonia; where they by Letters from Pan Constantinus, Governor of Zacynthus, were advertised, That the Turks Fleet of three hundred Gallies, that three and thirty Sail, of one sort and other, lay in the Gulf of Cornith, now called the Gulf of Lepanto. Whereupon they shortly after removed, with purpose to have gone to Petelia, an Haven opposite over against the Islands (or rather Rocks) called Eubodades, but now Corsu-lares, and so to the Bay of Cornith, to draw the Enemy forth to Battle; but staied with contrary Winds, they put back again into the Valley of Alexandria, another Port in the Island of Cephalonia; from whence they afterward departed to the Islands Corsu-lares, where by the way they understood by Letters out of Crete, that Emanagula was lost; with which bad news they were no whit discouraged, but rather enflamed with the desire of revenge. From the Islands they went to Galanga, a good Harbor, where they staied one night, purposing the next day to have gone to the mouth of the Gulf of Lepanto, there to dare the Turks to battle.

The Turks Baffes Pertau and Haly, who then lay in good safety within the Gulf, hearing of the approach of the Christian Fleet, began to consult with the rest of their most expert Captains, Whether to give the Christians Battle, or to keep themselves still within their safe Harbor; upon which doubt they were amongst themselves of divers opinions. Amongst the rest Chiroche a Man of great years and authority, and withal a most noble Captain, exhorted the Baffes, in no case, when no need was, upon a vain glory, to adventure all to the fortune of an uncertain Battle: it was (as he said) the part of wife and worthy Commanders, to moderate with reason their happy fortunes, for that thereunto were incident many accidents, whereby their former felicity might be destroyed; they had ready run along the Frontiers of his Countries, and were with much honour and great spoil in safety returned, having increased the Turkish Empire with many strong strong Towns of the Enemies; the Island of Cyprus was with wonderful good fortune brought under the Turks obedience, the Enemies great provision at Sea frustrated in such sort, as that having lost divers of their Gallies, they were never yet able to draw their Swords; they had with their Fleet at their pleasure roamed up and down the Adriatick, and displayed their victorious Ensigns almost unto the very City of Venice. What could they then devise or wish for more honourable or glorious, than with the safety of their Fleet, yet without any loss at all, to have performed to great matters? Now these three general Commanders of the Enemies Fleet to be at discord amongst themselves, as that they were ready to fall in funder of themselves; who now upon the approach of Winter, and for want of Victual, must needs in few days return home with their Fleet, never after to meet again with the like strength at Sea; and therefore to what purpose were it, by force of Arms and uncertain Battle, with danger to seek for the sovereignty and command of the Sea, which would forthwith of it self without any danger fall unto them. Neither should they by the doubtful Victory so much encroach their Honour, as by the uncertain event of a Battle blench the fame, if any thing should fall out otherwise than well. And that therefore they should do well to take heed, that in seeking to augment their former Victories, they hazarded not their Honour already gained; but wisely delay the War, and keep themselves in safety within their Fleet within the Gulf, and not to go out at the Enemies pleasure, but when they should see good themselves, at such time as the Enemy was not so well provided; so should they (as he said) without any great labour or danger attain to the full of their own desires.

Pertau Bassa was of opinion, That the Christians should not offer him Battle; but in his opinion the Christians had also of him, and in this question, for giving or not giving of Battle, seemed neither to approve nor dislike that Chiroche had so gravely spoken, but as a Man indifferent and loath to incur any blame, shewed himself ready either to stay or to set forward, as should be thought best by the greatest part. But Haly Bassa, a Man of an hotter spirit, and the great Champion of the Turks, could not endure to hear of any delay, but of present Battle. The pleasure of Selymus, the hope of Victory, the remembrance of the displeasure Pial Bassa had the last year incurred, for not giving the Christians Battle, ended him now in no case to refuse Battle, but forthwith to go out of the Gulf, and to accept thereof, if it were offered. In which his opinion he was the more confirmed by the relation of Caracossa a famous Pyrat, and of great account amongst the Turks; who in a swift Galliot taking view of the Christian Fleet, had reported it to be much less than indeed it was; deceived as was afterward thought, by not taking full view thereof, by reason of his posting haffe; or else blinded by the Island, which lying behind the Fleet, suffered him not perfectly to descry the same. Upon which report there was great rejoicing amongst the Turks, who now after their accustomed manner dreamed of nothing but Victory and Spoil. So that Haly, vainly persuaded that his Fleet was both the greater and stronger, would now needs fight, in hope that the Christians upon first sight of the Turks Fleet would either retire and save themselves by shameful flight; or else in adventuring Battle at so great odds, by their foolish hardiness, receive a notable overthrow. This opinion of the Bassa was also not a little confirmed by the persuasion of Callensis, Barbarulla his Son, Ulusala, and Chaw-Beg, Governor of Smyrna, all Men of great mark and experience, especially in matters at Sea. And although Pertau the chief Bassa stood wavering as a Man in doubt, and Chiroche Governor of Alexandria, with Caracossa Governor of Silicia, and Mechmet Governor of Euboea, Men of no less worth than the other, upon better consideration, were of a quite contrary mind, for not giving the Christians Battle; yet such was the authority of Haly, or rather his opportunity, forced to his own Destiny, that his opinion prevailed; so that now out they needs must, and fight. Albeit that two other Espials sent out after Caracossa, and having more perfectly viewed the Fleet, returning with speed, told the Basses, as truth was, That the Christians very strong and well appointed, were coming with Ensigns displayed of purpose to fight; and that their Fleet was in number much greater than was before supposed. With which news so far contrary to their expectation, the Basses were exceedingly troubled; and demanding whether the former Gallies were all Venetians or not; and being answered, that they were intermixt, some Venetians, some Spanish, and of the other Western Countries; they began to doubt the world, and became exceeding pensive. Nevertheless knowing themselves to be of all things well furnished, having now victualled in the Bay of Cornith, and already taken in twelve thousand Janizaries and Spahies, drawn out of the Garrisons of Aetolia, Acarnania, Peloponnesus, and the other Countries thereof, all resolute Men, and four thousand other common Soldiers, and that they could not now with their honour shrink back, they held it still for the best, to hold on their former resolution for the giving of the Christians Battle. Yet before their setting forward, together the Captains and chief Commanders of the Fleet, Pertau the more to encourage them, spake unto them as followeth.

We are to fight (said he) Fellows in Arms, with Pertau that kind of Men whom our Ancestors have driven hence out of Euboea, the Rhodes, Mitylene, Peloponnesus, and Tripolis, and we our selves but yesterday out of the famous Island of Cyprus; whose Cities and strong Towns, in number infinite, our Emperor hath, as rewards of his Wars, given unto us; and now he is vanquished as well by Sea as by Land, and shall it then now repent you, that you in the War, embred in the Christian Blood, have sunk or taken many of their Ships and Gallies? That you have carried away great and rich Spoils? That you have taken whole Islands and Cities at the first assault? That we have by proof shewed unto the World what force is in the Turk to subdue strong Cities and Towns? And what little power is in the Christians to defend the same? What direction brought us to Victory before, the same shall also at this present give us the like. Not to speak of that, that we far exceed them both in number of Men and Gallies, this is more to be reckoned of; that we excel them in Valour and Prowess; for you being old expert Soldiers, from your infancy trained up in the Wars, hardened in infinite Battle, and full of courage and strength, shall fight against weak, fresh-water, and unexperienced Soldiers; who entertained for pay (the wages of all Nations) know nothing belonging to the Wars; or forcibly pressed out of Cities, serve not because they would, but because they must neither will nor chuse. But not to speak more of the manner of the Christian Soldiers, who are nothing else than the perpetual exercise of your remembrance and prowess; and to come re-to him, under whose fortune and conduct they serve. What should I say? Should I compare either of us (who have spent our Lives in Victories and Triumphs) who born and brought up amongst Arms, have with our right hands gained unto our selves Honour and Fame) with the feeble and half months Captain, who never saw Battle, but the? Who in a glorious matter never showed proof of himself, why should he be accounted of in a greater? who in so weighty a cause deemed a Tutor and such a one, as indeed beareth the Name of a General, more for his honour, than for any worth in himself. Besides, amongst the Enemies is such diffidence, that every Man regards his own private, (forgetting himself, contemptible, and is compassed. Whence with us (such comfort, that it cannot be denied, how the Soldiers in general should more trust their Commanders, or the Commanders their Soldiers. What things were by the discipline of War or carefulness of a General to be prepared, all those you have abundantly and plentifully in readiness; only this last warlike labour remains; which once dispatched, our Enemies shall be discomfited even in that wherein their greatest confidence rests. They shall be dispossessed of their Honour and Traffic at Sea; and that once finished, which is alone the glory of the Sea, there shall be no hope left for the Christians, whether by Sea or Land; and (that we have always wished) Italy, fair Italy (wherein these matters are plotted against us) shall be in our hand and power; wherefore let us with (such courage) all our Enemies, as becometh most victorious Conquerors, Men so many times conquered; And so set forward, as if you saw our Emperor himself encouraging you, and giving you the signal of Battle's his bounty, and the present victory, expecting all felicity and bliss.

This comfortable Speech with great gravity delivered by the Bassa, fo encouraged the Turks, as that they all with one voice and mind seemed to desire nothing more than Battle; for they still possessed with the first report of Caracenia, and encouraged by the Bassa's Speech, were in good hope to have fought the Battle upon great advantage, and therefore thought upon nothing but present Victory. Whereupon setting forward with great cheerfulness, they came out of the Gulf, and shaped their Course for the Islands Echinades, about midway betwixt Lepanto and Parmas, before little Islands, or rather obscure Rocks, scarcely appearing in the Sea, but new to be made famous throughout the World, by a most notable Battle that ever was fought in those Seas.

The Christians also coming fill on towards the Enemy, the seventh of October in the afternoon underfoot by their Espials, that the Turks Fleet was coming, and even now at hand; whereupon the General commanded the great Ensign of the Confederates (the appointed signal of Battle) to be forthwith displayed, and a great warning Piece to be shot off out of his Admiral Gally. And himself glittering all in bright Armour, with Cardona Admiral of Sicily, and Soro his Secretary, in a long Boat went to all the Squadrons of the Fleet one after another, exhorting them with cheerful countenance to follow their Leaders, and to play the Men remembering, that they that day carried in their hands the Wealth, Honour, Glory, and Liberty of their Countries, yea and the very Religion of their Forefathers; and that that day's Victory would bring unto them and theirs perpetual Felicity; whereas otherwise, if they should as Cowards suffer themselves to be overcome and vanquished, it would be unto them the beginning of all manner of most woful calamities. To which

and other like his Speeches, the Captains and Soldiers (before of themselves cheerful enough) in every place where he came gave forth applause with the joyful cry of Victory, Victory, so often and so cheerful in all places resounded, as it was taken as a lucky abatement of the glorious Victory shortly after ensuing. In like manner Auria in the right Wing, and Barbacus in the left (for the Fleet kept the same order that they had appointed before at Missina) ceased not by all comfortable Speeches to encourage their Followers; shewing unto them. That now the time was come that he long wished for, wherein they not oppressed with multitude, might at length shew their true Valour against the false and faithless Enemies; who being indeed nothing else but base and contemptible Slaves born to bondage, and having lost their own liberty, came to impugn the liberty of others; bringing with them a greater terror of their name, than valour of their persons; and that therefore, if ever, they would now show themselves valiant and courageous, and that day, wherein of all others true force was to be seen, to abate the pride of the barbarous and cruel Enemy, and to make their rejoicing for the Conquest of Cyprus broke, before they had well tasted the pleasure thereof. At which time also, the Captains generally throughout the Fleet, with cheerful countenances and courageous speech encouraged their Soldiers; leaving nothing unfaid that might hearten them on; or undone, that might further the Victory.

Neither were the Turks wanting to themselves (although it was fallen out much contrary to their expectation, to see the Christians, who they before thought durst not have shewed themselves, now ready to dare them Battle) but encouraged with their former Victories, and furthered with a fair gale of Wind, came on proudly with their Fleet orderly and gallantly, after their wonted manner of form of a Crescent or half Moon, their fortunate Ensign; nevertheless in their coming on they were much troubled with the brightness of the Sun, which then shining full in their faces, with his bright beams fo dazzled their eyes, that they could not well see how to their most advantage to direct their Gallies. In this Fleet of the Turks were two hundred and fifty Gallies, fifty Gallies, and many Brigantines and small Vessels; all which in a far off shewed like a thick Wood, but coming near hand, presented (as we said) the form of a Crescent. The middle Battle in number much like the Christians, was conducted by the great Bassias Haly and Parvus, attended upon with Agem Master of the Turks Arsenal, Adapha Zelly the Treasurer, Achmar Bay, with Makomet his younger Brother, the Sons of Haly, Achmar Agay Governor of Tzaburina, Affli Caga Governor of Calipolia, Caracenia, Calates the Son of Barbarus, Makomet Governor of Mitylene, Dely Solyman Gider Captain of Chios, Caf Sambrus Governor of the Rhodes; Provi Agay Captain of Nauplium; Giaper Zelly President of Calabra; Dordagnan, Dondomeni, and many others, whose barbarous Names I purposely omit; all Men of great account and place, and for their experience at Sea the chief strength of the Turkish Empire. The right Wing was by the appointment of the Bassias commanded by Makomet Bay with fifty six Gallies; with whom were also many worthy Captains; and in the left Wing was Ulualei the old Arch-Pyrate, but now the Vice-Roy of Algiers; with ninety five Gallies; accompanied with Caraculo and Araby his two sons, with a multitude of Pyrates. profession, but most valiant and expert Souldiers. In the Rearward came Adonates Dragute, with thirty Gallies, and divers other small Vessels. Now was the day well spent, when both the Fleets were ready to give Battle; the Enemy fill coming on almost in same fame order that the Christians did; for their middle Battle came directly against our middle Battle, and their Wings against ours. So the signal of Battle on both sides given by the shooting off of certain great Pieces. The Turks after their manner coming on with an hideous cry, first light upon the six Galeasses, which lying at Anchor almost a mile before the Fleet, as most strong Bulwarks, out of their Fore-Castles poured out their murdering Shot upon the Turks, now come within their danger; and in their passing by fo plagued them, by discharging their whole Broad-sides, first the one, and afterwards the other upon them, that having received great loss, and divers of their Gallies sunk, they were enforced to break their order, and to fall further off. Which fo much the more troubled the Turks, for that they had before supposed, those great Carts and unferviceable Ships (as they accounted of them) to have carried little or no great Ordnance upon their sides, after the manner of their Gallies; for the use of the Galeasses was not unto the Turks known, until now that they had received from them a most notable harm; which as it was the beginning of their misery, so was it unto the Christians of greatest importance for the gaining of the Victory. At which time also the Wind, which all that day had much favoured the Turks, was now (God no doubt fighting his own Battle) come about to the West, and with a pleasant Gale in the time of the fight carried the smoke of the great Ordnance upon the Turks, to their no small disadvantage. Yet, for all this loss and disorder in their Fleet, the fierce Enemy with wonderful pertinacity passing by these Galeasses, quickly repaired again to their places, and made good their disordered Squadrons, and with all their force assailed the Christian Fleet. The Trumpets, Drums, and other Instruments of War had scarcely well sounded, when all shook with confused cries, flames of Fire, thundering of Artillery, and other noise of the Mariners and Seamen; wherewith many were fo astonished as if they had been both deaf and blind, having upon the sudden almost lost the eye both of their hearing and hearing. At which very instant a Man might have seen the whole flowers as it were of Arrows and Darts mixt with the deadly Shot, flying from the one Fleet to the other; the Masts broken, the Sail-yards trucked down, the Tackles rent, and all confounded with horror and fear. Haly beholding the Admiral Gally (which was easy to be known by the Flag) and using the surpassing cheerfulness of his Mariners and Rowers, ran upon her with such violence as if he would have presently flamed her; but being with like force encountered by the Admiral, they met together with such violence, that both their Beaks were with the Feaze broken off, and fo fell into the Sea. There began a most cruel fight betwixt these two great Commanders, who had before drawn unto them the strongest Gallies in their Fleets, and the choicest Men in their Armies. In the Admiral Gally of the Christians were four hundred select Men pickt out of the whole Army, most of them Captains and Antients, Men of approved Valour; who not only valiantly repelled the furious Enemies, but with greater courage enforced them to think back, and pressing hard upon them, entered the Gally even to the main Mast; where the Enemy strengthened with new supply, fought courageously, repulsed the Spaniards, and cleared again their Gally. Many were there wounded on both sides, and many slain. Don Juan seeing his Men give way, sent in new supply; wherewith the Christians encouraged, befriended themselves more lustily than before, and hardly charge the Turks, who with like hope and like courage encounter them. The Battle was like unto the ebbing and flowing of the Sea; thrice the Turks were even driven unto the main Mast, and thrice strengthened with new supplies, which they with great slaughter repulsed the Christians back again.

Venerius perceiving the danger of the General, was about to have assailed the Poup of Haly his Gally, fo to have endangered her, being set upon both before and abaft; but in coming thither he was encountered by Parvus the other Bassa, who with a Company of Gallies opposed himself against him, and that with such celerity, that having made them as if he would have charged him abroad, he by and by set upon his side. Which unexpected manner of fight fo suddenly fashioned, at the first much troubled the Christians; who afterward gathering courage, notably defended themselves. Venerius (upon whose Valour the Venetian State rested) gallantly armed, not only encouraged his Men, one while with entreating, another while with threatening, was himself in the midst of them fighting, whose great Honour much moved the minds of his Soldiers; but his severend years more, to see him (being above seventy seven years old) to perform all the parts of a brave youthful Commander, in the very face of the greatest danger. The fierce Enemy having slain many of the Christians, pressed on more furiously, and fighting close together, entered the Prow of Venerius his Gally now bared of Defendants, and with their multitude rather than true valour opposed the Venetians; who had there no doubt been overcome, had not Joannes, Laurentius, and Catherinus Malipetra, two valiant Captains, and lying not far off, speedily come to their relief. By whose coming in, the fight was in the turning of an hand quite altered; fo that they which a little before fiercely assailed the Venetian Gallies, were now glad to defend their own; fo for a space the fight stood indifferently, but in process of the Battle, those two worthy Captains, whilst they also perform the parts of most resolute Soldiers, were both slain; shot through with small shot. The fall of these notable Men did rather enrage than discourage the minds of their Soldiers; fo that blinded as it were with fury, and suddenly become other Men, they desperately pressed in upon the Turks; fo that whilst they on the one side kill and wound them, and Venerius more hardly clungeth them on the other's terror of the Battle was turned from them that were even at the point to have been vanquished, upon the Victors; and our Men after great slaughter of the Turks, took two of their Gallies; Parvus the Bassa in a long Boat escaped the danger, and fo got him out of the Battle. Not far off thence, Columinus the Popes Admiral, as a valiant Chieftain hardly assailed other of the Turks Gallies, and made amongst them great slaughter; one singled from the rest, he took, and disordered the other. Lignius the Admiral of Genoa with like courage thrust himself into the thickest of the Enemies, and there made a notable fight. Many an Enemy fell about the Prince of Parma, Ruvers, Urfimus, Cornes, and Tullianus; who for their present honour, and future fame, fought most courageously.

Atterrible fight betwixt Chiroche and Barbadiuc.

The death of Barbadiuc.

Ciconia hardly hit, and in danger to have been lost, is relieved.

At which time Chiroche or Sirock (of some called Mahomet Bey) with his right Wing with great confidence came forward against the left Wing of the Christian Fleet; but falling before he was aware into the danger of the Galeaffs, was forced out of them miserably beaten with many of his Men slain, and the Ordinance having done with many of his Gallies sunk and torn, few of the huge and deadly Shock falling in vain into the Sea, by reason of the thick standing of the Turks Gallies; where also divers of the Enemies were burnt with Pots of Wild-fire cast into their Gallies out of the tops of the Galeaffs. Chiroche to avoid the danger of the Galeaffs, and the Main the dangerous Shelf bewixt him and the Main (which the River Archielus running between the Borders of Acarnania and Ætolia, and there falling into the Sea, maketh) sent a great part of his Gallies under the conduct of one Alis a notable Renegade of Genoa, to cast about aloof upon the right hand, and so to come upon the back of Barbadiuc the Leader of the left Wing of the Christian Fleet. Which he perceiving, forthwith turned his Gallies, and with their Prows received the first onset. The great Ordinance fired on both sides discharged, divers of the Gallies grappled fast together, in such fort, as that they encountered one another not with their mislived Weapons, only (as with their small Shot, Arrows, and Darts) but with their drawn Swords foot to foot. Amongst the rest, the fight of two of the Christian Gallies was most notable: in the one was Barbadiuc himself, in the other Marcus Ciconia, upon whom the six of the Enemies Gallies, and upon Barbadiuc five; who although they were on every side distressed with a most doubtful and dangerous fight, yet did they most valiantly with worthy resolution endure the same. In the fury of this Battle, Barbadiuc encouraging his Soldiers, and fighting himself even there where most danger was, was hit in his left Eye with an Arrow, and so struck into the Brain almost through the Head; wherewith falling presently down, he was taken up for dead; howbeit he died not thereof until three days after. The supposed death of this worthy Man much troubled the Christians, and both the Armies felt his fall (such force there is in the valour of one worthy Man) for the Turks now as Conquerors lustily bordered the Gally, troubled with the loss of the Captain; and the Gallies as Men discouraged gave way; the Gally that was doubtfully been lost, had not Fredericus Nanius and Selymus Porcia with their Gallies speedily come to her relief; by whose coming in, such an alteration was made, as that the Gally before half taken, was not only cleared, but divers of the Turks Gallies also boarded, and some of them taken, not without the great slaughter of the Turks. In this so hard and mortal conflict, Selymus was grievously wounded in the thigh and in his right side. It is reported of Barbadiuc, That lying that evening at the point of death, the Battle then ended, he like another Epaminondas, asked which part had got the Victory; and being told that the Christians had got it, and that the Turks Fleet was most part taken, and the rest sunk or burnt; he with his eyes cast up to Heaven, gave unto God immortal thanks therefor, and not long after joyfully departed this life, to live in Bliss for ever.

Ciconia in the mean time hardly beset with six of the Enemies Gallies, (as we have before said) was himself fore burnt with Wild-fire and hurt in the face; and having endured a long and terrible fight, was now even at the point to have been lost; when suddenly relief coming in,

he was now contrary to all hope faved, and therewith so much encouraged, that with his weary and wounded Shoulders, as Men from death revived, he afresh charged the Enemy, and took one of his principal Gallies with one of the Turks fairest Ensigns, which in the Venetian Armory is yet there to be seen; of his worthy valour, his honest wounds in his face and the fore part of his Body, were most certain and undoubted witnesses.

Not far off, in the fame Wing Joannes Contarenus an honourable and valiant Gentleman, did with his great Shor exceeding great harm amongst the Turks Gallies; which Chiroche perceiving, and therewith enraged, ran so fiercely upon the side of Contarenus his Gally, that with his Beak he had well nigh flemmed her, and presently grappling fast with her, was like to have boarded her; who nevertheless the Christians notably repulsed, with greater slaughter than was thought possible for so small a number to have made; neither did the Enemies fall unrevenged, but all imbrued with the Blood of the Christians. Seldom hath been seen a more cruel fight, or more resolute Captains to encounter hand to hand. But after the Battle had of long time stood doubtful, the hope of the Christians increased upon two causes, for which the courage of the Enemy quailed; First for that many of the Turks being slain or wounded, they were brought to a small number. Then for that both parties saw Chiroche himself slain; from which time the Enemy, as well destitute of a Leader to conduct them, as of fresh supplies to relieve them, began to be cut down right, or taken. Which their danger was the more increased, because the Gally bulged with the great Shor, was now leaky, and in danger to sink; wherefore the Turks in that Wing overcome with despair, began to think rather how to save themselves by flight than by fight, resolving in so doing more than in the narrowness of the Main. But as they were turning about toward the Shor, they were prevented by the Christians; who entering the Gally, and having slain or driven overboard almost all that were left, took Chiroche, yet breathing, but half dead; and seeing small hope of his life, with fresh wounds made an end of him.

Divers and doubtful was the whole face of the Battle, as fortune offered unto every Man his Enemy, fo he fought; according as every Mans disposition put into him courage or fear, or as he met with more or fewer Enemies, so was there and there sometime Victory, and sometime loss. Many fights were in sundry places seen mingled together; some Gallies whilens they run to them others, are themselves by others flemmed; some, which you would think were flying away, being by fortune upon the victorious Gally; other, suddenly take them; other, some, as if they had been of neither part, row up and down betwixt the Battels. The chance of War in one place lieth up the vanquished, and in another overthroweth the victorious; all was full of terror, error, sorrow, and confusion. And albeit that fortune had not yet determined which way to incline, yet the Christians at length began to appear much fatter than both courage and strength; and the Turks seemed now rather to defend themselves, than to assail their Enemies.

Bacianus in the Reward intently marked all the whole fight, and ever as need required, sent in present aid, without respect whether they were the Popes Gallies, the King of Spain, or the Venetians, that were distressed. In this long and terrible fight it chanced, that the Turks seeing the Christians Generals Gally hardly charged on the Prow by Haly Bassa, to be almost bared of Defendants in the Poup, all the Soldiers having their hands full before, were about to have boarded her aback, and to that purpose were fetching a compass about her; which Bacianus quickly perceiving, glittering in bright Armor came speedily in with certain Gallies, and by opposing of himself against them, staid their course. In all the Battle was not seen a more cruel fight; for having discharged many volleys of Shot, and Arrows and Darts without number, they grappled at length together, and came to the Sword, where with the formid, Bacianus not only with his words, but with his presence and valour wonderfully encouraged his Soldiers, having received in his Target of proof two small Shot. Many were on both sides slain. The Spaniards attempting sundry times to have entered the Turks Gallies, were with great loss repulsed; but not giving it to over, neither giving the Enemy leave to breathe, or to much give Pertinacity, and the Spaniards having overthrown and slain their Enemies, enjoyed their Gallies.

Now had Don John with like courage and strength, but with doubtful Victory, fought three hours and more with Haly Bassa; when after so dreadful and dangerous a fight, and many a deadly wound on both parts given and received, our Men began to faint, and brought to the uttermost of their devotion, were in danger to have been overcome, had not Don John beakened himself to his only and last refuge. He had (as is before said) reserved under the Hatches four hundred of his best and fittest Soldiers, for their Valour chosen out of the whole Army against all the events of so long and dangerous a Battle; these Men attentively attending every becke of Don John, upon sign given, as was before appointed, suddenly flung out, and with a terrible cry and desperate onset assailed the Enemy, before almost spent with labour and wounds. This fresh and unexpected company so suddenly grown up, first astounded, and afterwards confounded, and with a great slaughter vanquished the Turks and possessed the Gally. The Bassa deadly wounded in the head with a shot, and all imbrued with blood, was taken, and as a joyful spectacle brought to Don John; who seeing him ready to breathe, he commanded him to be ready to his Armor, and his head struck off. Which presently fell upon the point of Spear, he for a space held up aloft with his own hand, as a trophy of his Victory, as also with the sight thereof to strike a terror in the minds of the other Turks, who in the other Gallies fast by fought yet right valiantly; neither was he therein deceived; for the Turks beholding the known countenance of the first of their late General, and a Flag of the Cross set up in the top of his Gally, and the noise of the Christians, crying Victory, running through the Army; were therein so discouraged, that confounded with fear they turned their Gallies and with might and main made toward the Land, which was not much more than a mile off. Which Camalis and Quirinus, yet breathing with the late slaughter of the Turks, perceiving, with their Gallies hardly pursued the flying Enemy, and sunk and took six of their Gallies. Persius his Son by the slaying of the rest got time to run his Gally on ground, and so forsaking her, faved himself and his Men by running ashore; did himself also divers others run themselves aground and forsake their Gallies, which presently became a Prey unto the Christians. In this hot conflict Caracota the famous Pyrat (who abjuring the Christian Religion had turned Turk, and of long time done exceedingly much mischief upon the Coast of the Christian Countries) valiantly fighting, was slain by Buzaccharinus of Padua, by whose death many were delivered of a great fear.

Haly Bassa had brought forth with him his two Sons Adamus and Mahomet, the one twenty three years old, and the other thirteen, the Nephews of the great Emperor Selymus, by his Sister married to Haly; their Father had placed in a great Gally, with a strong guard of the Janizaries; who seeing the discomfiture of the main Battle, with the danger now drawing near unto themselves, were exceedingly afraid, and therefore to save themselves, thought it best with all speed to make toward the Main. But in so doing they were prevented by Rosquinius the great Commander, who with his furious Spaniards boarding the Turks, already dismayed and running away, slew of them a great number; and after a great fight and much cruel execution done, took the Gally; and that which pleased him more, the two Sons of Haly both alive; in the fast chained in the Gally, had as Slaves long served in great misery, now perceiving the Christians to prevail, brake off their Gyves, took one another, and with such Weapons as first came to hand lustily laid about them, and nobly furthered the Victory.

Notwithstanding all this good success, the fortune of the Battle stood yet doubtful in the right Wing. There stood in either Battle two of the most noble Chieftains one against another; or the Christian part John Andreas Aris the Spanish Admiral; and for the Turks Ulucales; both most valiant and expert Commanders, well known the one to the other, for that they had of long used the same Seas, equal for their military discipline, as also for their noble acts, but far unequal for number of their Gallies; for the Turks had of one sort and other almost twice so many. Aris, whether it were for that he would in the beginning of the Battle warily decline the danger, and not hazard his Gallies, wherein his chief Honour would be also endangered; or else afraid lest left the Enemy, who far exceeded him in number of Gallies, should extend his Wing at large, and enclose the Christian Fleet behind; upon the signal of Battle given, shrunk farther off from the rest of the Battle; but whether upon policy, that it might be at his choice either to fight, if the rest of the Army prevailed, or to retire if they should be overcome; or that he upon martial policy declined the force of too strong an Enemy; divers Men diversly glossed; but what the cause was indeed, the world could not surely tell. However the matter stood, it seemed his purpose was by policy to contravert what he wanted in strength. This his falling off seemed unto the Turks most strange, to whom his quick departure seemed as the first in manner of a flight. Neither was Aris content with that space he had first separated himself from the Army; but the second time fell off further, and there staying and hovering aloof off, seemed to await some good opportunity to take the Enemy at some advantage; having in the mean time one of the Galeaffs of Pisa lying before him, as it were in stead of a Bulwark, which with often shot much troubled the Enemy. Ulucales also extending his Wing, took such a firm place that he seemed able to have compassed in and enclosed Aris; yet offered not Battle, but rather lay as expecting if any advantage should be given him tries further off was like rejoicing and signs of joy, as with us here in England.

This is that notable Battel, commonly called the Battel of Lepanto, fought near the Island Curzolari, the seventh day of October, in the year 1571. the like whereof was never fought at Sea again: the Turk, wherein he lost his chief strength at Sea, with most of his best Sea Captains; and might thereby well perceive what he and his Successors were to fear, if the Christian Princes at unity amongst themselves, all discord set apart, should in zeal of their Religion join their invincible forces against them.

In the midst of all this joy, generally conceived of the late Victory, one of the Prisoners of the Turks, hearing it compared with the loss of Cyprus (for that Selymus had therein lost his Fleet, his best Men of War, which great loss the loss of Cyprus was a fit Comparison shewed it not to be so, saying, That the Battel lost, was unto Selymus as if a Man should have his Beard, which would be long grow again; but that the loss of Cyprus was unto the Venetians, as the loss of an Arm, which once cut off, could never be again recovered. Declaring thereby the great inequality of the loss.

The rich Spoil taken from the Enemy in this most glorious Victory, was thus divided amongst the Princes Confederate. Unto the Pope were allotted nineteen Gallies, two Gallies, nine great Pieces of Ordnance, two and forty lesser Pieces, and fourscore and one Prisoners. Unto the King of Spain eight and fifty Gallies and an half, six Gallies and an half, eight and fifty great Pieces and an half, eight great murdering Pieces, and a thousand seven hundred and thirteen Prisoners. Unto the Venetians were assigned for their share, nine and thirty Gallies and an half, four Gallies and an half, nine and thirty great Pieces and an half, five great murdering Pieces and an half, fourscore and six lesser Pieces, and a thousand one hundred three score and one Prisoners. The rest were bestowed upon such other Princes as had given aid, or otherwise well deserved in that service.

The joy conceived of this Victory was not so great amongst the Christians, but that the sorrow thereof was amongst the Turks far greater. Selymus himself was then at Hadramople, where eight days after the Battel, news was brought unto him, That his Fleet was overthrow and almost all taken or sunk by the Christians. Which so soon as he heard, he was fricken with exceeding grief; and overcame with melancholy, would not that that day suffer any Man to speak with him. And the rumor of the overthrow still encreasing, had in short time filled all places with fear, tears, mourning, and heaviness; some bewailing their Parents, some their Children, some their Husbands, some their Friends or Kinsmen, there lost. But that which most grieved the Turkish Emperor, was the loss of so many skillful and expert Captains, of so many skillful Masters and notable Souldiers, who brought up to any their lives at Sea, were not thought inferior to any then living; besides the perpetual ignominy and unwonted disgrace, thereby inflicted unto him and his posterity for ever. Wherefore full of wrath and indignation, he was about to have commanded all the Christians in his Dominions (in number infinite) to be put to death. Doubting indeed nothing more, than that they weary of the Turkish Tyranny, should be detestful of innovation, should with Weapons put into their hands, rise up against him, and take part with the other Christians his Enemies. But whilst the other Bassas (as Men disdain with the cruelty of the command) stood, all silent, Muhamed Bassa, for his former defects in great favour with the Tyrant, thought it good to make proof if his fury might by reasonable persuasion be mitigated, and some better course taken, both for the honour of Selymus himself, and the common good of the State; yet well knowing how full of danger it was, in that tyrannical Government, openly to speak any thing contrary to the good liking of the wilful Emperor, he durst not aptly contradict him; but lest him, as it were to his opinion and pleasure, by little and little to draw from himself, and so before he were aware, to lead him into his own device, and by delay moderate the rigor of his former fury. To which purpose, he cunningly set upon him in this sort.

Your anger (said he) most magnificent and invincible Emperor, against the Christians, is most just; as also in this my desire exceedeth all others, That they should endure and suffer such punishment as they have so justly deserved. Yet it behoveth us so to justify our wrath, as Men better regarding their own good, than the desire of revenge. And forasmuch as I am a reluctant for your many and undeserved favours, in all my Loyalty bounden unto your Highness above others; I reckon it in part my duty, so much the more frankly to deliver my opinion, such as it is, in matters of so great importance. Neither will I attempt my Speech in any respect to the comforting of your grievous mind; for how can it be that you, whose Progenitors, have always heretofore shewn your most liberal and courageous mind, concerning all the chances of Fortune, should not for ever after shew your self to be rather dreaded of all Men, than dreadful of any? Let others, whose Kingdoms built upon uncertainty, are subject to the revolution of time, and chance of Fortune, yield unto their evil hap: As for you, whose Empire is founded by the mighty hand of the most High God, and compassed about with an impregnable defence, and are your self by the power of God appointed King and Commander of Nations and People in number infinite; Fortune may well a little prick you, but never overthrow you. As for this late mischance, if it must needs so fall out, as proceeding from some immutable and eternal cause; must it be therefore always fixt and permanent? Only those miseries and mischiefs which the cowardice or foolishness of men bring upon themselves, have their firm and certain calamities; other common events coming from other causes, have all their common and sudden chances; but how this late mishap at Sea may be amended, and your former Glory there again recovered, is hereafter to be considered. Now for the present (in mine opinion) this one thing, as of all others most necessary, is to be provided, That the weak and worst fortified places of your Empire, most subject to danger, may be presently strengthened with strong Garrisons; and that the very present repair to the Imperial City, you clear up the minds of your heavy and dismayed Subjects; which done, what shall let, but that you may at your pleasure be revenged to the full of the Christians? For there is no cause why we should fear the Christians, fix hundred times and more before overthrow; but our Enemies and we are the same Men, we have been for many Ages, we bear the same minds, the same bodies, the same strength, the same weapons, wherewith we have gotten infinite Victories, both of them and others. And although such be the state of Islam, as that he cannot otherwise but sometime or other taste of the worst Turk; yet I think this present misfortune to be rather imposed unto some fatal cause to us unknown, than to the Valour of the Christians. Besides that, we may well enough oppose one overthrow against our

so many and infinite Victories; yes, we are to give immortal thanks unto Almighty God, that we have by force of Arms subdued the rich and famous Island of Cyprus, and that your high designs have in this point, far exceeded your heart's desire. And lastly, in mine opinion to judge, whether this late unfortunate Battel shall more hurt us, or the Christians; for besides that the multitude of the Turks hath no feeling of so small a loss, they will not at Men discouraged, give themselves to mourning and vain lamentations, but with greater courage and fury come forth again unto Battel, and revenge this loss with the infinite calamities of the Christians; who after this their good hap, will according to their wonted manner grow more fierce to excess; pleasure, carelessness, and ease, unto their own further confusion. Thus have I in brief faithfully declared mine opinion; yet with that submissive Loyalty, as that whatsoever should proceed from the mouth of your Imperial Majesty, shall be of me deemed most wisely and magnificently considered.

The Bassa was in such grace and authority with Selymus, that his opinion in Council prevailed, and the Tyrants wrath by his persuasion was well asswaged. But by the coming of Ulucates to Court, the remainder of his former grief and melancholy was fully quieted; who after he had excused himself of the late overthrow, and declared what he had himself done in the Battel, and in testimony thereof, presented him with one of the Ensigns of the Knights of Malta; told him also, how that he had left the Christian Fleet fore and torn, as that it could not possibly be made serviceable to the gainst the next year; which news was both of Selymus and the rest gladly heard. In the mean time Selymus placed this Ulucates in the head of Haly Bassa that was slain; and straitly commanded the great Officers which had the charge of his Navy, to build new shipping night and day; and further enjoyed every Governor out of his Province he had to have in readiness one or two Gallies; or two against the new Spring, as well for the defence of his own Dominions, as to revenge the loss he had so lately sustained; wherunto also many of his great Men put to their helping hands, and cheerfully furthered his desire. New supplies of Souldiers were also presently raised; and put into his frontier Towns, great store of new Ordnance cast, Weapons and Armour provided, and whatsoever else the necessity of the present time required. So with the Turks blood reason and industry, rather than with the Christians, who (as some note) rather wanted discretion how to use the Victory, than Valour to gain the fame; which whether it chanced for that prosperity begeth negligence, or that Men joying in their present Bliss, regard little the time to come, I leave it to the judgment of the wiser to determine.

After this so memorable a Victory, the three great Commanders of the Fleet sat in Council to consider, what further course they were best to take. But forasmuch as Winter began now to approach, and that they could not do much until their Fleet were new furnished and manned, they all resolved for that time to dissolve the Fleet, and the next Spring in the beginning of April, to meet together again at Corcyra. Whereupon Don John and Columbus returned to Messina, where they in safety arrived in November; and departing thence, and taking their leave the one of the others arrived, Don John at Naples, and Columbus at Rome, where they were in both places with great joy and triumph received.

The Venetians for all that grieved with the loss of Cyprus, gave not so over, but repairing their Navy with 30 Gallies, whereto were embarked 6000 Souldiers, won a Castle in Epirus called Margarita; and also recovered the Town of Suppote, which the Turks had that Summer before taken from them; but now hearing of this overthrow, had it upon the approach of the Venetian Fleet, again forsaken. The Gallies also of Crete conducted by Canalis, intercepted many of the Turks Vessels laden with Captives and the Spoils of Famagusta, as they were passing thence to Constantinople.

Although upon the late obtained Victory, a certain reconciliation had been made betwixt Don John and Venice, yet of the former diffidence remained an inward heart-burning of one of them against the other; for which cause the Spaniards requested the Venetians to appoint another Admiral in his place. Venice was now indeed a Man of great years, and his strength far spent; yet for that in his aged Body refted great wisdom and courage, and that they thought him for his great defects worthy all Honour, they were wonderful loath, and unwilling therein to gratify the Spaniard; for why, they well knew there was no other cause of the Spaniards proud hatred, but that he had stood against them upon the Honour of the Venetians; and further, They liked not that the Spaniard should so presumptuously prescribe unto them, whom they should place or displace, in or out of their honourable Offices. Nevertheless, not forgetting what commodity came by concord, and what evils of discord, and that they might not again to mighty an Enemy well spare the help of the Spaniard, they resolved to make choice of someone; who succeeding Venice, might with one consent manage the War, as together with Don John and Columbus. There was then one Jacobus Fulcarinus their chief Governour in Dalmatia, who but a little before had notably fortified Fadara and the other frontier Towns, and for the space of fourteen months had notably repressed the furious incursions of the Turks; of him then absent and not delinquent of the place (as of a Man of worthy choice for their Admiral) General by Sea against the Turk; which most honourable place he received not with all the solemn ceremonies thereto belonging at Venice, as the manner was, but at Fadara; from whence he in the Admiral Gally sent for that purpose by Aloysius Grimanus his successor in Fadara, failed over to Corcyra; where he found the old Admiral Venice, with no less care providing for all things, than if he should himself have still continued the War. Of which great care Fulcarinus at his coming eased him, by taking it wholly upon himself.

Whilst Fulcarinus thus lay making his preparation against the next Spring at Corcyra, Sara Marinengas, who had the charge of the Adriatick (by the Council of Venice, who was now returned to Venice) upon the suddain landed his Men, and besieged Caffra Novum, a strong Town of the Turks in the Borders of Ispria; where as his first coming he took the Suburb, and had in short time brought the Town to great extremity. But in the height of his hope to have won the Town, hearing that the Beglerbey of Grace was with great power coming thither, he was glad to raise his Siege, and with all speed to get him again to Sea. The Turks in like manner, to distress the strong Town of Caffra, holden by the Venetians in the Borders of Dalmatia, built a great and strong Fort upon the passage from the Sea to the Town, whereto they placed great store both of Men and Artillery; in hope by keeping them of the Town from all relief by Sea, at length to gain the Town which he had many times in vain attempted by force; for by Land it was already environed with the cruel Enemy, possessing the Country round about it. lying at Coryca with the Admiral, understanding how Catara a Town of no small importance, was thus both by Sea and Land by the Enemy distressed; with twenty Gallies manned with the most choice Souldiers could be picked out of the whole Fleet, took upon him the rick of the Fort, and relieving of the Town. Superantius with this fleet Company, and certain other Gallies which met him by the way, came by night before the mouth of the Bay of Catara, and there dividing his Fleet, left the one part thereof at Anchor before the Fort, and with the other himself cautiously passed by the Fort, further into the Bay; at whom the Turks out of the Fort made divers shots, but (by reason it was dark) to small purpose.
